Now, sir, I propose to show by a very few citations, that what I said is justified by the publicists. Chancellor Kent says:

"It is sometimes a very grave question, when and how far one nation has a right to assist the subjects of another, who have revolted, and implored that assistance. It is said that assistance may be afforded, consistently with the law of nations, in extreme cases, as when rulers have violated the principles of the social compact, and given just cause to their subjects to consider themselves discharged from their allegiance."—Kent's Commentaries, volume 1, p. 24.

In a note, he quotes with approbation a letter of Mr. Webster to Lord Ashburton, dated April 21, 1841, in which Mr. Webster said that—"It was a manifest and gross impropriety for individuals to engage in the civil conflicts of other States, and thus to be at war, while their Government is at peace;" and that "the salutary doctrine of non-intervention by one nation with the affairs of others, is liable to be essentially impaired, if, while the Government refrains from interference, interference is still allowed to its subjects individually or in masses;" and that "the United States have been the first among civilized nations to enforce the observance of the just rule of neutrality and peace, by special and adequate legal enactments against allowing individuals to make war on their own authority, or to mingle themselves in the belligerent operations of other nations."

Chancellor Kent himself observes:

"Prior to the recognition of the independence of any of the Spanish colonies in America, and during the existence of the civil war between Spain and her colonies, it was the declared policy of the Government of the United States, in recognizing the independence of the Spanish American Republics, to remain neutral, and to allow to each of the belligerent parties the same rights of asylum and hospitality, and to consider them, in respect to the neutral relation and duties of the United States, as equally entitled to the sovereign rights of war as against each other. This was also the judicial doctrine of the Supreme Court, derived from the policy of the Government, and seems to have been regarded as a principle of international law."

The policy and principle of the Government were laid down to the same effect by General Jackson in his message to Congress, December 21, 1836.

Vattel says, that, "even in lawful war between two nations, private expeditions are not lawful unless authorized by the civil authority." This every one knows by our ordinary experience. Even if this country were at war with Great Britain—public, lawful war—it would not be competent for individuals to arm private vessels and send them out to cruise against the commerce of the enemy unless they had a commission from the Government. If they were to cruise against British vessels without such a commission, and should be taken by a British man-of-war, they would be entitled to none of the privileges of prisoners of war, but would be regarded as freebooters, and treated pretty much according to pleasure. Vattel declares:

"The necessity of a special order to act is so thoroughly established, that, even after a declaration of war between two nations, if the peasants of themselves commit any hostilities, the enemy shows them no mercy, but hangs them up as he would so many robbers or banditti. The crews of private ships of war stand in the same predicament; a commission from their sovereign or admiral can alone, in case they are captured, insure them such treatment as is given to prisoners taken in regular warfare."

On every score, then, this carrying on of war by private adventurers against another State, especially when it is at peace with that country to which they belong, is an offense of the highest character against the laws of nations. Against their own Government it is just such an offense as the laws make it. I hold, therefore, that General Walker and his associates, although only guilty of a misdemeanor against the laws of the United States were, as regards Nicaragua, in no better condition than freebooters and pirates—they were waging war against that State and people, without any authority.

Now, sir, I turn to the act of 1818, chapter eighty-eight. That act was passed by this Government for the purpose of enforcing these very obligations. It contains a variety of provisions applying to different cases; and if the last clause of that act were struck out of it entirely, there would be penalties and prohibitions for every one of the offenses specified in the act, and authority to the Executive to use the military and naval force of the country to enforce such prohibitions and penalties. There are seven sections preceding the eighth. The first provides fine and imprisonment for exercising within the United States a commission to serve a foreign State. The second section imposes a penalty on any person for, within the jurisdiction of the United States, enlisting, or procuring others to enlist, in the service of a foreign State. The third section imposes a penalty for fitting out vessels for such services; the fourth for citizens fitting out or arming. The fifth section imposes fine and imprisonment for augmenting within the jurisdiction of the United States the force of foreign armed vessels. The sixth provides fine and imprisonment for any person or persons setting on foot within the jurisdiction of the United States any military expedition against a friendly Power. The seventh section gives cognizance to the district courts of complaints in all cases of capture made within the waters of the United States, or one marine league of the coast; and the eighth section, if the last clause of it were left out, would provide for the enforcement of the prohibitions and penalties contained in the preceding seventh section, by means of the exercise of the military and naval power of the United States. It is something else that is described in this last clause, and that something else is this: it is to give power to the President "to prevent the carrying on of any such expedition or enterprise from the territories or jurisdiction of the United States, against the territories or dominions of any foreign prince or State, district, colony, or people with whom the United States are at peace." Without this last clause the President would have been fully empowered within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States to use all the military and naval forces to suppress here such expeditions. It would have been useless, therefore, to insert that additional clause in the section if it were not intended for another purpose.

That other purpose is sufficiently disclosed by its language. A different meaning from that which I supposed to belong to it has been given by interpreting the word "prevent" to signify to anticipate. But that is not the usual meaning of the word "prevent." In the course of time it has changed its original signification, and now means to hinder or obstruct, or rather something stronger than either of these words. Crabbe, in his synonyms, says it used to signify the doing that which makes the purpose prevented impracticable.

The power, then, of the President under the last clause of the eighth section of this act, is to employ the naval and military forces of the United States so as to make the military expedition carried on from the United States impracticable.

It is to put at the control of the President, and within his discretion, the military and naval forces of the United States, to prevent the carrying on from the shores of the United States of any such military expedition; not to stop it here in limine; not merely to enforce the prohibitions and penalties provided in the other sections; but something more than that, which something more can be nothing else than to pursue such an expedition after it has left our limits, and seize it wherever it may be found, unless there be some intervening authority to interrupt the President's proceedings.

I know that reliance has been placed very much on the right of emigration. Mr. Webster's authority has been very frequently invoked on it; his correspondence with Mr. Bocanegra has been cited; but Mr. Webster himself has furnished the evidences of his opinion in regard to the operation of this act. I read from a debate in this House in 1850, when this very question was made. It was asked by what authority the President of the United States had used our armed vessels to cruise on the coast of Cuba to anticipate the Lopez expedition. Mr. Webster said:

"But now let us come to the direct question. What is it that is complained of? It is said that the President of the United States has directed a portion of the naval armament of the country to the coast of Cuba, for a certain specific purpose; and if the facts are as they are generally believed to be, for a purpose not only perfectly legal and perfectly constitutional, to be executed on the part of the Executive of the Government, but a purpose made his especial duty by a positive statute. If there is any case, it is a case of this kind. A military expedition has been fitted out, or begun to be fitted out, in the United States, to act against the island of Cuba, now belonging to the Spanish Government; and it is not material, if such be the fact, if it be fitted out, or begun to be fitted out or prepared, according to the language of the statute, in the United States, whether by the citizens of the United States or by others. The law prevents the thing being done in the United States. Now, I suppose that whatever action the President has taken on this subject is founded upon information that this is a military expedition prepared and set on foot in the United States, in whole or in part. Well, then, if that be so, the law makes it his express duty, wherever he can exert the military and naval power within the limits and jurisdiction of the United States, to exert it to defeat such an expedition. And in the next place, if a United States vessel is found on the coast of Cuba intending to violate this law of the country by helping to carry on a military expedition against Cuba, that vessel is just as much within the jurisdiction of the United States—for that is the word of the statute—as if she lay in the Potomac river."

Gentlemen seem to have confounded two very distinct powers of this Government. The first is the sovereign exclusive territorial authority which every nation possesses over its own territories, and extending over the waters beyond its shores to the distance of three miles. That is the general rule now of the publicists; though, in ancient times, the claim went to a much larger extent—as much as two hundred miles, as Hauterfeuille tells us, and he assigns a peculiar reason for that claim: in ancient days, filibuster expeditions were so common and so injurious that the older nations sought the protection of exclusive jurisdiction over the sea to a greater extent beyond their coasts, that they might be better able to secure themselves from such expeditions. This has come now to be three miles from shore. But the exclusive sovereign jurisdiction of a nation over its territory, which ceases within three miles of its shores, is a very different thing from that jurisdiction which they have on the high seas—not over the high seas, to be sure, but on the high seas, over their citizens, their vessels, and their property, wherever they may be afloat. Indeed, the publicists say that the flag continues the country. Wherever a vessel of the United States is borne on water, there is the United States. Indeed, how could it be otherwise; since, if it were not, there would be no power in any Government to punish for crimes committed on the high seas. If there were no jurisdiction in every nation over its citizens or subjects, their vessels and property afloat on the high seas, no crime committed there could be punished. The worst malefactors at sea would be beyond any jurisdiction, and even piracy itself would have uninterrupted immunity from the penalties of criminal law.

But we know, sir, that our statutes have provided for the punishment of all crimes committed on the high seas; and we have gone even further than that: we have a statute on our book—that of 1825—which punishes crimes committed on board our vessels within ports of foreign nations. We are not limited to the high seas. The jurisdiction of the United States attaches so completely to its vessels wherever they are water-borne, that even if a murder be committed in the port of Liverpool, the man may be tried in the courts of the United States, and may be hung for it. It is true, that there is there a conflict of jurisdiction, that the territorial jurisdiction of Great Britain attaches also, and that if her courts take cognizance of the case in the first instance, our jurisdiction must cease. That is provided for in the act; but if they fail to take cognizance of the crime committed on board a vessel of the United States within one of their ports, then our jurisdiction attaches; and on the return of the party to the United States, he may be tried and punished for his offense. If it were not that we have jurisdiction far beyond our territory, not limited by the lines of our land or three miles of water which bound our coast, how is it possible we could punish men for crimes committed on the high seas, or within the ports of a foreign nation? No law that we pass here gives any jurisdiction to the Government. No law that we pass here gives any authority to the law-making power. The law we pass providing for the punishment of people in these cases gives authority to the courts. It gives jurisdiction to your criminal tribunals; but the jurisdictional right of the sovereign power cannot be affected by any act of your legislation. So that I think I am warranted in saying that there is a jurisdiction all over the high seas, and wherever your vessels are water-borne; and I am not sure that it cannot be carried further still. I think it can be shown that there is a sort of jurisdiction too, even upon the land which belongs to a foreign nation, other than that of such nation.

We have on our statute-book a law which provides for the punishment of offenses committed by citizens of the United States within the limits of China and Turkey. They are tried by the courts of those countries,—and I speak now of offenses not committed on the high seas or on board a vessel lying in port, but offenses committed within the strictly territorial limits and on the very land of China and of Turkey. By what right can you punish these people for such crimes as that, if your jurisdiction is limited to your own territory and to the high seas? Sir, if your jurisdiction does not extend beyond them, then when you punish a homicide under the judgment of your consular and commissioner's courts where the offense is committed in China, you commit judicial murder. Gentlemen may say we have a treaty with China, and that treaty with China confers on us the power. Sir, no treaty with any nation on the face of the earth can enlarge the powers of this Government; they may cede territory; they may yield up their own prerogatives; they may abandon their own territorial rights; they may say "this exclusive territorial jurisdiction which we have, we will waive and allow you to exercise yours within our limits;" but they cannot confer a right on the Government of the United States which the people of the United States have not conferred on us, or which does not spring necessarily and inevitably from the relation of Government and citizen.

Now, sir, I do not speak this purely from my own suggestion. I have at least one authority among the publicists—I have not had time to investigate this question, or I should have found more, no doubt; but in a volume which was one of the text-books of my school-boy days, I have seen this authority:

"The jurisdiction which a civil society has over the persons of its members affects them immediately, whether they are within its territories or not."

This is from Rutherford's Institutes, and is quoted with approbation by Judge Marshall in his celebrated speech on the Jonathan Roberts case. I cannot conceive any other principle on which we can vindicate the law we passed under the authority of the treaty with China, than this principle of natural law which I have quoted from Rutherford. If we have not a jurisdiction which attaches to the members of our civil community wheresoever they are, I do not know how it is possible for us, whatever may be the terms of a treaty with China, or the terms of the law we passed, to punish a man for a crime committed without our territorial limits, beyond the high seas, and beyond the ports where our flag floats, and within a jurisdiction which is entirely foreign to us.

If anybody can point out to me any other source of authority for the passage of such a statute as this than the one I have cited, I shall be very much obliged to him. I admit I should have broached this idea with a great deal of timidity if it had not been fortified by the authority I find in Rutherford; but it is very clear to me that all the treaty with China can effect is a waiver of her right to exclusive territorial jurisdiction. She certainly could not confer on the Congress of the United States the power to pass that act; but if that act is valid, if it is not unconstitutional, if it is not a violation of the principles of our Government, it must be because our Government has a sort of personal jurisdiction over its citizens wherever they are. I think something of the same sort will be found in Bowyer's late work on international law; but I have not had time to examine it with a view to this point.

Now, sir, I say that the act of 1818 imposes on restrictions or limitations on the President in regard to the power conferred by the eighth section. That power was unnecessary to effect the prohibitions and penalties of the other sections of the act within the limits of the United States. Indeed, without the authority which is given in the earlier part of the section to use the naval and military forces to enforce the penalties and prohibitions of the act, I take it, that in the ordinary course of judicial proceeding, the military authority might have been so invoked. I do not mean that the President of the United States might have been directly called on to do it; but if the mandate of the court was not obeyed, the posse comitatus might have been called out, and the military and naval forces as a part of it. From the fact of conferring the special power on the President, it is evident that there was a design to go much farther than the limits of the territorial jurisdiction of the United States. And do we not know that our naval forces are used abroad everywhere as the police of the seas? Somebody asked me if I had ever known the case of a statute giving authority to go beyond the three marine miles from the coast, except in regard to the revenue laws? Sir, that provision in the revenue laws which allows cutters to board vessels within four leagues of your coast, is a limitation on your power, not an extension of it. If we had not a jurisdictional right beyond the three miles, no act of Congress could give it. Congress itself cannot increase its own powers, and yet that is the idea implied by the question which was asked me. Its powers are above itself. They come from the people through the instrumentality of the Constitution; and whatever we enact must be in subordination to the Constitution and the powers conferred by the people through it.

I say then that the power conferred on the President by the last clause of the eighth section of the act is not limited to the jurisdictional bounds of the United States territory; and if not limited there how is it limited, and by what? No limitation is found in the act, and there is none in the reason of things, except that in the exercise of the power thus conferred, the President shall take care not to violate the jurisdictional sovereignty of another State. That I admit. Unless that jurisdictional sovereignty of the other State has been waived, I suppose it would be ordinarily a violation of the territory of that State for forces to be landed there, and the capture of persons in the condition of General Walker, effected. But there are peculiar circumstances in regard to this capture of General Walker which vary the case.

In the first place, General Walker landed on Punta Arenas, a sand-spit, within the jurisdictional limits of Nicaragua, as our Government contends, though we all know that Costa Rica has claimed that territory for herself; and we know, too, that Costa Rican troops were in possession of it for some months prior to this advent of General Walker, and only left it a short time before he arrived there; and left it, I believe, in consequence of their apprehension of his landing with his filibusters. At the time when Walker arrived there it was derelict. At all events, at that moment Nicaragua had neither actual occupancy, nor constructive occupancy, nor potential occupancy, if I may use that term. She had no functionaries there; she had no troops there; she had no means to maintain her authority; she was ousted of her authority; and if she was not ousted of her authority before Walker got there, she was ousted of it by him. It was no longer within her possession. Her rule was not there. Her flag did not float there to protect or to punish. Our military force went there—for what purpose? To do her an injury? No, sir. They went there as her ally; they went there to her aid; they came to her assistance. It has been maintained by pretty high authority that there is no such violation of territory by the landing of forces, when their landing is not for a hostile, but for a friendly purpose, and to protect the nation on whose territory they landed from the incursion of those who, as to them, were to be considered as freebooters and pirates. What was the doctrine of the United States when our squadron was scouring the West India seas to put down the piracies which prevailed there in 1823? Judge Thompson, who was then Secretary of the Navy, instructed Commodore Porter on that subject, and I beg leave to read his instructions:

"Pirates are considered, by the law of nations, the enemies of the human race. It is the duty of all nations to put them down; and none who respect their own character or interest will refuse to do it, much less afford them an asylum and protection. The nation that makes the greatest exertions to suppress such banditti has the greatest merit. In making such exertions it has a right to the aid of every other Power, to the extent of its means, and to the enjoyment, under its sanction, of all its rights in the pursuit of the object.

"In the case of belligerents, where the army of one party enters the territory of a neutral Power, the army of the other has a right to follow it there. In the case of pirates, the right of the armed force of one Power to follow them into the territory of another, is more complete. In regard to pirates, there is no neutral party, they being the enemies of the human race; all nations are parties against them, and may be considered as allies. The object and intention of our Government is, to respect the feelings as well as the rights of others, both in substance and in form, in all the measures which may be adopted to accomplish the end in view. Should, therefore, the crews of any vessels which you have seen engaged in acts of piracy, or which you have just cause to suspect of being of that character, retreat into the ports, harbors, or settled parts of the island, you may enter, in pursuit of them, such ports, harbors, and settled parts of the country, for the purpose of aiding the local authorities, or people, as the case may be, to seize and bring the offenders to justice, previously giving notice that this is your sole object.

"Where a Government exists, and is felt, you will, in all instances, respect the local authorities, and only act in aid of and cooperation with them; it being the exclusive purpose of the United States to suppress piracy, an object in which all nations are equally interested; and in the accomplishment of which the Spanish authorities and people will, it is presumed, cordially cooperate with you. If, in the pursuit of pirates found at sea, they shall retreat into the unsettled parts of the islands, or foreign territory, you are at liberty to pursue them, so long only as there is reasonable prospect of being able to apprehend them; and in no case are you at liberty to pursue and apprehend any one, after having been forbidden so to do by competent authority of the local government. And should you, on such pursuit, apprehend any pirates on land, you will deliver them over to the proper authority, to be dealt with according to law; and you will furnish such evidence as shall be in your power to prove the offense alleged against them. Should the local authorities refuse to receive and prosecute such persons so apprehended, on your furnishing them with reasonable evidence of their guilt, you will keep them, safely and securely, on board some of the vessels under your command, and report, without delay, to this Department, the particular circumstances of such cases."

The idea of the Secretary of the Navy in that dispatch was, that, inasmuch as pirates were not only enemies of the United States, but of Spain, in pursuing them upon the shores of the Spanish islands we were acting as allies of Spain itself, or at least with no hostile intent to them, with no idea of violating their territorial sovereignty, and therefore we might, in pursuit of them, lawfully penetrate within the jurisdictional limits of the Spanish Crown, provided no objection was made by the Government of Spain, or the local authorities. That seems to me to be very similar to this case.

Here we had Mr. Yrissari before he was received as the Minister of Nicaragua, but while he was in communication with this Government, and under the authority of his Government accredited to this, addressing a letter to the Secretary of State announcing the fact that Walker was about to carry on such an expedition, and asking the interference of this Government, by means of its naval forces in the harbor of San Juan, to repel this incursion; and in fact Yrissari was recognized before Commodore Paulding made this descent on Punta Arenas. We have no separate treaty of amity with Nicaragua, I believe; but we had one with Central America when she was part of that confederacy; and the provisions of that treaty still subsist, notwithstanding the separation. We are under a pledge of friendship and amity to Nicaragua. That people, through their accredited agent, asked our interference at this very point, requesting us to put down this expedition by the use of our naval forces in the harbor of San Juan; and what we have done is precisely what they asked us to do. I admit, readily, that Commodore Paulding was without express instructions from the Navy Department to land. Indeed, I do not know that he had any other instructions than the general instructions contained in the circular of the State Department—rather insufficient, I think, for the circumstances; but Lieutenant Almy had direct instructions from the Navy Department to repel by force any vessel bringing a hostile expedition into the port of San Juan, and I believe he was directed to proceed to other points to watch out, to look for these invaders, so as to repel them. This implied a violation of the territorial sovereignty of Nicaragua quite as much as the landing of Commodore Paulding on the sand-spit of Punta Arenas, because the port of San Juan is as completely within the jurisdiction of Nicaragua as Punta Arenas, and a shot could not be fired in the port without violating the territorial right, unless that territorial right could be considered as waived.

Under the circumstances of this case, considering the application made by the minister, the repeated solicitations which have been addressed to this Government by the authorities of that, to protect them from such expeditions, I think we are fairly entitled to consider their territorial sovereignty as waived, and ourselves as permitted to use force within their territorial limits for the purpose of repelling such incursions. We were fully entitled so to regard it, and so we were in the case of Commodore Porter and the Spanish West India islands. Therefore, when Commodore Paulding landed, although he went further than any orders of his Government authorized him to go, he was only carrying out the purpose of the Government; he was only executing its just and lawful objects; he was only doing that which a high regard for national law required us to authorize him to do; and in my opinion, if he has committed any error at all, it is not a very "grave" error. It is the merest fractional error that it is possible for a naval man to commit under such circumstances. I admit that technically you may say he had no right to do this, because he had no orders to do it; but I rather think the expression of "grave error" attributed to him by the President in his message, is more the result of the President's great caution—a somewhat distinctive feature in his character—than anything like a deliberate design to censure Commodore Paulding. I am very sure he entertains no such design; and if he does not publicly, I have no doubt that privately he is gratified that Paulding has taken this short cut to the settlement of a very difficult matter.

The other day, when this subject was up, the honorable Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Brown] alluded to the case of Commodore Porter, and contrasted it with the treatment which Commodore Paulding was receiving. He seemed to think it was a similar case in all respects. While I think the case of the pirates which he was authorized to pursue into the interior of the Spanish Isles very much like the authority implied to Commodore Paulding to land at Punta Arenas and capture the filibusters there, and who, as to Nicaragua, were pirates, though not such as to us, I believe there is a great difference between the case under which Commodore Porter was tried and the case for which it is now proposed to censure Commodore Paulding. Commodore Porter visited the town of Foxardo, not in pursuit of pirates, but to avenge an insult to a lieutenant of his squadron who had gone to that town some time previously for the purpose of looking up goods supposed to have been taken by pirates from Saint Thomas and lodged there. When he arrived there, he was treated with indignity by the local authorities, and put into prison until the close of the day. He then repaired to the vessel of Commodore Porter and stated his wrongs.

The commodore, burning with resentment at this mal-treatment of one of his lieutenants, proceeded to the bay of Foxardo, landed a force, found a battery placed there, as if in opposition to him, went around the battery, charged it in the rear, took the guns, spiked them, then marched a force of two hundred men two miles from the coast, spiking other guns as he went along; and finally came to a halt two hundred and fifty or three hundred yards from the town; sent a flag of truce in to the alcalde; notified him that if he did not make the most ample reparation and apology the consequence would be the destruction of his town; then compelled an apology, and returned to his ships. That was his case. That was not a case of aiding and assisting the Government of Spain in the pursuit of pirates who had made a retreat to that place. It was the case of a direct act of war, initiated by a captain in the Navy, of his own authority, for the purpose of redressing an insult offered to one of his lieutenants. The cases cannot be compared at all. Captain Porter was a very gallant man. There were many people who disapproved of his conduct on that occasion, but regretted to find that he was suspended from the Navy, and ultimately he resigned his commission; but the cases are not in the least parallel.

I come now to the continuation of the remarks I was making a short time since as to the operation and extent of the power conferred on the President by the last clause of the act of 1818. Suppose that the President, having given instructions to his naval commanders to pursue an expedition of this sort, they should pursue them, chase them on the high seas, until they arrive at an island in the neighborhood of their operations, not within the jurisdiction of any Power at all; does any one suppose that if the pirates, thus pursued, should land on this unclaimed island the authority of the naval forces of the United States to capture them would be at an end? I apprehend not. I apprehend that wherever they could find those men they would have a right to seize them if they did not violate the territorial sovereignty of some other Power. Unless there is some particular sanctity about a mere spot of land not covered with water, I apprehend the authority given by this act would not be checked in that case.

But, sir, the conduct of our own Government in other cases has evinced a disposition to carry the authority of the United States under this law still further, to an extent perhaps to which I could not even go myself, though with some qualification I might be able to do so. I have referred to the correspondence between a former Mexican Minister to this country, and one of the most accomplished debaters who was ever heard in these Halls, a statesman of very considerable acuteness and ability—I mean Mr. Forsyth, when he was Secretary of State under General Jackson. In 1836, soon after the revolution in Texas commenced, our Department of State was flooded with remonstrances from the Mexican Minister, and complaints made that our people were getting up parties for the purpose of going into Texas and aiding in the war; that companies were organizing at Nashville and other places. Mr. Forsyth promptly furnished the instructions given to our district attorneys and other officers to suppress all such movements. In addition to that, Mr. Gorostiza complained that General Jackson had given orders to General Gaines in command of the Army at that quarter, to advance as far as Nacogdoches, which was then in Texas, claimed by Mexico, some thirty miles, I believe, beyond our then limits. Mr. Forsyth replied to Mr. Gorostiza that he had somewhat mistaken the purport of the order to General Gaines; that General Gaines had not been ordered to carry the military forces of the United States as far as Nacogdoches, but that he had been told he must not go any further than that point, implying necessarily that under certain circumstances he might advance as far as Nacogdoches. Mr. Forsyth justified this order to General Gaines to carry the troops of the United States into the Territories then claimed by Mexico, not as a hostile movement, but as a friendly one, as fulfilling treaties of amity and peace; "treaty obligations," I think he says; but at that time there was no treaty with Mexico, except that of 1831. By that treaty, in the ordinary form, we stipulated that there should be perpetual and inviolate peace between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico and between all the citizens of the one and the citizens of the other. This was the formal article found in all the treaties of peace and amity. There was a special provision that the United States should guard Mexico from the irruptions of our Indians; and Mr. Forsyth justified the implied order to General Gaines to advance as far as Nacogdoches, on the ground that the United States, as a friendly nation, was bound by its treaty stipulations as well as by the laws of nations to protect its friends from the incursion of hostiles who were within the limits of the United States, and that it had the right to follow those hostiles into the territory of Mexico, and even, he says, to the very heart of the Empire. Here is his language:

"To effect one of these great objects for which General Gaines is sent to the frontier of Mexico, that is to fulfill our treaty with Mexico by protecting its territory against the Indians within the United States, the troops of the United States might justly be sent into the heart of Mexico, and their presence, instead of being complained of, would be the strongest evidence of fidelity to engagements and friendship to Mexico."

The whole correspondence is to be found in the Congressional Globe and Appendix for 1835-36. I should question very much the right of our Government to dispatch troops, even for that purpose, without the consent of the party whose territory was to be entered on; but at all events this authority is enough to show that it is not the first time in the history of our Government that troops have been sent into the jurisdictional limits of another State, for the purpose of repressing incursions by American citizens; and the authority and right to do so, so far as it can be, affirmed by the opinion of an accomplished statesman, Mr. Forsyth, and of a President of great weight of character and authority in this country, undoubtedly. It has all the sanction to which it is entitled from the character of those two statesmen. Nay, more, sir, although it is not authority which you might quote, perhaps, in a contest with a foreign Power, it is one which may be used when we are discussing the conduct of our own Government in their own vindication. They have not gone beyond their predecessors. They have not gone so far as their predecessors. This Executive has ordered the forces of the United States to repel the invasion of these filibusters in the harbor of San Juan, within the territorial sovereignty of Nicaragua; but they have not avowed their right for that purpose to march an army into the heart of Nicaragua, as Mr. Forsyth did in the communication to which I have referred, in relation to Mexico.

I believe I stated before that there was no treaty stipulation like that of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo requiring us not only to protect Mexico from the incursions of the Indians, but to exact satisfaction for the same. The principle is solemnly recognized in every treaty of peace and amity made everywhere, and with all nations. The first article in all these treaties is an article of amity and peace—inviolable and universal peace and true and sincere friendship—from which the duty may be implied of preserving that peace by restraints upon the Indians within our borders.

I shall not detain the Senate much longer, but I wish to say a few words in regard to Commodore Paulding. I have heard a great deal said of the harshness with which he executed this duty. One gentleman spoke of his having boasted of the gallantry of his sailors and marines. That happens to be a mistake. I have looked at his letters and I do not see any boast of their gallantry; but he praises their good order and discipline, which, considering that the debarkation was made in a turbulent sea, and at considerable peril, is I think not at all immodest. I saw no language disrespectful to General Walker. He considers him as most people do in our country, I apprehend, as a lawless man, who is disregarding the laws of nations, who is disposed to carry ruin and havoc into the territory of Nicaragua, in order that he may establish himself there on the basis of a military despotism—that is what he means by a government "based on military principles;" but I see no language of Commodore Paulding to him which could be considered disgraceful to that officer. We do not wish our officers when executing a stern duty to speak with bated breath, and accompany the act by apologetic flourishes. We want them to speak like men, like officers; to speak whatever is to be said, plainly, frankly, without apology and unnecessary qualification. That is what Commodore Paulding has done, and I think he executed this office as wisely and as well as it could have been done. He organized a force sufficient to overcome all opposition. That was a mercy to these people, for if he had gone with a small force there would have been opposition and bloodshed. I see no barbarity, nothing inflicted which authorizes gentlemen to speak in the extremely harsh terms in which some have censured him. For my part, I believe him to be a sensible man, a gallant officer. I believe if he had no specific orders from the Government to do precisely what he has done, that the orders which Lieutenant Almy had were, at all events in their spirit and essence, sufficient to justify him in the step which he took. I think, in taking that step, he has relieved the country from a great responsibility; he has relieved Nicaragua from the horrors of an abominable war; and he has vindicated the good faith of the Government of the United States, which was bound to put down such a lawless expedition as this. If the President had not given him authority, the President might have given him the authority, as I think I have shown; and I will consider that what ought to have been done has been done; and though I am not willing to vote a medal to Commodore Paulding for this service, because it is not the sort of service for which I think medals ought to be voted, he has my thanks, and the thanks of the great mass of the people. There are some few places where he may be condemned, where Walker has become popular and received sympathy; but everywhere else the people of this country will approve and sanction and applaud the conduct of Commodore Paulding. I trust they will do so.

I would now say a word as to another officer who has been the subject of remark. I should say nothing about him, were it not for the fact that he is a constituent of mine, as honest and true a sailor as ever stepped on the deck—a perfectly brave and fearless man, as I know. I have known him for many years. He has been thirty-three years in the Navy, without the slightest reproach on his character or conduct as an officer. He is a conscientious man, not as ready, perhaps, to assume responsibility as some others. I mean Captain Chatard. He was without any other instructions than the circular which was dispatched to our attorneys and collectors of customs, and copies of which were furnished to the individual officers commanding the different ships on that station. That was all he had. He naturally enough, not having more specific instructions than those contained in that circular, doubted his authority to stop this vessel as she was coming in, especially as his suspicions were not awakened as to her being engaged in a hostile enterprise.

I beg leave to say further, though he has been reproached for exhibiting ill-temper by certain notes he wrote to Walker, that I think, when the circumstances are explained, it will be perceived that he is not liable to that charge. It is a fact that he had put up, some weeks before, a target in the neighborhood of the place of Walker's camp. Here he was in the habit of exercising his crew in boat-practice with the howitzers; and the boat-practice of which Walker complained, was nothing but a continuance of what had been going on for weeks before. So in regard to his request to move his camp a little out of the way, so that, in firing to bring a vessel to, he might do no damage. A shot thrown from his vessel, I understand, must pass over this sand-spit, and he wished to notify Walker in time, that possibly, in throwing shot over there to bring a vessel to, it might do damage. These are the only instances of brutality and meanness I have been able to perceive in the correspondence. I trust he will be excused for not assuming the responsibility of bringing the Fashion to, when unsuspecting of her character, and not expressly required to search all vessels before allowing them to run up to the wharf.

Now, sir, I will only say in conclusion, that while I desire to see the people of this country, individually and collectively, free, happy, and prosperous, loyal to the Constitution, and obedient to the law, watching the Government with a sober vigilance—not with a partisan spite, not with an illiberal suspicion, but with a sober vigilance—and correcting them, if they go astray, with the moderation of wisdom, I desire to see the Government also sensitive to our national honor, and vigilant and firm in the protection of our national rights. I desire to see them just and firm, but courteous, towards the great Powers; and at the same time, not only just, but forbearing and generous to the weaker Powers, helping them in their debility, assisting them in their tottering steps in the progress of freedom and civilization. While they are doing all this, I want to see them crushing, with broad and mighty hand, the turbulent spirits in our midst, who regard no law, who set at naught the Constitution, who deride the obligations of international rules, who defy the enactments passed by you to enforce your national obligations, and who, looking only to personal victory, and to personal triumph and to personal aggrandizement, are willing to violate your law, the laws of nations, and the peace of another country; to trample down its independence, and to establish a Government "based on military principles," which shall be restrained by no representative legislature, by no constitutional responsibility, but which shall be a usurped despotism, directed for the benefit of one man or a few men.

Mr. SLIDELL. I desire to know what is the immediate question before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Brown] to the joint resolution for the presentation of a medal to Commodore Paulding.

Mr. SLIDELL. I shall vote for the amendment of my friend from Mississippi; and, if that be adopted, will then vote to lay the amended resolution on the table. I will state, in a very few words, my reasons for so doing. The whole subject of the policy of our neutrality laws and the conduct of Commodore Paulding was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; that committee has reported; an early day has been fixed for the consideration of its report; and, in the meanwhile, I consider the discussion of so grave a subject, involving so large a field of inquiry, premature. When that report shall be considered, I will renew an effort which I made four years since, to vest in the President the power, under certain restrictions, to suspend the operation of our neutrality laws.

I am disposed to sustain the Executive in his declared purpose of rigorously enforcing them, so long as he shall, by his constitutional obligation to see that the laws be faithfully executed, be bound to prevent the setting on foot, and carrying on, any military expedition against a State with which we are at peace. But I believe the policy to be suicidal which deprives us at all times, and under all circumstances, of the faculty to aid the struggles of oppressed and suffering communities against the despotism of their rulers. I cannot refrain, however, from saying that, while I utterly disapprove of Commodore Paulding's course, and think that he should not be retained in his very delicate and responsible command, I have not the slightest sympathy with Walker's late movement, or his future purposes. Were his object a good one, and his intended means of attaining it lawful, I consider him as altogether unfit for its successful consummation. In my opinion, he has no one requisite for his self-imposed mission of regenerating Central America; he is neither a good soldier nor a prudent administrator. His former expedition abundantly demonstrates his glaring incapacity alike in the field and the cabinet.

With these very brief observations, I ask that the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations be taken up informally, merely for the purpose of allowing me to submit the proposition to which I have alluded. I presume there will be no objection to that on the part of the Senate.

Mr. BELL. I ask the honorable Senator when he proposes to resume the discussion of this subject?

Mr. SLIDELL. I propose now to move that this resolution lie on the table, and let the whole matter come up on the day fixed for its consideration at the instance of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations—Tuesday next, I think.

Mr. MASON. By a vote of the Senate, the report of the committee, with the resolutions and accompanying bill, have been made the order of the day for the 9th of February, which is next Tuesday week. I suppose any motion made by the honorable Senator from Louisiana will correspond with that.

Mr. SLIDELL. I thought it was the coming Tuesday.

Mr. MASON. No, sir, Tuesday week. I was induced to lay it over until that day at the instance of gentlemen interested in other special orders.

Mr. SLIDELL. I should, myself, prefer to have a vote, in the first instance, on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the question before the Senate.

Mr. BELL. I think the proposed postponement is to a very late day, considering that we have had a pretty full argument on one side of this question, if not on the other. I should hope that some earlier day than Tuesday week would be acceptable to the Senate for resuming the discussion. I shall not, however, be obstinate about the time. It is a subject which requires some further discussion, and I hope that the debate will be resumed at an early day.

Mr. SLIDELL. I suppose the day fixed was agreed upon as the earliest day on which the Senate could consider the question.

Mr. MASON. That is the fact. It was put off to that day with reference to the business already arranged for the convenience of Senators. I put it off to that day because we should have a better opportunity then of getting at it.

Mr. SLIDELL. I presume there will be no objection to taking up informally the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, so as to enable me to present my amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The present question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi to the joint resolution; but, by unanimous consent, the proposition of the Senator from Louisiana will be received and read for information.

Mr. HALE. It seems to me that if no one else wishes to speak on the particular proposition pending before the Senate, we may as well take the vote and dispose of it.

Mr. SLIDELL. I merely ask that my proposition may be read for information, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HALE. Very well.

Mr. SLIDELL. I propose, when the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations shall come up for consideration, to move, as a substitute for the resolutions reported by the committee, the following:

Resolved, That it is expedient that the President of the United States be authorized during any future recess of Congress to suspend by proclamation, either wholly or partially, the operation of an act entitled "An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein mentioned," approved the 20th of April, 1818, and of an act entitled "An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," approved the 5th of June, 1794, should, in his opinion, the public interests require such total or partial suspension; such suspension not to exceed the period of twelve months, and the causes which shall have induced the President to proclaim it to be communicated to Congress immediately on its first meeting thereafter.

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to bring in a bill in conformity with the foregoing resolution.

I move that this proposition be ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi to the joint resolution.

Mr. STUART. I move to postpone the further consideration of this question to the same day and hour fixed for the consideration of the report of the committee, Tuesday, the 9th of February, at one o'clock, when the whole matter can come up together.

The motion was agreed to.

ADMISSION OF MINNESOTA.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I ask the Senate now to take up the bill for the admission of Minnesota into the Union, so that it may be the unfinished business at the next meeting.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the Senate will not agree to that. The unfinished business before the Senate is the bill which has been under discussion the last two days, this being the third day, and I hope we shall conclude that subject before we enter upon another. I supposed that when the debate on the resolution which was pending providing for granting a medal to Commodore Paulding had been concluded, we were to resume the consideration of the Army bill. I think that bill has priority of right in the order of business, and I hope the Senate will not reverse the ordinary rule.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the Senate will take up the Minnesota bill, and assign a special day for its consideration, my object will be accomplished.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The recollection of the Chair is that the Army bill was not postponed until to-morrow, but postponed for the present, to enable the joint resolution, on which the Senator from Maryland had the floor, to be considered, and the bill now comes up before the Senate as a matter of course.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Does the Chair decide that the bill providing for the increase of the Army is now before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Then I shall not make my motion until we get through with that bill.

Mr. GREEN. I think it proper to notify the Senator from Illinois, that one of our colleagues, the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. FITZPATRICK,] is too unwell to be in his seat, and I know he takes a great interest in the bill to which the Senator from Illinois has referred, and I should not like to have it made a special order for any particular time in his absence.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I understand that he will be here to-morrow. That will obviate the objection.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. SLIDELL, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The business before the Senate is the bill (S. No. 79) to increase the military establishment of the United States. That bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole; the question being on the motion of the Senator from Georgia, to strike out the first section.

Mr. STUART. When I moved this morning to lay this bill aside, in order to allow the Senator from Maryland to proceed with his remarks on another subject, I indicated a disposition to say something on this bill, before taking the vote. I do not care to say what I have to say before the vote is taken on the pending amendment, if there is any disposition on the part of the Senate to dispose of the amendment now. ["Go on!"] In the first place, I desire—for it is proper in regard to this subject—to correct an impression that was sought to be made by the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] in regard to the power of the President of the United States to use the troops in support of the civil authority. I think it is proper to notice that, because that is one of the reasons assigned in debate, and so far as we have a right to infer, it is one of the reasons which has governed the President in asking for an increase of the Army. I think there is a misapprehension, to some extent, both of the Constitution and the law on this point. The fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution provides that:

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the Legislature, or of the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence."

It is true, there is no reference in this clause of the Constitution to Territories, and it is equally true that, in that provision of the Constitution requiring the return of fugitive slaves or persons owing service in one State escaping into another, there is nothing said in regard to the Territories. The provision of the Constitution is, that a person owing service in one State escaping into another, shall not be discharged from that service by the effect of that act, but upon demand shall be returned; and yet the very first law that was passed by Congress under that provision of the Constitution of the United States embraced Territories. So the law of Congress in regard to the action to be had in cases of domestic violence embraces Territories, and from the very necessity of the case. Take the instance of the return of fugitives: the operation of the Constitution would be entirely defeated if they were not to be returned from a Territory. Take the case of domestic violence: the clause of the Constitution which I have just read cannot be carried out if domestic violence be permitted in a Territory, without any power to suppress it. Hence legislation has but followed the object of the Constitution itself upon these subjects in placing the Territories upon precisely the same footing as the States.

In regard to the construction of the law contended for by the Senator from Maine, I desire only to say to him and to the Senate this: The first act, the act of 1792, provided for calling out the militia to carry out the provisions of the Constitution—that is, to suppress domestic violence in States; and that act described the circumstances under which the President should have authority to call out the militia. The effect of the later act of 1807 is to provide that under the same circumstances existing in a State or in a Territory, the President may call out the regular troops. That is the construction. The Senator from Maine, I think, commits an error when he supposes that the latter act is limited like the former to States. The object was to embrace Territories, and to declare that in the States and in the Territories the regular troops, like the militia, might be called out. So much for that point.

Now, sir, what is the condition of things in regard to Utah? I think this point has been perhaps rather lightly passed over. The President of the United States has authority to send troops to Utah if the Legislature, when in session, or the Governor of the Territory in the recess of the Legislature, says to him that they are necessary in order to suppress domestic violence of any character. I am not going to assume that the President has sent troops toward that far distant Territory without having sufficient authority. I take it for granted that he has the authority; and until the contrary be shown, on his recommendations I am prepared to meet the emergency. He says, and the Secretary of War also says, that an additional force is necessary. They describe the character of the force which they need, and the mode in which it is to be raised; and but for the fact that the Senate Committee on Military Affairs has, after full consideration, reported a different mode of increase, I should have agreed with the President and Secretary, and voted the additional regiments. I am free to say that when a subject is referred to a committee of this body, there considered and investigated, I deem it safer in all cases to follow its recommendations unless my own convictions are clear against their conclusions. Additional force is necessary as reported to us by that Department of the Government which has this subject in special charge. If it is intended to execute the laws in Utah and to carry out the plan which seems to have been prepared by the President of the United States, it will undoubtedly be found that a force of troops is necessary there, and to be retained there. Still I do not mean to admit here to-day that I believe in the truth of all that has been said in regard to the people of Utah. The experience of the world teaches us that on all such subjects exaggeration accompanies fact. A small difficulty is enlarged and magnified into a great one, and stories are told about the designs of these people which, in my judgment, have no foundation in fact. Certain things, however, are true. It is true that almost that entire community is a Mormon community, whose religion, fanatical, as the honorable Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] said yesterday, is their guiding star. It is undoubtedly true that with that people as with the followers of Mohammed, the authority of their priesthood is superior to any other, when it is called in question.

Now how are the laws to be executed in that Territory? You may send judges and district attorneys and marshals there, but your jurors are Mormons; your sheriffs, your constables, your justices of the peace, are Mormons. That is the condition of things which exists, and will continue to exist as long as that people keep themselves in bodies of the magnitude that are there now.

What is the difficulty complained of? Not that a man cannot be arrested, not that civil process cannot be served, but that jurors will not find a verdict in accordance with the law and the facts; or if they do, inferior courts interpose their process and send their officers, take the respondent into custody, and, by a habeas corpus, or some process of their own, discharge him. How, then, are the laws of the United States to be executed unless you have a military force to use in aid of civil law? If you call on the civil posse, they are Mormons, they will not help you. If it is against the direction of their priestly authority they will not do it. Hence it is clear to my mind that a force sent to that Territory must remain there if you intend to execute the laws.

I do not mean to say that that would have been my mode of getting along with the Territory of Utah. I only mean to say that the President of the United States has adopted his policy; that it is the usual policy under our system, and that I am ready to vote him men and means to any reasonable amount to execute that policy. Still I deem it my right and duty to say here, that I believe it would have been better to have suspended all intercourse of United States authority with that Territory. I believe that if you withdraw your officers, and withhold your appropriations of money from that people, they cannot for one year successfully resist the United States or any other power. There is no article of their production which they can get to market that will bring as much money after they have got it to market, as it costs to take it there. We are expending in that Territory from forty to fifty thousand dollars a year. It is all the money they have got, and all they can get; and if you would withhold that from them, they would soon come to terms.

The Senator from Tennessee asked me yesterday what I thought about this species of fanaticism? I am not going into a comparative analysis of this with other species of fanaticism, but I will tell the honorable Senator, what he knows as well as any other gentleman, that the very best way to bring a fanatical man to his senses is to reach his pocket, and through his pocket his necessities. Let him be put in a condition where he cannot obtain the necessary clothing to put upon himself and upon his wives and children, and he will become, of his own accord, a pretty submissive citizen with great rapidity.

I say this would have been my mode of treating with the Mormons. I should not have repealed the organic law; I would have retained the organic law; but I would have authorized, by act of Congress, the President to suspend appointments, and I would, by the action of Congress itself, have suspended appropriations. I repeat, that if you take away the forty or fifty thousand dollars a year which you spend among these people, they will have nothing with which to resist you.

Now, sir, briefly, very briefly indeed, I hope,

I have presented to the Senate the reasons that will guide me in my action, and it is all I designed to do. Believing that more military force is necessary to carry on the operations of this Government with wisdom, with energy, and with success, I am prepared to vote it. Having confidence in the committee that has had this subject under consideration, and given us the benefit of its investigation, I am prepared to indorse its recommendations; and I trust that we may not be diverted from the true subject in hand by any discursive debate.

I ask the attention of the Senate while I correct one other misapprehension of the honorable Senator from Maine, and then I shall have ended all that I have to say. The Senator from Maine read an extract from a message of ex-President Pierce, as to the right of the Government to use military force to suppress difficulties at elections, to maintain the purity of the ballot-box. When the Senator read his selection from that message, I confess it struck me as not being in accordance with my recollection; and I think it will be seen, when I read three or four other sentences of that message, that President Pierce indorses this doctrine. He could not have done less. Under the authority given him by the constitution and laws of the United States, anything which amounts to domestic violence, no matter from what cause it originates, clothes the President of the United States with authority to call out the troops, on a sufficient local requisition. What does President Pierce say? After speaking of the difficulties in regard to Kansas, he adds:

"In such an event, the path of duty for the Executive is plain. The Constitution requiring him to take care that the laws of the United States be faithfully executed, if they be opposed in the Territory of Kansas, he may and should place at the disposal of the marshal any public force of the United States which happens to be within the jurisdiction, to be used as a portion of the posse comitatus; and if that do not suffice to maintain order, then he may call forth the militia of one or more States for that object, or employ for the same object any part of the land or naval force of the United States. So, also, if the obstruction be to the laws of the Territory, and it be duly presented to him as a case of insurrection, he may employ, for its suppression, the militia of any State, or the land or naval force of the United States. And if the Territory be invaded by the citizens of other States, whether for the purpose of deciding elections, or for any other, and the local authorities find themselves unable to repel or withstand it, they will be entitled to, and upon the fact being fully ascertained, they shall most certainly receive, the aid of the General Government."

Now comes the sentence which the honorable Senator read:

"But it is not the duty of the President of the United States to volunteer interposition by force, to preserve purity of elections, either in a State or Territory."

The Senator did not give the significance intended to the word "volunteer." The President has no authority under the Constitution of the United States to volunteer in this matter. He must be called upon by the executive authority of the Territory in the absence of a session of the Legislature; or if the Legislature be in session they must call on him; and President Pierce says in this message, when thus called upon, protection will be cheerfully furnished; but he says he has no authority to volunteer interposition by force to preserve the purity of elections either in a State or Territory:

"To do so would be subversive of public freedom."

And so it would.

"And whether a law be wise or unwise, just or unjust, is not a question for him to judge. If it be constitutional, that is, if it be the law of the land, it is his duty to cause it to be executed, or to sustain the authorities of any State or Territory in executing it in opposition to all insurrectionary movements."

That is a true interpretation of the Constitution of the United States; none can be truer. As I said, I do not introduce that point here for the purpose of going into any discussion upon the existing state of affairs in Kansas. Upon a former occasion I discussed what was the duty of the executive and judicial officers. On a recent occasion I have discussed what I thought was the duty of Congress. I shall continue to discuss those questions as often as they are before us properly, and in my judgment that is the proper time for discussion; but I do think (and I beg pardon of the Senator for differing with him) that on all occasions when a question arises as to the corresponding and relative authority of the different departments of this Government, the debate should not pass away without that subject being fairly comprehended and understood. I shall regret, deeply regret, ever to see the day which seemed to be looked for with anything but displeasure, not only by the honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. IVYERSON,] but by my colleague, [Mr. CHANDLER,] occupying different sides of this question, when the people of the United States, in a Territory, in a State, or elsewhere, shall be brought in conflict, steel to steel and hilt to hilt. Sir, that will be a day when not only the liberties of this country will be ended, but when, in my judgment, freedom upon this continent will sleep forever.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Michigan has controverted some of the positions which I attempted to illustrate in a very few words the other day, and he has referred the Senate to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States as laying the foundation for his argument. I think he was unfortunate in that reference, especially if he concedes, as I suppose every man must, that Congress possesses no power to pass any law which is not authorized by, and in pursuance of, the provisions of the Constitution. The provision of the Constitution which he read, was substantially this—I cannot repeat its exact language—that on a requisition made by the Legislature of any State, or the Governor of any State, when the Legislature is not in session, Congress may interpose for certain purposes. Very well. If Congress can interpose for those purposes, it must interpose by means of a law. The President cannot undertake to act except in pursuance of a law passed by Congress, to carry out the authority thus granted; and the act of Congress which has been so much commented upon, is a law passed in pursuance of that provision.

Now, sir, that provision of the Constitution applies to the States, and the States alone. There is no provision in the Constitution authorizing any law of the same kind with reference to a Territory. That idea is drawn by implication, I suppose, by the Senator, that "State" must mean "Territory," if necessary; that is to say, if the question arises in a Territory. There I take issue with him. There is no such thing to be inferred. The power is confined to the States; and the requisition must be made by the Legislature of a State, or the Governor of a State, the Legislature not being in session; and the first section of the act which has been referred to is intended to carry out that provision of the Constitution. There is a very good reason for the distinction, and I beg leave here to state it.

The Congress of the United States has no right to interfere, of its own motion, in these matters of difficulty in the States. The Constitution gives Congress no such power. If it had the power, it might become a very uncomfortable mediator in a State; it might do things to which no State would be willing to submit. It is only, therefore, when called upon by the authorities of a State, that Congress has the right to interfere at all in order to put down domestic insurrection, or perform the other duties prescribed in that section.

The same reasoning does not apply to a Territory. A Territory is under the direction of the Government of the United States. The Governor of a Territory is under the direction of the President of the United States. He is appointed by him and may be removed by him at pleasure. How idle is it to talk about the similarity of the two cases, when the Governor of a Territory is nothing more nor less than the President of the United States! The President may direct his Governor to call upon him to suppress insurrection; and if the Governor refuses to do it he may turn out that Governor and appoint one who will apply to him to suppress insurrection or interfere in the affairs of the Territory!

The difference between a State and a Territory is, that one is independent in all its action of the Government of the United States, and the other is the mere creature of the Government of the United States, and dependent upon it. The very reason and foundation of the application which has been attempted to be made of the law that was passed to carry out that provision of the Constitution fails when you come to the case of a Territory. If you apply that reasoning to a Territory, the result is that you give the President power to call out the militia or Army of the United States whenever he sees fit; because the whole matter is under his control; he has the command of the territorial officers and may remove them at pleasure; and consequently, as I said before, he has only to call on his Governor (the Legislature not being in session) to state to him that the condition of the Territory is such as to require the intervention of the Federal Army, and then everything is under military domination, directed by the President of the United States, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States.

The honorable Senator from Michigan, therefore, will see his reasoning fails. The first section of the act, as I remarked, is drawn to carry out that provision of the Constitution, and that provision of the Constitution does not apply to Territories. It does not express the idea of its being intended to apply to a Territory. The language is "State," and "State" alone; and no act that is passed under and by virtue of it, applying it to a Territory, giving the same authority, could be constitutional. If found at all, the authority must be found under another provision of the Constitution, and that is the one immediately succeeding, in which it is made the duty of the President to execute the laws of the United States. I do not deny that under that provision, if the laws of the United States were resisted in a Territory, Congress might give the President power to use the militia, and power to use the Army where he could use the militia; because the Territories being subject to the laws of the United States, they being creatures, in their organization, of the statutes of the United States, so far as it becomes necessary to enforce these laws it is the President's duty to execute them; and if he has not the power, Congress may confer upon him by a statute the requisite authority to enforce these laws and to prevent their being obstructed. But the difficulty with reference to the use of the Army in Kansas is, that there is no authority given to the President specifically to use the Army for the purpose of preventing obstructions to the laws of the United States in Kansas, because the statute, as I remarked before—and I differ with the Senator there—does not in terms give it, because the second law simply changes the instrument which may be used, or rather gives the President power to use another instrument, but does not extend the contingencies in which force may be used as provided by the first law.

But behind that was the position which the Senator did not attempt to answer—that the law of the Territorial Legislature approved by the Governor, is not a law of the United States, and cannot be made so by any logic, unless the Congress of the United States pass it again, or indorse it in some way or other. Consequently there is no authority whatever in any of those laws, even on the construction given them by the Senator himself, to use the Army for the purpose of enforcing the territorial laws of Kansas. The Government was well aware of this when it gave direction that the military force must be used as a posse comitatus, under the direction of the civil power. Send two thousand five hundred men there as a posse comitatus! Who ever heard of such a thing as sending a regular army into a country to be used as the people of a county, for the purpose of enforcing the laws in a county? This may do very well to talk about; but anybody with half an eye can see that it is a mere evasion, and a clumsy evasion. It is using an army (which cannot be used legally) under the pretense of making a mere people of a county of it, to aid in enforcing civil process. If it were actually a posse comitatus, it should be called forth in a specific manner, not by the Governor of a State to enforce the laws of a State generally, but by the civil magistrate of a county to enforce the execution of a precept. That is not the mode in which it has been used. I say, therefore, that this idea of sending the Army to Kansas, and calling it a posse comitatus, and to be used as such, is merely for the purpose of accomplishing, by means of an evasion, what cannot be accomplished by virtue of any laws of the land, in any manner or to any extent.

These were the positions which I took in reference to this point the other day; and now the Senator does not differ so far from me about the construction to be put on Mr. Pierce's language. I did not undertake to say anything more than that President Pierce denied that he could volunteer to protect the purity of elections in Kansas; but President Buchanan does interfere, and does volunteer to do that very thing. There is the difference.

Mr. PUGH. The Senator does not understand that since that, there has been a demand from the Governor.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There has been a demand from the Governor of the Territory—for what purpose? To prevent insurrection?

Mr. PUGH. To execute the laws.

Mr. FESSENDEN. To execute what laws? The laws of the United States?

Mr. PUGH. The laws of the Territory.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Those are not laws of the United States, and the power cannot be furnished to execute the laws of the Territories legally. He has been called upon generally; but there has been no specific call upon the President asking him to furnish aid, for the purpose of stationing men about the ballot-boxes. That is an act which he volunteered himself in his instructions to Governor Walker when he sent him out there. He directed the Governor what to do in advance, before any call was made by the Governor. It comes back precisely to the same point I stated before, that Mr. Buchanan directs Mr. Buchanan to send troops into that Territory under the name of a posse comitatus whenever he chooses to do it, and on whatever pretense he chooses. It was a voluntary act on his part in the beginning. The germ which has grown up to this great violation of the law and the Constitution by sending such a large amount of troops, was contained in his instructions originally. He did it. Mr. Walker in calling for troops was only calling for aid to execute what the President had volunteered in the first place. I do not choose to defend Governor Walker, or accuse him; but when the honorable Senator from Mississippi the other day read that dispatch from him, in which he set forth those tremendous and awful difficulties at Lawrence, that they had actually formed a combination to make a city government and do divers and sundry other little things of that kind, and therefore that the aid of the Army was required to suppress insurrection, I thought the honorable Senator could hardly help laughing in his sleeve when he used that as an argument to justify the sending of such an amount of troops to Kansas!

Mr. DAVIS. I thought it rather a grave matter. The Executive of the United States was arraigned for sending troops there. I read from the dispatch from the executive officer of the Territory the call which was made on the Executive of the United States, and which justified him in keeping the troops there after, indeed, they had been destined for another service. It may be a laughing matter to the gentleman for a town to organize itself into an attitude of rebellion, for the Governor of a Territory to call on the President of the United States for military force, but it strikes me as rather grave, rather lamentable.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Rebellion! That is a new idea.

Mr. DAVIS. A new idea! You found it in the dispatch, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Find it in the dispatch! Because he calls it so, that does not make it so; and because the Senator chooses to call it so, and emphasises it, that does not make it so. Rebellion! Talk about rebellion because the inhabitants of a city organize a mere civil government for civic purposes to clean their streets, perhaps to light their streets, to have a little order, to resist no Government anywhere, United States, State, or territorial, but merely to conduct their own civic affairs! Rebellion against the Government indeed! That is like "constructive treason."

Mr. GREEN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GREEN. If the Senator will examine the attempted organization at Lawrence, which he calls a mere municipal organization for a city government, he will find that its purpose, its object expressly declared, was resistance to the law organizing the Territory, resistance to the laws that had been passed by the territorial authorities. They required every man to swear to support the Topeka constitution; and they called on their friends throughout the Territory to organize. They appointed a major-general by the name of Jim Lane, I think, who had his aids and his co-operators throughout. This formidable array, with these purposes, induced Governor Walker to call it rebellion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is nothing of that sort in Governor Walker's dispatch. What outside intelligence the Senator from Missouri may have, I do not know. I know that Governor Walker appeared to be very much excited about the matter.

Mr. GREEN. It is in the papers accompanying the dispatch.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have not seen it then.

Mr. GREEN. I have.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Even if it is, how do you make rebellion out of it? That is what I ask.

Mr. PUGH. Let me ask the Senator a question. Suppose a parcel of people in the city of Washington get together and make a city council and municipal government, and proceed to levy taxes without the authority of Congress or the present municipal corporation, what would he call that?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Suppose they levy taxes, but do not attempt to enforce them? Suppose the people are willing to pay them for their own purposes? Do you want troops to put them down?

Mr. PUGH. Suppose they carry on a city government here, what do you call it?

Mr. FESSENDEN. If it is done by consent of the people, and nobody objects, then it is in defiance of no proper authority.

Mr. PUGH. The Senator does not answer my question. What does he call such an organization?

Mr. FESSENDEN. What do I call it? I do not call it rebellion. Do you?

Mr. PUGH. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I should like to have the Senator find me a definition of rebellion in some law-book. Whom do they rebel against?

Mr. PUGH. Against the lawfully constituted government.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is nothing until there is an overt act. Was the meeting of the Topeka Legislature rebellion? They had formed a constitution, and they met to act on it; they met to pass laws.

Mr. PUGH. Allow me to answer. If they had attempted to put a single one of their laws in force, even a law simply to create a private corporation, it would have been rebellion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Undoubtedly, if they had done it by force; but these people proposed no such thing. It was a matter done by common consent in the city of Lawrence. They attempted to urge nothing on any man contrary to his will. They attempted to levy no taxes. All that was done was for mutual accommodation, and by mutual agreement. It was called for because the powers in authority were unwilling to see any organization there, unless it was an organization subject to their control. I say that the idea of calling out large bodies of troops to be stationed there on account of a matter of that simple description, was to me always an absurdity.

I repel the idea which the honorable Senator from Mississippi seems desirous to communicate with regard to us, that because we look upon a great many of these things which have been done in Kansas as ridiculous in themselves, we are therefore in favor of bloodshed and civil war, and all those horrible consequences which are to follow from that state of affairs which has been brought upon the country by attempting to force upon the people of Kansas institutions and laws which they reject. No, sir; do not impute it to us. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. IVERSON] said yesterday, that he was sorry any troops had ever been in Kansas; sorry that those border ruffians, as he did not call them, but as we call them, had not been left to wipe out the Abolitionists, as they would have done; and when my friend from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] replied, not that he was sorry, but stated the fact that if the troops had not been there, a different result would have followed, then the honorable Senator from Mississippi at once says, "now we see the motive of the opposition in opposing this bill; they desire civil war in Kansas." Is that the motive of the honorable Senator from Georgia?

Sir, there is only one state of things in which I shall expect civil war to arise in Kansas, and that is when you attempt to force on that people, by an overbearing power, institutions which they reject; a constitution from which they shrink; laws, in the making of which they have had no part. If that be attempted to be done by force,

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1858.

NEW SERIES....No. 30.

then, sir, I justify their exhibiting the spirit that was exhibited by their ancestors; and I trust in God that spirit is not yet extinct in this country of ours. I do not shrink from the accusation of being in favor of civil war, if it must come, whenever the necessity arises that calls for it. There is a point beyond which forbearance ceases to be a virtue in nations as well as in men; and when the time comes in this country that we cannot speak on certain things without being met with the accusation of desiring civil war, I, for one, tell you just when I am ready to meet it. Not that I desire or would call for it, or would not do everything that an honest man or a patriot could do to avoid it, but I should be unworthy the name of American citizen if I said that there could be no occasion when I should not be ready to meet the consequences.

Now, Mr. President, in order that I may not trouble the Senate again upon this subject, as I hope not to do, I wish to say a word in regard to the general subject before the Senate—the passage of this bill for the increase of the Army. I say, again, that I have listened and waited in the hope that from somebody I should hear a reason given for this increase of the Army. Some gentlemen have said that if an army is needed for Utah, to put down the Mormon rebellion, they are ready to vote whatever may be necessary. I have said that; and it has been urged in the Senate by some gentlemen that the increase is necessary for that purpose. Sir, I go to headquarters on that point. The Executive Government of the United States, in recommending the increase of the Army, has not said so. If it is necessary in order to put an end to the Mormon rebellion, let the President tell us so, and take the responsibility of it—not shrink from it, and call upon us on other grounds to increase the Army. No longer ago than yesterday, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs told us he did not put it on that ground because the Executive did not. Let us hear no more, then, about the Mormons. Let us wait for the recommendation of the Executive on that point. Let not anybody in the Senate, or out of it, accuse the minority here, so far as they act against this bill, of being unwilling to send aid to our army, and to send out as many troops as may be necessary to enforce the laws of the United States, in Utah and elsewhere, so long as the President does not tell us it is necessary, so long as the Secretary of War does not tell us so, so long as the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs tells us expressly that he does not put it on that ground, because it is not demanded on that ground; but tells us on the contrary that this Administration does not wish a temporary increase of the Army, but desires a permanent increase, not for Utah, for that is an occasional matter, but for other purposes.

I repeat what I said the other day, that if I understand anything about the course of legislation, when the executive Government comes before a Legislature and says it wants a large increase of the disposable military force of the country, it is not enough in my opinion to say, "we shall want these troops on account of Indians whom we are bound to control, and on account of the difficulty which exists in regard to emigration across the plains, and we want to fortify some military posts." Would not a military man when he demanded that, say: "I propose such and such matters as necessary; I must have so many troops at one point for one purpose, and I must have so many troops at another point for another purpose; I wish to have so many to execute the laws in one place, and so many," if he has the authority, "to execute the laws in another place," and give us the details, showing that the number we now have is not enough, and that more are required for those purposes, submitting to our judgment the details on which we may act? That is my trouble; and the answer I get still, after two or three days of discussion, is not a single detail of any particular number of troops wanted anywhere; but a general statement that the Indians on our frontier and the protection of the emigrant routes, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, require an addition of about seven thousand men to the disposable force of the Army. As I said before, that is not enough for me. If the Government really desire to carry this measure, and have an idea that it should meet with the approbation of the people of this country, and be sustained by any but a mere subservient Congress, that has neither the mind to comprehend what is needed by the country, nor the courage to speak their opinions upon it; if they address themselves to a Congress of independent men, ought they not to furnish us with the information if they have it?

I therefore must say still, as I said before, that I do not believe any more troops are needed. Why? For the reason that the Government will not tell us where they need them, or why they need them, with any particularity at all. I hold that, at this point in our history, situated as we are now, with the finances of the country in the state in which they are, with the people groaning under the burdens which are imposed on them for the support of the Government, with so large a portion of the people out of employment, and with no prospect of early employment, no man here is justified in voting to impose on them this great additional burden upon the mere statement of an opinion, when that opinion is not supported by a single fact or a single explanation. As was said by one of the papers in this city this morning, I should rather be disposed to believe that the real reason is not to be told, because the Government are unwilling to speak it; and it is that the Government wishes force enough to execute its own laws, and such other laws as its creatures may see fit to pass for any purposes whatever; and for those purposes I am not disposed to vote them.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, I wish to make one or two observations on some of the extraordinary propositions of the Senator from Maine; and I should not detain the Senate but that they have been iterated and reiterated so often that it seems to me necessary to notice them. In the first place, what was the character of this organization, or pretended organization, of a municipal government in the city of Lawrence? "Why," says the Senator, "it was simply a government to pass town ordinances, and clean the streets." So it was. That is all the government of the city of Washington is. That is all the business of the government of the city of New York. The simple question is, have they authority to establish a municipal government in defiance of the Territorial Legislature. Is it not the case of the Topeka, so-called, State Legislature? I say again, if that body calling itself a Legislature had attempted to put a single one of its laws in force, it would have been an overt act of treason. At the last Congress, I said, and said repeatedly, that the resistance of a single law of the United States, or the resistance of any given number of laws of the United States, did not amount to the crime of treason; but to resist the law-making power as a general proposition is the offense of treason.

What did Aaron Burr? Let us characterize it in the Senator's sneering manner; why he assembled a couple of hundred gentlemen at Blennerhassett's Island? What harm in that, the Senator may say. They marched and paraded, but it was a thing of consent. Mr. Burr proposed to set up a government in the southwest part of the country; but it was only a government over those who agreed to live under it. He proposed to make laws, but his laws were merely local. The essence of the matter is, that he proposed to set it up against the legitimate will of the sovereign, and that was the essence of this Lawrence business. Was it, as the Senator from Maine says, a mutual compact of individuals for their convenience? Why, sir, here is the alleged charter of the city of Lawrence. It sets out with the declaration that it is in defiance of the laws of the Territorial Legislature, in so many words:

"As the territorial government, however, in no sense represents the people of Kansas, was not elected by them, and can have no right to legislate for them, we cannot accept of a charter at its hands."

Can a defiance be more plain? They then authorize this government of theirs to levy taxes and to collect the taxes by the hands of officers whom they appointed. What more did the Dorr rebellion do, or did it do half so much, in Rhode Island?

Mr. SIMMONS. I beg to interrupt the Senator, and to state a fact for his Democratic consideration. We had a government within Rhode Island for more than sixty years, carried on by the negroes, who used to have regular elections every year, and they had a very nice time. They were very peaceable about it. They used to pass resolutions every year to tax themselves, and carry on all the forms of government; but the regular government of the State never thought of disturbing them.

But the Senator from Ohio asks what Mr. Dorr did. Mr. Dorr and his friends, in the first place, made a constitution, as I had occasion to show yesterday. They had a Legislative Assembly, two Houses of their own, and he went into that body under an escort of more than one thousand men under arms. They passed laws, appointed State officers, and organized a government in every respect. He asked what I thought the government of Rhode Island would do in case he did such things; and now I will tell the honorable Senator my answer, as a suggestion which may apply to this case, though I do not profess to be a lawyer. After they had voted down the constitution, we proposed to them—he met me; it was the last time I ever spoke to him, and here I may say that I always had a great opinion of his integrity, honor, and honesty—and he said: "Mr. SIMMONS what are you going to do now that you have lost your new constitution?" "Oh," said I, "we are going to live under the old one until we can get you to agree to let us have a better one." "Well," said he, "suppose we put our government in force, what do you mean to do, suppose we organize and have an election?" "Very well," said I, "go on; we shall not do anything. The free blacks have had elections for sixty years down in Wickford, and we will not pay any more attention to you than we do to the Wickford election, that takes place every year, and is published in the newspapers. Go ahead; we shall not trouble you." "Well," he replied, "suppose we pass laws, and execute them?" "Then," I answered, "we will shoot you just as soon as we would a black snake."

Mr. PUGH. The Senator and I agree exactly.

Mr. SIMMONS. But, let me tell you a little further: we have not quite come to the point yet. We did not disturb Mr. Dorr or his friends. They went on and organized their government; but we never took any notice of them until they erected fortifications on the borders of our State, and called in aid from other quarters. Then we said it was armed rebellion, and we went at them.

Mr. PUGH. And then you were right. That is what I say about this proceeding. As long as they met—as a simple debating society, calling themselves the Topeka Legislature—and expressed their sentiments under the title of laws, nobody cared twenty-five cents for them; they were of no more consequence than half a dozen gentlemen met out in a ten-acre field; but when they undertook to put a law of their making in force, then it became rebellion; and, as the Senator says, they ought to have been shot—at least some of them.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask the Senator from Ohio if there was any such overt act at Lawrence? If he can show me that there was, perhaps he and I may agree.

Mr. PUGH. The question is not whether they committed the overt act. The question is, whether they threatened to do it; but being warned not to do it, they then stopped. They were warned not to do it, and they paused on the threshold; but I say it was rebellion. If they had proceeded to put in force this charter and levy taxes, they would have committed an act of rebellion against the territorial authorities, which it would have been the duty of the Governor to subdue by force wherever he could get the power.

It is vain for Senators to inquire into what the avowed objects of the organization were. It is the fact of setting on foot the organization that made the offense. Have we not heard the Senate, for the last two or three weeks, implored to consider the iniquity of a few dozen or fifty gentlemen putting two or three guns on board a ship at Mobile or New Orleans, even if they never went to sea, but put them there with the intention of going out to the coast of Nicaragua to commit an offense? The Senator from Maryland said truly the offense was complete the moment the gun was put on board a boat with that intention. I admit these men did not commit the overt act; and they did not commit it because the Governor of the Territory warned them of the consequences. That is where they stopped; and that is where the Topeka Legislature stopped. As long as they keep themselves there, nobody will attach any importance to them; but I say, again, whenever that Legislature execute the threats which have been made in their name on this floor, to put their laws in force, they will find themselves, in less than six weeks, in the position of your friend Dorr.

I have one other observation to make; and that is as to the everlasting talk which we hear about the civil war that is to come in Kansas. It was begun the second day of this session; and I believe before God that the idea never entered the head of a man in Kansas until it went forth from this Chamber. On that day the Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] deplored the civil war that was to come; but he would justify it if it did come. A few days later the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] took it up; he, too, deplored the civil war that was to come; but he would justify it if it did come. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] yesterday entertained the Senate with a detailed account of the victories that would have been achieved if they had not been prevented. I do not understand that style of courage, and I do not appreciate it very highly. I prefer that men should speak by their deeds on these occasions, rather than their words. Those men who say what they would have done if somebody had not taken hold of them by the coat-tail, never struck me as very powerful soldiers. They remind me of the fop who is mentioned in Shakespeare, who was sent to call on Hotspur, and who, after having been entertained with the parade of war, and feeling somewhat in love with the business, declared——“that it was great pity, so it was,

That villainous salt-peter should be digg’d
Out of the bowels of the harmless earth!
Which many a good tall fellow had destroy’d
So cowardly; and, but for these vile guns,
He would himself have been a soldier.”

Now we have it from the Senator from Maine; he, too, deplores civil war; and he, too, would justify it. Sir, there is no emergency in the history of this Government that can justify civil war; and there is no emergency that can justify a representative of the people in this House, or in the other House, in so much as suggesting such a remedy as that to his fellow-citizens at either extremity of the Union. Sir, I trust the day will never come when that style of argument in this Chamber, or in the other, is to threaten members on the one side or the other that, if this be not done, or that be not forborne, civil war is to be the argument vouch’d in! I never wish to hear that raised in this Chamber again whilst I have the honor of a seat here. I do not think it is within the rules of order; I do not think it is a proper style in which a body of gentlemen should be addressed, whether in the Senate or out of it; and if I have any prayer on the subject, it is that those who invoke civil war may, if civil war should come, be its first victims.

Mr. SIMMONS. I would remind the Senator from Ohio that our Rhode Island people got the name of “Algerines” for pursuing pretty much the course he has suggested. We issued, I believe, half a dozen proclamations inviting our friends there to go home and mind their own business; but we did not disturb them at all until they erected a fort and pointed their guns at us, and people began to come in from other States, and then we concluded to drop our hoes, and go at them. Now, sir, I hope to have nothing more to say this session about that question or about civil war. I have not talked about civil war at all,

I believe, for I am not a fighter; I do not belong to that tribe.

But, sir, I desire to ask the Senator from Mississippi, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, a question in regard to the amendment which is pending. I desire to know what the purpose is of providing thirty new companies instead of enlarging the existing companies? I desire to know in order to satisfy myself, before I vote, whether the Government lacks officers or lacks men.

Mr. DAVIS. I will answer the Senator as well as I can; but I must premise that this is not a proposition of the Administration. I must follow that, too, with another suggestion to the Senator, that the committee does not represent the Administration, and that I am in no sense its organ. As chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, I thought I represented the Senate; and for the first time I now learn that, as chairman of a committee reporting a bill which was the conclusion of the committee, the Administration is to be held responsible for our conclusions, though they are different from the recommendations of the Administration, and that the committee is to explain what the Administration desire by a proposition which the Administration never submitted.

The Administration is entirely exempt from any responsibility for these thirty companies, except so far as it has asked for additional regiments. The committee, finding the request of the Administration to be, that Congress would furnish additional troops as a means of executing the duties with which the Executive is charged, and proposing to furnish the additional troops in a particular manner, have adopted, without, I believe, any dissent in the committee, the theory that the Administration was a proper judge of its wants; that in the absence of any proof that it had not the necessities which it asserted, we would proceed on the basis of supplying those wants. So far from finding any proof that the Administration do not need additional troops, our conclusion was that they do need them; and then we adopted a plan of supplying their wants different from that which the Administration suggested. Now, sir, I am trying to make the answer full; I wish to be understood; and if the Senator is satisfied with my answer as it stands, I will stop.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was merely going to say that I do not mean to question the propriety of the mode adopted, but I wish to get at the facts.

Mr. DAVIS. The opinion of the committee was, that the addition of the thirty companies would give the effective force to the Army, with power to raise the companies in particular service to a higher maximum than that now established by law. Every calculation which has been made by an opponent of the bill, has been based on the supposition that every company was to consist of ninety-six men. That is not the fact. Only in particular positions can they go up to ninety-six.

Then again it has been based on the supposition that every company was to be full. More than once I have stated that that is a supposition which cannot be verified in any actual condition, either of peace or of war. The numbers constantly sink. If they are filled up, the very next occurrence by discharge, death, or disability, reduces the effective force, and it goes down until another supply of recruits comes to fill it up to the maximum again. These thirty companies therefore will give not only greater efficiency by giving a greater number of integral parts, but will enable you to fill up a greater number of integral parts, and thus the loss will be less upon the whole than if you raise the maximum of particular companies and were not able thus to distribute it over a greater number of companies. The number of officers to be added will be three to each company, and that it was believed would increase the efficiency of the Army.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not intend to provoke discussion. I hope I said nothing offensive.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the Senator will believe I was not replying to him under the supposition that he had asked any question which he had not the right to ask, and which it does not give me pleasure to answer; but he puts me in a position in which I have been so often placed by others, and which is not my true one.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand. I thought from the observations of the Senator on former days, that he proposed these thirty companies with a view of rounding out the regiments to a certain number in each. For that reason I wanted to know whether there was a lack of subaltern officers, captains, and lieutenants, in the service now. If so, I should be more inclined to favor the proposition to add ninety officers of that description, because, though I do not take any responsibility of either opposing or promoting the views of the Administration, I should be willing to take a knowledge of the facts and circumstances on such a matter from them; as I suppose the committee did. I certainly did not suppose the Administration were responsible for the committee not going as the Administration requested them to do. I think my intellect is not quite so cloudy as that. But when I heard a proposition to add thirty companies, equal to three existing regiments, I wanted to compare it with the necessities of the Government, to see whether the necessity could not be supplied by adding men without officers. I had supposed that the want was of men to fill up the companies. We have skeleton regiments and skeleton companies, and I take it that making thirty more skeletons will not increase the Army much. I want to fill up the skeleton companies, if there is any service for them to do, and not pay for useless officers.

If the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs says that there are not companies enough, and that we should make the new officers, that is another question; but, as I understand all the speeches that have been made, (and I try to listen to them without intending to participate in the debate, and I do not think I should have got to talking again but for some of these questions about rebellion,) if we are now short about five thousand men, I cannot see, and I have heard nobody state, why the President, with his officers, cannot go on and recruit and fill up these companies and regiments. I do not profess to be a military man. It is as much as forty years since I was in the service.

Mr. JONES. I wish the Senate to proceed to the consideration of executive business; and with that view, I move to postpone the further consideration of this question until to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will give way for that motion.

Mr. JONES. Then I move to postpone this subject until to-morrow.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the Senator please to withdraw it one moment? I will renew the motion for him.

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. HOUSTON. I believe we shall not have time to get through with the bill to-night. I was anxious to dispose of it to-day in order to accommodate the honorable chairman; but I have no expectation that we shall. I think it is but justice to him that we should dispose of it as soon as we possibly can. I wish to make some remarks on it myself. I propose if there be no disposition made of it, that it be postponed to Monday at one o'clock; or left as the unfinished business of to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It goes over and takes its appropriate place on the Calendar, if nothing further be done.

Mr. HOUSTON. I believe we have agreed to adjourn over until Monday.

Mr. JONES. I renew my motion to go into executive session.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I hope if this bill is to go over, we shall rescind the order for adjourning to Monday, so as to finish it to-morrow. I feel it my duty to insist on a vote on the proposition to take up the Minnesota bill, and yet I do not wish to do it in opposition to the Army bill.

Mr. JONES. I believe my motion has precedence. A motion to go into executive session is a privileged one.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas now is entitled to the floor. The Senator from Iowa had the floor, but he yielded it to the Senator from Texas, who said he would renew the motion for an executive session.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not wish to deny any courtesies to the gentleman, but I thought the plan I suggested was the best for the purpose of getting rid of this subject, as we cannot dispose of it to-night. But I am perfectly willing to have the question taken on the motion to reconsider the vote on adjourning over; and if the Senate go into executive session I take it for granted they will do it in consideration of the motion suggested by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. There is no motion for an executive session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas has renewed the motion.

Mr. JONES, (To Mr. DOUGLAS.) You can make your motion afterwards.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But I can enter my motion now. I move to reconsider the vote by which we agreed to adjourn over to Monday.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I have a motion which I think will take precedence. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. JONES called for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn; and they were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What will be the effect of the adjournment with the motion to reconsider pending?

Mr. HAMLIN. It will cut it off.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If we adjourn now, will it be until to-morrow or Monday?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The adjournment, if made now, will be to Monday.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 31, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Biggs, Bigler, Broderick, Brown, Chandler, Clay, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Evans, Fessenden, Fitch, Foot, Foster, Green, Hamlin, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, King, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Simmons, Toombs, Trumbull, and Yulee—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Benjamin, Davis, Douglas, Harlan, Iverson, Sebastian, Seward, Stuart, Wade, Wilson, and Wright—11.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 28, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. W. A. HARRIS.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER stated that the first business in order was the call of committees for reports, and that reports were in order from the Committee of Elections.

Mr. PHELPS. Debate has been closed on the bill pending in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union at half past one o'clock to-morrow; and, as many gentlemen desire to speak, I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope that motion will not prevail; but that we shall have a morning hour.

MOTION TO RECONSIDER.

Mr. BOCK. Before the question is taken, I wish to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House adopted the resolution offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] yesterday, to allow the contestant in the Ohio contested-election case a seat upon this floor. I do not ask action on the motion now; but merely to have it entered.

The following is the resolution referred to by Mr. Bock:

Resolved, That Clement L. Vallandigham have leave to occupy a seat upon the floor of this House, pending the discussion of the report of the Committee of Elections on the case of his contest for the seat now occupied by Lewis D. Campbell, from the third congressional district of the State of Ohio, and that he have leave to speak to the merits of said contest, and the report thereon.

EXTENSION OF DEBATE.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the subject-matter of the bill that is now pending in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union has not yet been discussed in committee at all, except in the explanation made by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS]; and I would suggest that, as a discussion of that bill seems to be desirable, the time be prolonged. I move that the time for debate be extended until three o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent, as a resolution has been adopted fixing half past one o'clock to-morrow as the hour for closing debate, and a motion to reconsider has been made and laid upon the table.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. It is a very good commentary, sir, upon the operation of the present rule.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not make any objection to that; but I would like to append to that motion a condition that a certain portion of the time shall be allowed for the discussion of the bill itself, and that it shall not all be taken up in general debate.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I would prefer the gentleman's proposition to my own; and if the House would make an order to confine the debate to the pending question, I would not ask for any extension of time. It was only in order that we might have an hour or two for the discussion of the pending bill that I suggested an extension of time.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not object to prolonging the time at all. All I wish is some guarantee that the bill will be discussed. It is one that ought to be discussed in its provisions and details, and I hope there will be no objection to setting apart the last three or four hours to a discussion of the merits of the bill, all other discussion being out of order.

Mr. PHELPS. I have no objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL], as modified by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON], as I have no desire to prevent the discussion of the question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama proposes that the proposition to extend the time for closing debate shall be further modified, so that all debate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on House bill No. 202, shall be confined strictly to the discussion of the merits of the bill.

Mr. COMINS. I object to that.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object to the extension of the debate if it is not to be confined to the subject of the bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. Perhaps the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COMINS] will accept a modified form of the proposition: that is, to extend the time till three o'clock to-morrow, and to confine the last three hours to the discussion of the merits of the bill. Just give us some time to discuss the bill. I will take that rather than nothing.

The SPEAKER. The proposition, as modified, is that the debate to-morrow, in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, shall be confined to the question under debate.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Is not that the rule of the House now? All that is necessary is to have the rule enforced. It is not necessary to make another rule on the subject, if the chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union would do his duty.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the 30th rule.

The rule was read, as follows:

"30. When any member is about to speak in debate, or deliver any matter to the House, he shall rise from his seat, and respectfully address himself to 'Mr. Speaker,' and shall confine himself to the question under debate, and avoid personality."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask that the 133d rule be now read.

The rule was read, as follows:

"133. The rules of proceedings in the House shall be observed in a Committee of the Whole House, so far as they may be applicable, except the rule limiting the times of speaking; but no member shall speak twice to any question, until every member choosing to speak shall have spoken."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Now, if these two rules be enforced in the Committee of the Whole, every member addressing the committee will be confined to the subject-matter under debate.

Mr. HOUSTON. That rule has been construed—always against my vote, I admit—in this way: that, in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the state of the Union generally being under consideration, we may discuss everything except the matter truly before the committee; and, in view of that construction of the rule on the part of previous Congresses, I have proposed this modification. If the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union will administer the rule as it is understood by my friend from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS], and my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES], and as it is understood by myself, there would be no necessity for the order that I suggest.

Mr. GROW. I presume that there will be certainly no objection to the extension of the debate as proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL], with this condition; that on to-morrow the debate on this bill shall be confined to the bill, and that for to-day the debate shall go on as it has gone.

Mr. HOUSTON. There is no objection to that.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I want the debate confined to the subject all the time. I think, if it be so confined, that the time for debate is long enough.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to the extension of the time?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Yes, sir.

The question was taken on Mr. PHELPS's motion; and it was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, (Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the

PRINTING DEFICIENCY BILL.

Upon which Mr. SHAW, of Illinois, was entitled to the floor.

Mr. SHAW, of Illinois. I do not expect, Mr. Chairman, that by the remarks which I purpose to submit, I will alter the mind of this committee on the subjects that have been under debate for some time past. I witnessed, with no degree of pleasure, the existence of a feeling between the members on my left and those on my right, on the subject of the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution.

Mr. BURNETT. I rise to a question of order. My question of order is this: The gentleman has clearly indicated that it is not his intention to confine himself to the discussion of the question under consideration. Hence he is not in order, the rule of the House requiring him to speak to the bill. I desire that this rule shall be enforced, and I prefer to make the point on a gentleman on this side of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would remark that, if the question were presented for the first time, the Chair would be inclined to sustain the question of order; but understanding that a different practice has been universal in this House, the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BURNETT. I appeal from the decision of the Chair. I have been a member of the House in the last Congress, as well as in the present, and have watched, with a great degree of interest, discussions on this floor, and I am opposed, not only now, but I have been all the time, to the manner of discussion. Members occupy the time of the House in the making of speeches for home consumption. We do not confine ourselves to the questions before us for legislative action. We rise in our places and consume, day after day, the time that ought to be employed in the public business, in the discussion, very often, of mere abstract questions, requiring no legislative action at all. That is wrong. It is time that the House should put an end to it, and that members should be made to confine themselves to the legitimate matter before the body. That will not be done until the rules of the House be enforced by the members themselves.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Is debate in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that this question is not debatable.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I wish to have the rule read, under which the Chair decides that the question is not debatable.

The 34th rule was read, as follows:

"If any member, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any member may, call to order; in which case, the member so called to order shall immediately sit down, unless permitted to explain; and the House shall, if appealed to, decide on the case; but without debate: if there be no appeal, the decision of the Chair shall be submitted to. If the decision be in favor of the member called to order, he shall be at liberty to proceed; if otherwise, he shall not be at liberty to proceed, in case any member object, without leave of the House; and if the case require it, he shall be liable to the censure of the House."

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that you are neither the Speaker of this House, nor is this the House proper. We are in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The rule applies directly, both in its terms and construction, to the House proper.

Mr. BURNETT. I call the attention of the gentleman to the 134th rule, which makes the rules of the House apply to a Committee of the Whole, as far as they are applicable.

The 134th rule was read, as follows:

"134. The rules of proceedings in the House shall be observed in a Committee of the Whole House, so far as they may be applicable, except the rule limiting the times of speaking—but no member shall speak twice to any question, until every member choosing to speak, shall have spoken."

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit that by the uniform practice of the House in committee, the construction of that rule has been to allow the widest latitude of debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BURNETT. I rise to a question of order. I am entitled to the floor, if the question is debatable. If it is not, then I yield the floor and call for the question.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I cannot allow the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] to go without a word of reply. He says it has been the uniform practice of the House to allow the widest latitude of debate in committee. Now, sir, I have never known the point to be made, and the position taken by the gentleman from Illinois to be sustained. The speeches upon subjects other than that before the committee, have been gotten in usually by saying that somehow or other the subject-matter of debate was connected with the appropriation bill under consideration.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. If the gentleman will allow me, I desire to say that my statement of the uniform practice of the House did not refer to the decisions made when the point was raised, but to the fact that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred it has been, by unanimous consent, so construed; and it has been considered almost a matter of discourtesy, when a gentleman had previously obtained the floor with the understanding that he was not to speak upon the question before the committee, to attempt to cut him off by a question of order.

Mr. BURNETT. I am entitled to the floor until it shall have been decided whether this question is debatable or not. But I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that it was not from any want of courtesy to his colleague, upon my part; certainly not. But, sir, I desire that the merits of this deficiency bill shall be discussed. I believe it is wrong, and should not be passed in its present shape. There are gentlemen here who desire to discuss that bill, who have not been able to obtain the floor. The result will be that the debate will be closed, and we shall be called upon to vote on this important bill without its having been discussed, and without understanding it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I would suggest to the gentleman, then, that he withdraw his question of order upon the gentleman from Illinois, who obtained the floor with the understanding that he was to speak upon another subject, and give notice that he will make the point upon the next gentleman who obtains the floor, and then whoever obtains the floor will take it with that understanding.

Mr. BURNETT. Very well, then I will withdraw my objection so far as the gentleman from Illinois is concerned, and give notice that I shall insist on the rule being enforced in future. I withdraw my appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. I renew the appeal. I want the question decided.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask for tellers on the appeal.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to withdraw his appeal so far as the gentleman from Illinois is concerned. The gentleman yesterday obtained the floor with the understanding that the same courtesy was to be extended to him that has been extended to other gentlemen in committee. I protest against applying a new rule to him under these circumstances.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. I will withdraw my appeal for the present.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

Mr. SHAW, of Illinois. I have no desire to make a speech upon this floor for home consumption. I have no wish to make any remarks here for the people of my district. They know very well the position which I occupy upon the question to which I shall direct my remarks. Still, sir, I was unwilling to sit a silent observer of the course of action upon the part of this House, lest some individual not so well acquainted with that position might mistake my silence. I have not supposed for a moment that I should be able, by any argument I may make, to change the opinions of any member on this floor. Still, sir, I regard this Kansas question as one of vital importance to the country, and one which is intimately connected with the welfare of the country and the perpetuity of our institutions.

I have heard much said by southern gentlemen and by northern gentlemen, the one class known as fire eaters, and the other known as Abolitionists or Black Republicans. Sir, I regard them both with the same esteem. I regard one as no better than the other. In other words, I regard such parties, whether at the North or South, wherever they are to be found, who advocate the dissolution of this Union, with the same contempt. We have no disunionists in that part of the country from whence I hail. I wish to say to this House, that we have no Lovejoys there; no man who loves to steal a negro, or who will feel joy that he has escaped from his rightful owner. We stand by the Constitution and by all the provisions of law which govern us as a nation. We have no private construction to place upon the laws. I regard them as the great bond of brotherhood, and the rule which should govern every man as a citizen of the Republic in his action.

Sir, when I heard the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DAVIS] the other day talk of visiting the North with fire and sword, I looked round to see where the blow would fall. Sir, I presume the North and South of this Republic are made of very much the same material, and that if you were to change the positions of the two sectional parties—if you were to take the Abolitionists South and bring the fire-eaters North, I have no doubt that the fire-eaters would make northern Abolitionists, and the Abolitionists would become southern fire-eaters. As I have already remarked, I regard them both with the same esteem, and must say that I have not found it in my heart to fall in love with either of these parties.

But, sir, I will not attempt to fortify the position I have taken in regard to Kansas and the Lecompton constitution. That has been done by abler minds than mine. That has been done upon this floor by some of the ablest men that grace this Hall. It no longer stands as a problem requiring solution. It has become an axiom. I undertake to say that the people of Kansas have not had a fair opportunity of indorsing or rejecting that constitution. In other words, no fair opportunity has been given them to make their voice heard in making the law under which, by that constitution, they are called upon to live.

Sir, Governor Walker tells us that in that Territory there are about thirty-four counties entitled to vote under the territorial law. Fifteen counties were never assessed—no registry was ever taken; and that in nineteen counties the people had no opportunity to vote. Consequently, fifteen out of the thirty-four counties of that Territory never had an opportunity to cast a single vote for or against the delegates to that convention.

Then, sir, it is a well known, and, I believe, indisputable fact, that the individuals who were delegates to frame that constitution pledged themselves upon the stump, before the people of the Territory, that that constitution, when made, should be submitted to a vote of the people. Sir, that has not been done. In that they have played false. In that, sir, they have proved themselves unworthy to represent the people of Kansas, or the people of any other Territory, in a constitutional convention. I ask, and those with whom I act only ask, that truth shall prevail, and that justice shall be done. We care not—I think I can speak for those with whom I act as well as for myself—whether Kansas be a free or a slave State; but we insist that the people shall decide that matter for themselves. That, sir, is the voice of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. Who will undertake to say that we shall vote for the Lecompton constitution—a constitution which has not been made by the people—a constitution which they have had no opportunity to indorse? Never. Where, sir, is the man so mean that he would submit for a moment, be he Republican or fire-eater? Where is the man in this Republic, North or South, who would submit for a moment to live under a law forced upon him, as this constitution is attempted to be forced upon the people of that Territory? The men who have gone to that Territory have gone there with the same natural and political rights, and the same intelligence they possessed here. And never, sir, will I indorse any constitution which shall not be submitted to a fair vote of the people of that Territory.

Mr. Chairman, have these people had an opportunity, in the language of the Kansas bill, to form and regulate their own domestic institutions in their own way? I must beg to differ with the Executive of this country on this subject, and I will say it affords me no gratification to do so. He seems to admit that as regards other Territories, which are hereafter to come into the Union as States, this principle should be applied—that it should be applied hereafter. Well, sir, hereafter is the next moment. I am for applying the principle now, whenever the question shall be submitted to us.

I feel, Mr. Chairman, that we have strength upon this floor sufficient to enable us to reject this constitution. I do not know whether I may be mistaken or not on this point, but I have indulged the hope that we have moral strength and numerical strength too, to reject that constitution which we cannot help believing to be wrong. I repeat that it is a matter of no difference to me whether Kansas shall be a free or a slave State. I do not look upon the institution of slavery with that holy horror which seems to sit like a nightmare upon some gentlemen from the North. For myself, I have no hesitation in saying, of the two million five hundred thousand or three million of slave population of the South, that nowhere upon the face of the globe can be found a like number of negroes better clothed and fed, and enjoying so much happiness. I shall pick no quarrel with the man who has made the discovery that Sambo and Dinah are his equals—I rather incline to the belief that he is right—I am willing for all such men to select their company. But, sir, we have no gentlemen in my section entertaining any such opinions of the negro.

It is idle, sir, for southern men to talk about the fire and the sword. It is all idle. The people North and the people South are not willing to follow any leader who starts upon a crusade against either. We are a great family of people. There are spots which have been made holy in our memories both North and South; made sacred, sir, by the chivalry and patriotism of our forefathers, of our common ancestors. And where is the ruthless hand that would sever this glorious Union? Where is the magnanimous leader who would start with the sword and the flaming brand against any portion of our common country? For what? Because, forsooth, they differ about the negro question. Ridiculous idea. Let us take care of ourselves, and in doing so we will also take care of the negro. I will not attempt to quote Scripture, as some gentlemen have done upon this floor, to justify the harboring of runaway slaves or the right to hold slaves. I have seen both sides appeal to that sacred book, and I think it hardly supported either; they had better consult the Constitution and laws under which we live, and under which the fathers and founders of our happy country lived, exemplifying in their lives a marked devotion to this Union, and respecting the institutions and laws, which they understood as well as, if not better than, any of their descendants.

Sir, in the canvass of 1856, this Kansas question was fairly before the people. We all know with what bitterness the Democratic party was attacked throughout the Northwest. We all know how the Abolitionists and the Know-Nothings, how all the factions and ends of parties joined against the Democratic party. We know that we had to contend against all the prejudices created by the able speakers in the ranks of the opposition. In that great war of words, in that hard fought contest, the Democratic party was sustained.

Sir, the great apostle of American liberty—that man who is called a "giant," not, I take it, on account of his physical size, but because he has a mind that is gigantic in its proportions—that man whom we all love, and who stood fearlessly by the repeal of the Missouri compromise, has advocated upon every stump in the North, the South, the East, and the West, the doctrines which we advocate here to-day: that the people shall have the right in all the Territories to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way. Sir, that man was refused a hearing in his own State. Thank God! it was not in the southern portion of the State. It was not in that portion of Illinois where we have been in the habit of voting for "Old Hickory," but it was in that other portion, where it is said that although death had slain her thousands, none would have knocked at the door of the happy abode; the people there are wrong in this world, and will be wrong in the other, notwithstanding the large number of their preachers.

Sir, in their efforts to overturn Democratic principles, and to obtain power in this country, the pulpit has been desecrated—not the Bible; there is no Bible about it—but the pulpit. These hypocrites dare to hold the Bible in one hand and their politics in the other. They have disgraced the mantles which they have assumed. I have no words to express my contempt for the man who, under his sacred garb, quits the service of his Savior on high, and goes down into the dirty pool of Abolition politics to sway the destinies of this country by making war upon the institutions of the South. A friend near me suggests Sharpe's rifles. Sir, the doctrine is more deadly than any rifle. It is a doctrine which, if carried out, would sap the very foundations of the Republic. The safety of this country depends on the triumph of the Democratic party; it is the conservative party of this country, and I am grieved to see that that party is not a unit upon this Kansas question. It is a question of principle, not of power. As I said before, it makes no difference to my constituents whether Kansas be made a free State or a slave State; but we do say, that the people of that Territory have the right, and should have the liberty, of voting upon the constitution, and making the laws under which they are to live. That right has never been secured to them; and it appears from speeches which we have heard here, that it is the intention of a party in this House to deprive the people of that great and inestimable right.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I would ask the gentleman if the people of Kansas had not an opportunity of voting for the election of delegates to the convention that framed the constitution?

Mr. SHAW, of Illinois. No, sir; I tell the gentleman they had no such opportunity, and I refer the gentleman to an authority which I suppose he will not be prepared to dispute. I read from a letter of Governor Walker:

"On reference to the territorial law under which the convention was assembled, thirty-four regularly organized counties were named as election districts for delegates to the convention. In each and all of these counties it was required by law that a census should be taken and the voters registered; and when this was completed, that delegates to the convention should be apportioned accordingly. In nineteen of these counties there was no census, and therefore there could be no such apportionment there of delegates, based upon such census; and in fifteen of these counties there was no registry of voters. These fifteen counties, including many of the oldest organized counties of the Territory, were entirely disfranchised, and did not give, by or by fault of their own, could not give, a solitary vote for delegates to the convention."

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Will the gentleman allow me just to make a word of explanation to the House upon that very point. There were nineteen counties, as the gentleman states; but if he will look into the question he will see that fifteen of those counties were attached to organized counties, and that in the four other counties the revolutionists of Kansas refused to allow the census to be taken or the voters to be enrolled. They drove out the sheriff and commissioners, and refused to allow the census to be taken. That is the fact. Fifteen of those nineteen counties of which the gentleman speaks had no population, or very little, and they were attached to organized counties. In the four which were not so attached, these very Abolitionists, and I will say revolutionists, refused to allow the law to be executed; and now their friends come here and lay hold of that circumstance as the reason for their tirades against law and order!

Mr. SHAW, of Illinois. I have quoted the statement of the indorsed Governor of the Territory; and as the gentleman makes a question of veracity between himself and that Governor, I will leave it to those two gentlemen, and to the reputation they may have in this House, to decide the question as to which is right. I am not here as a juror to sit upon that question.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Let me remind the gentleman from Illinois that there is no question of veracity. The statement which the gentleman has read is not inconsistent with my explanation.

Mr. GROW. I ask permission of the gentleman from Illinois to correct a misunderstanding.

Mr. SHAW, of Illinois. No, sir. I am a new hand at this matter of speaking; I feel very much out of place, and therefore decline to yield.

I have a word to say now about the Know Nothing party of the country, which has been liberal in its effort to break down the Democratic party; but in that effort it has most signally failed. I do not know exactly where that party hails from, or who has the paternity of that distinguished order. They appear to be the children of darkness. They took their positions first, I believe, in midnight caucuses. But they have grown into a party—a party who, like the Pharisee of old, thank God that they are not like other men. Well, sir, I thank God that we of the Democratic party are not like them; so we are even in compliments.

Sir, I can never indorse the principles of that party, so long as I remember the names and deeds of such men as La Fayette and De Kalb; never, while I recollect the name of Shields, a foreigner who is soon to adorn the Senate of the Republic, who, in the hour of our country's peril, stood foremost in her defense; never, while I recollect that the blood of foreigners has been poured out liberally upon our battle-fields, North and South. Upon the plains of Mexico the gallant Shields pressed forward and laid bare his bosom in defense of this land; he was a shield for the friends of the Republic; and shall we now turn round and say that we are not willing that he and those like him, shall participate in the Government of this nation? The people of the young State from which he hails have done themselves honor, and shown their good sense by selecting him as their representative in the Senate of the United States.

I have heard it whispered, sir, that Government patronage and power—the power of the throne—is to be brought to bear to affect the determination of this Kansas question here. I, sir, have nothing to fear upon that score. It cannot affect anybody in my section of the country. Dollars are, to us, matters of no consequence. With us principles are everything. Threats, or promises, or bribes, or hopes of reward, have no influence, I believe, on the votes that will be cast on this subject from the great Northwest. New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, have executive patronage equal, I believe, to that of all the other States. It has been the misfortune of the western States not to have been known in the distribution of patronage in the city of Washington. They are known, however, whenever the alarm of war sounds. Then the chivalry of the West is known and recognized. Then, I take it, the North and the South, the East and West, are all ready to join to defend the liberties and interests of the country.

But is it fair, I ask, that Kansas should go over, without a struggle, either to the Republican party or to the slavery party? How does either of them become entitled to it? We acquire territory either by the common treasure or by the common blood. It belongs to the North and South. Both sections supply the great column that drives back the enemy; and when the battle is won and the territory is acquired, is it for the South to say: "Now, my good fellow of the North, you have fought the good fight; you have helped us to obtain a territory that will make two or three States; you have fought well; your brothers' blood enriches the soil of this country; go home; we indorse you as a good soldier; but when we come to fill up this territory with happy homes, we claim it for the South?" And would it not be equally unjust and ridiculous for the North to say as much to the South? Whatever attacks are made by the clergy, North or South, on the Supreme Court of the United States, fall harmless upon that body. I can add nothing, by words of mine, to the luster of that body, which stands high above any attack that may be made upon it, either on this floor or by the clergy North or South.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I understand the gentleman from Illinois to say that attacks were made on the Supreme Court by ministers of the Gospel at the North and at the South. I desire him to state distinctly where any ministers of the Gospel in the southern States have attacked the Supreme Court or made political speeches.

Mr. SHAW. No, sir; the gentleman has misunderstood me. I said that if any attacks were made on the Supreme Court, by the clergy of the North or of the South—not that any had been made. And I will say that I am not aware that any such attack has been made in the South. But I will tell the gentleman what the South does do. It attacks the principles of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. It attacks the right of the people of Kansas to settle their domestic policy for themselves. It attacks that great principle which lies at the foundation of human rights and popular sovereignty. It says: "Let Kansas take position among the States of the Union, under the Lecompton constitution." In doing so, sir, you perpetrate a fraud upon the people of that Territory. They have never indorsed that constitution. It is not the will of the people. They have never signed the note, and will never pay it.

Now, sir, there is a Free-Soil party in this country. I am glad to say that I have no sympathy with it. They are not so much for free-soil as for a kind of free-nigger soil. They are not satisfied that the soil of the country should be free to white people, but they want it partitioned also with the free negroes. And yet they are not in favor of the free negro coming among themselves; all that they want is that there shall be no more slave States. I shall not join them in that sentiment. I say, in the language of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, let the people decide the question for themselves. That is the Democratic doctrine. And whether under it a Territory becomes a free State or a slave State, I do not care a straw. Our people are pure Democrats. They have no sentiments at war with that assertion. Let the people decide the question for themselves. Let slave State after slave State come in, or let free State after free State come in and join this Confederacy, as their people may decide. We are satisfied, and care not whether it be slave or free.

Mr. COMINS obtained the floor, and commenced his remarks which follow, but was interrupted by—

Mr. BURNETT, who said: I rise to a question of order. The point of order which I now make on the gentleman from Massachusetts is the same as that which I made on the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SHAW,] that he is not speaking to the question under consideration.

Mr. COMINS. The gentleman cannot have ascertained that fact at this early stage of my remarks.

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir; even at this early stage. But it is very easy to decide it. I appeal to the gentleman to say if it is his intention to discuss the subject properly before the committee?

Mr. COMINS. I intend to avail myself of the privileges that have been granted to others who have preceded me.

Mr. BURNETT. Very well; then I make the point of order that the gentleman should be confined to the question under discussion.

Mr. GROW. The gentleman raises a point of order which is against the universal practice of the House, as we all know.

Mr. BURNETT. I understood the Chair to decide that the question is not debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order of the gentleman from Kentucky, and decides that it is not debatable.

Mr. BURNETT. Then I appeal from the decision of the Chair; and ask for tellers.

Mr. GROW. Is the appeal debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the appeal is not debatable.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Will the Chair state to the committee the subject-matter now before it?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I will read the title of the bill. It is a bill appropriating money to supply deficiencies for printing—

Mr. GIDDINGS. I did not ask the gentleman. I asked the Chair to state to the committee what is the subject under consideration by this committee?

The CHAIRMAN. I will answer. It is the state of the Union generally, and especially House bill No. 202.

The Chair overruled the question of order made by the gentleman from Kentucky. From that decision the gentleman from Kentucky appeals. The question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Mr. HUGHES. I wish to inquire of the Chair if, upon a question of this sort, the uniform parliamentary usage of a body is not the law?

Mr. BURNETT. I object to discussion.

Mr. COMINS. I insist that this discussion shall not come out of my time.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BUFFINTON, and WRIGHT of Georgia, were appointed.

The question, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?" was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 105, noes 43.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. HOUSTON. I again propose a compromise upon this matter.

Mr. BLISS. I object; and insist that the gentleman from Massachusetts shall be allowed to proceed with his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor.

[A message in writing was here received from the President of the United States, by the hands of JAMES BUCHANAN HENRY, the President's Private Secretary.]

Mr. COMINS. A little more than a year ago, in obedience to the requirements of the Constitution, and in conformity to law, the American people gave their suffrages for a chief Executive Magistrate of the Union. A powerful minority, though conscious that the principles upon which they had battled for power were the principles of the Constitution, and as the only representatives of those principles victory should have crowned their efforts, gracefully yielded to the majesty of the people. True to their devotion to the Constitution and the Union, they not only yielded to the expressed will of the majority, but were ready to give their strength and support to every measure promotive of the best interest of the country, not in violation of the principles of constitutional liberty.

A year has passed away!—what an eventful one. In the walks of business—what an eventful one; so fraught with disaster and sadness, blighted hopes and ruined fortunes! For a brief period of executive rule—what an eventful one! for overflowing coffers, a bankrupt and beggarly Treasury; for comparative peace in the Territory, civil war; for the support of long-tried and devoted friends and statesmen, opposition; for a united and harmonious Democracy, an exasperated and rebellious South, and an alienated and indignant North; for high hopes, broken pledges and violated honor!

As I quietly but carefully listened to the annual message of the President of the United States, when it was read by the Clerk of the House, I conceived it to be one of the most extraordinary papers which ever emanated from the Executive of the nation: remarkable for its apparent frankness, whilst deception is stamped upon its most important features; remarkable, too, for the extraordinary propositions which it contains. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury, though none the less able, though none the less remarkable, is as far from being ingenious.

But it was readily to be seen that, owing to the financial condition of the country, the condition of the Territories, the unsettled condition of foreign affairs, and events which were so rapidly multiplying themselves, both of these extraordinary documents would be received by the people and the press with great charity. It was as readily to be seen that documents so much at fault—at fault in fairness; at fault in facts; at fault in history; and at fault in democracy too—would in due time be reviewed and criticised with the utmost severity.

Other and abler hands have gone into a general review of the position of the Administration, exposed its fallacies, its inconsistencies, and its tergiversations. Those topics which have so long and justly been the theme of orators, have been seized upon eagerly, but naturally, as the basis of much of the discussion which has thus far taken place in this House. While I will not yield to any of my associates upon this floor in devotion to those great principles of freedom which form the basis of our republican government, I prefer, in the present exigency, to profit by my fortune in obtaining the floor at this time to say a few words upon the financial policy of the Administration, as laid down in the message of the President, with reference to its loan or Treasury note bill, and its recommendation of a radical, compulsory bankrupt law, applicable to all banking institutions throughout the United States.

Upon the subject of a proper and well-guarded bankrupt law for the relief of the people, I shall not speak at this time. I find nothing upon that subject in the message of the President. But I trust a measure of this kind will be introduced at an early day, at least for the consideration of this House.

One of the most extraordinary features of the message of the President is the wide difference between that which it recommends for himself, the Government, the Treasury, and that which he recommends for the country, the States, the people. It was at once to be seen, on reading the message of the President and the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the Administration was severely exercised; the Treasury was embarrassed. As a business man, I appreciated the condition of the Treasury, and I would not, by my voice or by my vote, willingly contribute to its embarrassment.

The President asked for relief; the Secretary of the Treasury asked for relief. I find no fault with them for that; it was, in my opinion, the imperative duty of the Administration to do so. It was, as I thought, as clearly the duty of Congress to respond to the wants of the Treasury. And, in accordance with my convictions of duty, and in accordance with my judgment, I voted, as the yeas and nays will show, for such relief as the Administration desired. The measure of relief asked for being a temporary one, I did not so much care about its form. I could not fail to sustain a measure so absolutely necessary to relieve the Treasury from its embarrassment and restore and maintain the integrity of the Government.

Though opposed to the issue of Treasury notes as a currency, I could not refuse to sustain the Treasury note bill, as it came from the Senate, as a measure of expediency. It was, I will admit, like the financial policy of the Democratic party, its foreign policy, its interior policy, and its every other policy—neither one thing nor the other. It was so near a loan bill that the friends of a loan in preference to an issue of Treasury notes might have supported it; and it was so near a bank of issue that the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRIS] thought he saw signs of a return to a United States bank in it. It being of a temporary character, I gave it my vote to relieve the Treasury. Many were deterred from supporting the bill because of the inconsistency of the President in recommending one thing for the Government and another thing for the State banks. Others voted against it on those general principles respecting currency which they are known to entertain, and which they have maintained for many years; others, who, from their long devotion to a hard-money policy, have come to believe that such a system was about to be adopted. But, Mr. Chairman, these hard-money Democrats in my section of the country are the greatest devotees to the paper money banks to be found in the State. They become stockholders, directors, and presidents, and from some cause manage to keep out the largest circulation, and pay the largest dividends. They are worthy citizens and popular men.

Mr. Chairman, if the President, instead of spending so much time and ink in defaming the State banks and the moneyed institutions of the States, had devoted some time, some space, and some study, to an honest and faithful investigation into the real condition of the country and the Treasury, and the means by which the people were to be relieved from their present unhappy and embarrassed condition; and, with the frankness of a statesman, had adduced some facts, some evidence, and some argument in justification of the present condition of the Treasury, and made some recommendation for prospective and permanent relief, I am persuaded there would have been a unanimous vote for any measure of relief reasonable and proper.

But, sir, at the close of the Thirty-Fourth Congress the Treasury of the United States was full to overflowing; it contained $20,000,000. On the second day of the present session, the President officially communicates the joyful intelligence that the Independent Treasury had not suspended payment as it was compelled to do by the failure of the pet banks in 1837; that the Government would continue to discharge its liabilities in gold and silver; that "its disbursements in coin" would pass into circulation and materially assist in restoring a sound currency to the States. But, Mr. Chairman, on the same day that the President asserts with so much emphasis that the Independent Treasury had not failed, the Secretary of the Treasury as emphatically says it is indispensable to the public security that authority be given by law to the Treasury Department to issue $20,000,000 in Treasury notes "as a failure of sufficient means in the Treasury may occur at an early day." Paradoxical as it may seem, both of these statements are true. But why not be open and frank? There certainly was never a time when sympathy was so copiously bestowed upon those found to be in failing circumstances, whether individuals or Governments, especially when good and sufficient reasons are given.

Mr. Chairman, is the cause which has produced the present financial crisis in every part of the country, and thrown the Treasury of the United States into embarrassment, in any way attributable to any relation that exists, or has existed, between the Federal Government and the State banks—the sub-Treasury and the State banks? Not at all. The President alleges no such cause; the Secretary of the Treasury alleges no such cause. Why, then, this warfare on the part of the Executive of the Federal Government upon the moneyed institutions of the sovereign States?

The passage of the Independent Treasury bill, in 1846, was declared by the Democratic party to be a complete separation of Government from the State banks—a complete divorce between the Federal Government and the financial institutions of the States and the people.

It appears that the sub-Treasury, which was to be the great balance-wheel—the great regulator—has regulated nothing. It went on very well just so long as mercantile prosperity and the prosperity of the country went on. So long as prosperity prevailed in all branches of trade and industry, the sub-Treasury could boast of its millions. The first cloud of commercial revulsion caused it to tremble and fall. This great regulator, which was supposed to be infallible, no longer regulates the currency of the country, because it can no longer regulate itself. But the Secretary says the Treasury is embarrassed; and why? Let us turn to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and see what he has to say upon this subject:

"Our revenue being derived principally from duties on imported merchandise entered at the custom-houses for consumption, the amount is necessarily dependent not only upon all those causes which affect trade and commerce, but on such as control the inclination and ability of the people in the purchase of such merchandise for consumption."

"Ordinarily an approximation can be made to the probable result, provided no unlooked-for cause shall intervene to disturb the usual course of trade and consumption."

"The events of the present fiscal year furnish a striking illustration of the uncertainty of all such estimates from the operation of unforeseen causes which exert a controlling influence over the revenue from customs."

Now, sir, this statement of the Secretary is good, as far as it goes; but it does not cover the whole ground. The "events" referred to by the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, are just as applicable to the merchants and the business men of the country as they are to the Government. But what does the President recommend for the Government, and what does he recommend for the people? Why, sir, Government recommends an issue of $20,000,000 of paper currency for its own relief, and a bankrupt law for the State banks. The President proposes to make it the irreversible organic law of each bank existence that a suspension of specie payments, under whatever circumstances, however temporary, shall produce its civil death.

I will quote the President's own words:

"Congress, in my opinion, possess the power to pass a uniform bankrupt law applicable to all banking institutions throughout the United States, and I strongly recommend its exercise. This would make it the irreversible organic law of each bank's existence, that a suspension of specie payment shall produce its civil death."

Sir, such sentiments could never have been penned by one whose sympathies are with the people. They could never have been dictated by one who has any sympathy in common with the business men or the working men of the country, or who in any way appreciates the difficulties and disasters which pervade the people. No man who has been nurtured amidst the men of business, who has walked upon the 'change of the merchants, or the mechanic whose hopes for months have alternated between life and death, whose every hour, whose every bulletin was the announcement of more and more trouble, of new individual disaster, and of increasing fear and alarm, could have put forth such doctrines as those which are contained in the message of the President of the United States.

Sir, I wish to ask any candid man who has ever had any business experience, what would have been the result—what would have been the condition of things, had a bankrupt law, like that which the President recommends and advocates, been applied to the banks of Pennsylvania, New York, Massachusetts, all New England, the South, the West, on the day these banks respectively suspended specie payments?

The banks of Massachusetts suspended specie payments on the morning of the 15th of October; and in just sixty days they resumed. But there was no time, during that sixty days, when you could not obtain specie in reasonable amounts, either for bills or deposits for domestic use; and there was no time, during that sixty days, when there was more than one eighth or one quarter of one per cent. difference between the value of the bills of the Massachusetts banks and specie, either gold or silver. Merchants who received shipments of specie from abroad found it difficult to realize any premium at all upon it. And there was no time, during that brief suspension, when regular customers of good standing, and whose business transactions were known to be of a sound and conservative character, could not get discounts to a reasonable amount.

Mr. Chairman, this recommendation of the Administration, if carried out, instead of protecting the people, or relieving them from the deep distress which pervades the whole community, would plunge the whole country into an irretrievable and inextricable bankruptcy, more disastrous and more ruinous in its effects than anything yet witnessed or experienced.

It is alleged that the banking business has been carried to excess. I grant it. So has every other business; and hence the revulsion. I have read disquisitions upon banks and banking, and upon the present financial crisis, by most of the eminent writers. I have found them full of interest and full of points; but I have found no two to agree in their conclusions. And the only conclusion I have been able to come to myself, is that every commercial revulsion is to a greater or less extent caused by the indomitable energy of the American people in doing business enough every seven years to supply the demands of ten. A proper attention to the revision of the revenue laws, with a view to a greater protection of American manufactures, and American labor, and American interest generally, is demanded, and will do much, very much, to restore trade and prosperity, and to prevent future revulsions. But I do not consider a high protective tariff the only panacea for all commercial revulsions.

Mr. Chairman, I contend that the charters of the State banks should not be annulled for a temporary non-payment of specie under the circumstances which surrounded them at the time of the late suspension. I agree that greater restriction should be placed upon them; but what these restrictions shall be, and to what extent they shall be applied, is for the people of the States and not for Congress to determine. I contend that the power to control and regulate the State banks is not vested in the Federal Government. These institutions are among the domestic institutions of the State, and to be managed by the people of the States in their own way. In this opinion I am sustained by high authority. A distinguished Senator, now, and for a long time, the leader of the Democratic party, [Mr. Douglas,] in one of the most patriotic speeches of his life—a speech which has aroused the Democratic party from East to West, and from North to South, and which is being responded to by the Democratic masses all over the country who love the Union and mean to maintain it, says:

"We agree that the people shall decide for themselves what kind of a judiciary system they will have; we agree that the people shall decide what kind of a school system they will establish; we agree that the people shall determine for themselves what kind of a banking system they will have, or whether they will have any banks at all."

Why, then, should the President so far depart from the principles of State rights as to commence this new warfare upon institutions wholly beyond his control? Why is it that the public mind has not spoken more potently than it has through that great engine of public opinion, the press, upon this new attempt of a Democratic President to bring the moneyed institutions of the States under Executive control and dominion?

When the deposits of public money were removed from the United States Bank, in 1833, the aggregate amount of which did not exceed ten million dollars, the people and the press spoke out in tones of thunder against that obnoxious measure; not only because of its effect upon the finances of the country, but because it was an assumption of power on the part of the Federal Executive. Memorials were presented to Congress from all sections of the country. Many of these memorials were intrusted to Mr. Webster, and by him laid before the Senate of the United States, backed by all the power of logic and the ready and ample resources of learning and eloquence for which that eminent statesman was so distinguished. Among these memorials was one from the city of Boston, signed by six thousand eight hundred and forty-one of its citizens, independent and legal voters. Mr. Webster, in presenting that memorial to the Senate of the United States, denounced that act of usurpation on the part of the Federal Executive, not only for the derangement which it produced in the finances of the country, but because (said Mr. Webster) it assumed, from beginning to end, the character of a warfare between the President of the United States and the government of the Bank of the United States. It mattered not whether the act of the President was a wise or an unwise act; expedient or inexpedient; it was to be resisted because it was illegal and unconstitutional.

So it is with the attempt of the present Executive to apply a bankrupt law to the moneyed institutions of the States, which a distinguished Senator and statesman of the present day says are domestic institutions, and should be governed and controlled by the States in their own way. If it were expedient to apply a bankrupt law at all to the local banks for a suspension of specie payment, under the circumstances which surrounded them in October last, (which I will not admit,) I would resist the enactment of such a law by Congress, because of its tendencies to a centralization of power in the hands of the Federal Executive. We hear of political oligarchies; but I tell you, sir, there is not a more dangerous oligarchy than the power of wealth; not wealth wide-spread, universal, but centralized wealth. By our New England system of banking we have no such power; we can have no such power. The benefits of our system are to be seen in the universal prosperity which is to be found throughout the whole community, and among all classes of the people—a prosperity, checked, it is true, at this time, from the nature of things, and from causes of a general character affecting the country through its whole length and breadth.

The people of the States are attached to their local institutions, prominent among which are the village banks. The prostration of these institutions by Federal interference would be as disastrous to the town as it would be to the city. Under these institutions we have advanced to prosperity and wealth. In Massachusetts, as a whole, these institutions are free from stain or reproach; the imputation of the Federal Executive falls harmlessly at their feet. For a period of twenty years they have gone steadily on, caring little for the interference of the Federal Government, and are to-day as little affected by the crippled condition of its Treasury as any institutions in the land. The one hundred and seventy-two banks of Massachusetts are managed by men of business, of experience, of undoubted integrity, and untarnished honor. They have lived in spite of the veto of 1832, the removal of the public deposits in 1833, and the celebrated specie circular of 1836; and to-day the sub-Treasury of 1846 is prostrate at their feet, begging for relief.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bankrupt law scheme of the President. Executive power and Executive interference have assumed fearful shapes since the days when Mr. Webster battled against their encroachments upon the Constitution. I am surprised to see those who profess above all others to revere the name of Webster so ready to approve of sentiments so much at variance with his whole public record, and so utterly at variance with the principles of constitutional law, as laid down by the greatest of constitutional lawyers.

I am opposed to this proposed bankrupt law of the President, because of the train of Government officials necessarily to follow in its wake, enlarging the already too extensive and corrupt patronage of the Executive.

In connection with this subject, the President recommends the suppression of all bank bills under twenty dollars, and finally under fifty. Well, sir, I am not quite ready for that. I well know what would be the effect of such a policy upon the value of property of middle-interest men; and my experience teaches me that it would be ruinous to the middle-interest classes, who, to a great extent, owe more or less upon their property. Its most serious effect would be upon the value of real estate held by mechanics and working men. Those who have invested the hard earnings of years in such property, and owe fifty or seventy-five per cent. upon it, would be entirely ruined by the depreciation which would surely follow such a measure.

The proposition of the Administration to establish little sub-Treasuries in the several States, and the collection of county and town taxes in specie, I commend to the kind consideration and fostering care of the State-rights men of this House. If that system works well in Virginia, and is acceptable to South Carolina and other independent sovereignties who believe in that democracy which permits States to manage their own affairs in their own way, we can get along very well with it in Massachusetts.

Mr. Chairman, it is time this warfare of the Federal Government upon the local banks, and upon the financial institutions of the States, should cease. If we are to have a paper-money currency—and in my opinion we always shall have—and if the Federal Government is to participate in its benefits—and in my judgment it always will—let the President and the Secretary of the Treasury review their positions, and cease their assaults upon institutions which are to-day as well and as wisely managed as the sub-Treasury of the Federal Government.

I hope and trust the recommendation of the President upon the subject of a bankrupt law, to be applied to the State banks, will be little heeded. I think this House is composed of men too practical in their character, and too well acquainted with the real interest of the people, to be swerved from a course of true patriotism by the abstract sentiments of the President. Let the behests of party give way to the voice of reason; let not our prejudices run away with our judgments. I, for one, shall look with distrust upon a measure which will strike down the commercial interest of the country, and prostrate the manufacturing and mechanical interest of every State in the Union. But, sir, whilst I shall look with distrust upon recommendations of the Administration, I shall not be governed by party feeling in any vote which I may give or withhold from the support of measures recommended by Government.

The people of Massachusetts looked with as much favor upon the present Administration, when it came into power, as any people could who gave an overwhelming vote against it. They were willing to forego all party feeling for union and harmony in the Government, and contentment and prosperity in the nation. But they have looked in vain for those motives which should ever be so distinguishable in every communication from the Chief Executive, as evidence of his determination to give the weight of his exalted position and power for the restoration of peace throughout the broad territorial dominions of the Union, and prosperity, plenty, and happiness throughout the land.

Mr. HICKMAN. I should not have sought the floor at this time, but for the fact that silence would leave my views liable to an unpleasant misconstruction. I was an early, earnest, and sincere advocate of Mr. Buchanan's election to the Presidency of the United States, believing that his elevation would largely promote the present peace and lasting welfare of my country. His life had been a public one, and his character was that of an educated statesman and a just man. I esteemed him as eminently worthy of the largest confidence and warmest regard of the American people, as I could not doubt his Administration would alike reflect his wisdom, experience, and nice appreciation of justice; and that under it the rights of the people, of all the people, would be scrupulously regarded. I did not expect infallibility in his management of public affairs, and do not now expect it; and when I shall meet with what I may regard as error, I trust to be pardoned for the frankness with which I shall always proclaim my opinions.

Until I heard the annual message read, I had expected to be able to yield to its doctrines an honest and decided support; but from its Kansas policy I must strongly dissent. I am unable to give it my support. I regret exceedingly the tendency of the Executive recommendation, which, to my mind, is to place the President in a position of antagonism to the majority in Kansas. It leads to an issue between power on the one hand, and the people on the other. In such a case, I never can hesitate in determining whose cause I shall espouse, or what verdict I ought to render. I am not unmindful of the fact that the former is quite as likely to triumph with the wrong as the latter with the right; and that the ambitious may well hesitate when resolves on success are to decide for whom to do battle. The great influence of executive patronage; the full extent of executive power in this country is but feebly comprehended. We are apt to underrate it vastly. If unscrupulously exercised, it becomes a crushing despotism, as indefensible as that controlled by the greatest of tyrants—combinations can seldom resist it, individuals never. But these considerations, clearly as they have presented themselves to my mind, can never induce me to espouse a political heresy.

But the great danger surrounding our institutions does not so much arise from a want of public virtue as general intelligence. Few outside of public life watch narrowly the conduct of their public servants, and fewer still are sufficiently conversant with the machinery of Government clearly to comprehend the bearing of particular acts. If it were otherwise, high officers of Government would be less powerful for evil, and public rights more practically defensible. If, therefore, at any time, resistance to a gross and unpardonable outrage upon an admitted principle, shall prove unavailing, let not the offense, on that account, be baptized and sanctified; let it rather be an evidence of the truth of my declaration, and a warning to those who are unwilling to part with the sovereignty of the citizen.

My opposition to the President's treatment of Kansas affairs does not arise from hostility to slavery; it stands upon a foundation, the strength of which will be more generally admitted. I rest my resistance upon the violations of declared principles, of solemn pledges, and the guarantees to the nation. To ask me to sanction them, with my views, is to insult me by suspicions of my integrity. Others may act differently, it is not my province to judge them.

"I may stand alone,
But would not change my free thoughts for a throne."

I am not blind to the fact that a very different motive will be assigned for my action. I have too often seen it attributed to others, not to anticipate it in my own case. But it has become a stale cry, and, I think, must soon prove a barren one. If differing from my southern friends on any point which immediately or remotely affects the interests of slavery must subject me to anathema, so be it; I must bear up under it; I cannot deny my convictions that I may receive a charitable judgment.

I do not oppose slavery where it legally exists. It is there a matter between the master and the slave; it concerns them alone; and I will not interfere with it or them. I yield a ready allegiance to our common Constitution, and will support all the laws made under it as long as they remain in force, to whatever subject they may relate, or whatever burdens they may impose upon me. But when any man, or body of men, seek to plant that institution or any other on my soil, or where I have the legal right to speak, I will then exercise the prerogative of a freeman. And when this is attempted by force or by fraud, when it is manifested in an utter disregard and profound contempt for the popular will, that, of itself, will induce me to resist it to the last.

This is a law to me—and there is no other sound law of liberty—to exercise all my rights in their fullness, and to grant the same measure of power to my neighbor. The application of this rule of action is not only good for individuals, but equally so for communities and States. It is a golden rule; it is a pure constitutional rule. The North must regard all the rights of the South, and the South must regard all the rights of the North—in the States and in the Territories—throughout the broad land—for neither wears a panoply against the assaults of the other. There are two classes of persons, however, who, in a marked manner, interfere with this course of conduct. They are those who deny and those who grant all demands made, whether just or unjust. Extremists in the South, judging all northern men to be of the former class, designate them as enemies and Abolitionists; and certain northern politicians looking upon a few northern Democrats as a type of the whole, have declared Democracy to be the ally of slavery. Both cannot be right, and believe that they are equally wrong. Denying, as I do, the charge that Democracy has entered into a league with slavery, I am yet willing to admit, as I have said, the existence of a few northern confederates with it. I do not believe them able to exercise much power, whatever their disposition. If it shall prove otherwise in their action upon the present question, I must leave to them the responsibilities of a course destructive of the effective force of our party organization.

I think I may, with great truth, say that the enactment of the law organizing the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska, including the repeal of the Missouri compromise, was not, originally, a popular movement at the North. It was regarded with suspicion, and believed to be impolitic if not unjust. Mr. Puchanan himself, by expressing the wish, in his Reading letter, that that line should be extended to the Pacific ocean, gave to the compromise a sanctity or popularity additional to that derived from thirty-four years' acquiescence; and when its contemplated destruction was announced, it was received with great astonishment and deep regret. It was honestly believed, by very many, to be a movement to advance the peculiar interests of the South at the expense of those for whose benefit the territory north of the line had been dedicated to freedom. The doctrine of popular sovereignty by which it was accompanied, made it at first but tolerable, though, eventually, palatable. Could the future history of Kansas have then been read, as it has since transpired to this moment; the repeated frauds and usurpations practiced and imposed upon her people; her agonizing and fruitless cries for justice; the cruel and crushing sympathy of high Federal officers with her oppressors; her appeal for free institutions derided by ruffians, and slavery fastened upon her in bold defiance of her rights; could all this have been foreseen, the northern advocate of that legislation could not have breasted for a single moment the withering tornado such wrongs would have raised against him. These unjust consequences, not naturally flowing from the legislation spoken of, have now resulted; and if they would not have been tolerated then, why should they be now? Have we an overplus of political power which should induce us to carry so exhausting a burden with patience? Once taken up by the party they would cling to it like the Man of the Mountain to the back of the sailor, choking it and sinking it to the earth. It is too soon for us to forget what overpowering strength we brought to the polls in 1852, and the means—yes, sir, the means—by which it was recklessly frittered away before 1856.

Mr. Chairman, I am upon a point I feel deeply, and if I shall express myself with warmth and decision I must be pardoned. As long as I am capable of appreciating truth, I can never lend myself to the attempt now being made, with high sanctions, to undermine the foundation upon which the modern territorial legislation rests, and to falsify pledges upon the faith of which the last presidential election was accomplished. The vital principle, the soul of the Nebraska-Kansas bill, is to be blasted. The majority are not necessarily to rule. If I can read recent events at all, I learn so much from them. Let the people understand this; teach them the whole truth, and then hear their response. Think you the mighty millions of the North, the East, and the West will be quieted as children by baubles? Will they allow legislation to be construed one way to-day, and enforced a different way to-morrow? In short, will they submit always to stake upon a game where they never can win? If they are so miserably made up, so destitute of real manhood, they are truly only fit to be the "white slaves" of whom we have occasionally heard, and from my soul I pity them. The name of freeman fits them not, but hangs upon them,

Upon a dwarfish thief."

My course is my own; others are not answerable for it; and I would not implicate them in my action if I could. But I will resist every attempt, no matter from what quarter it may come, to inflict a despotism upon the people of Kansas, when the law guarantees them liberty, or to impinge upon the promises the Democracy took upon themselves to make in the last presidential campaign.

The recommendation in the message goes out as "a forlorn hope" against what has heretofore been supposed to be the strongly intrenched doctrine of popular sovereignty. What will the country do, is the question. Will it defend this great principle in the hour of its severe trial? Or will it allow the right of self-government to be successfully assaulted? Has it already become an obsolete, a worn-out thing? But two years ago I expressed the opinion that those most prominently instrumental in causing the Democratic party to be pledged to maintain the doctrine of popular sovereignty, in the organization of four Territories, would deeply regret it. I never doubted that it would operate against the growth of the South. On the 19th of March, 1856, when insisting upon an investigation into alleged election frauds in Kansas, I had occasion to use these words:

"Sir, the supporters of that bill [the Nebraska-Kansas bill] have proclaimed to the nation that the Territories of the United States are to constitute 'a fair field,' and that there is to be a free fight there, between the North and the South, to decide whether slavery or freedom shall rule them. If the energy, the enterprise, the active modes of life, the available capital, and the numbers of the North, shall not be able to compete successfully with their opposites in the South, and secure freedom to the Territories, then I will admit that there is a vitality and a power in slavery which we of the North have never dreamed of. In my opinion, the Representatives of the South in the Thirty-Third Congress 'have sown the fire, and they will gather fire into their own garner.'"

The prediction is fulfilled; for now, like Pyrene, the Iberian princess, they fly in fear from their own child; it is a serpent, and pursues them. The day of repentance has come upon them much sooner than I anticipated. Instead of decades, it has required but brief months to inculcate the lesson which should never be forgotten, that weakness cannot long triumph over strength, nor minorities, in this free land, trample down majorities. If what we have esteemed the great truths of republican government are not a sheer lie, then squatter sovereignty, adequately protected, will give the virgin lands of our Confederacy to the free white man, and not the negro slave. This is now seen, and sovereignty is not to be protected; it is to be crushed out; by unwarrantable, illegal interference it is to be crushed out; and the hitherto pliant North is expected to acquiesce. If it submits, be it so. I will, never! no, never!

A southern writer in De Bow's Weekly Press exhibits in a striking light the imperative necessity resting upon the South to make Kansas a slave State. It is declared to be the necessity arising from self-preservation, and such as originates the highest law. I read an extract from the article referred to, of the date of January 16, 1858:

"The surrender of Kansas to the operation of the majority rule, under the cry of popular sovereignty in the Territories, without constitutional warrant, and her absorption by the non-slaveholding power of the country, would make the evil of the times no longer prospective, but instant and imminent. By the fact of this surrender, the South would become subordinate, and the North predominant, in the Union. Never again, in the Union, could the equilibrium of State sovereign representation between the South and the North be either maintained or restored to the Senate. Never again, in the Union, could the equality of the South with the North be either maintained or restored to the House of Representatives. No further barrier could be constructed between either the aggressive territorial or political rapacity of the North, and the weakened and diminished South. No other bulwark could be raised to guard either the moral or social integrity of the South against the disrupting and destructive legal and social systems of the North. The South, like Hector bound to the car of Achilles, would soon be dragged by the triumphant North around a ruined possession, quickly to be followed by the erasive plowshare of the invading conqueror.

"The loss of Kansas to the South would involve the loss of Missouri; and the loss of Missouri would destroy the moral as well as political prestige of the South, and invade the integrity of their institutions. The moral prestige of States, like that of individuals, once destroyed, no earthly power can restore; and the integrity of State establishments, like the chastity of woman, once subjected to invasion, continues at the will of the despoiler. With abolitionized Iowa stretching along the northern boundary of Missouri, and abolitionized Kansas covering her western boundary, whilst there poured into her bosom, through Iowa and Kansas, from the more inhospitable lake and northern Atlantic regions, a continuous stream of agrarian radicals of any and all parties in those regions, alike determined to obtain control of her government, and to assert the rule of the majority in the line of emancipation, slave property in Missouri would become too precarious in its tenure to be holden, and the necessity for its sale or removal would at once arise. It may be confidently asserted that, under these circumstances, in five years Missouri would cease to be a slaveholding State. Already, in view of the anticipated result, Abolition journals have been started in Missouri, and candidates for Congress have unfurled the banner of emancipation.

"Now the loss of Missouri to the South would involve the loss of the Creek and Cherokee domain, the Choctaw and Chickasaw domain, New Mexico, and Arizona, which otherwise could be saved to the slaveholding interests of the country, and the harmonious equilibrium of the Union. It is known that the Creeks and Cherokees number from thirty to forty thousand free inhabitants, holding at least ten thousand negro slaves. The facts as to the Choctaws and Chickasaws stand in a similar ratio. The white man's blood in both nations predominates, strongly coloring each with the white man's mental forms and expressions. They have each a regular government, with distinct executive, judicial, and legislative departments, with a general common school system, with Christian churches established in many directions, and with the arts of agriculture and mechanics considerably developed. Each is gradually preparing to enter the Union as a slaveholding State. But, with abolitionized Kansas and Missouri along their northern limits, the floodgates would be thrown open through which the abolition tide would sweep with resistless energies, driving before it, or overwhelming in its deluge, alike the hybrid Indian and the negro slave, thus ultimately adding both domains to the colossal power of the North. New Mexico and Arizona would now be thrown between the 'free-soil' States formed out of the territories of the Creeks, Cherokees, Choctaws, and Chickasaws, on the east, the 'free-soil' State of California on the west, and the 'free' States of Mexico on the south. Negro slave property, however anxiously desired, in neither could be held for a day, and they, too, would inevitably go to swell the bedstriding power and monstrous proportions of the North."

But, Mr. Chairman, I wish to be more particular and precise in my objections to that part of the President's message to which I have made reference, and to the admission of Kansas into the Union on the Lecompton constitution. They arise—

First. From the antagonism of that policy and measure to what has been called the great republican principle of the Nebraska-Kansas bill; and Second. From the attempts making to violate the plighted faith of the Democratic party.

"The true intent and meaning" of the act organizing the Territory of Kansas, is declared to be "to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way." This language would seem too unequivocal to be overcome by the most abstruse diplomatist, or the most adroit hair-splitting politician. No doubt, I suggest, is allowed to remain as to "the true intent and meaning" of the enactment. It was to give full, perfect, unrestricted sovereignty to the people of Kansas. It is this right, thus clearly given to them, the inhabitants of the Territory now claim; nothing more, nothing less.

But I understand the President to say that they are careless about all questions to be settled by their fundamental law, except the single one of negro slavery. Who conferred upon this officer the authority to speak so confidently for the people of Kansas? Surely Congress never did; for they have, by an unrepented law, vested all power in the people alone; and if the people have intrusted him with an agency, it is proper he should show his warrant. This, most unfortunately, and of course most unintentionally, tends to indorse and sustain that organized, systematic attempt, long insisted upon and persevered in, to stifle the popular voice in the Territory, and to cast its government into the hands of those having no shadow of right to exercise it. Free government is not to be allowed, because the people will not consult the wishes of the Platte district, nor accept institutions attempted to be forced on them from abroad. The language of the President is somewhat peculiar, and, to my mind, singularly unsound. He says:

"The convention were not bound by its terms [the terms of the Nebraska-Kansas bill] to submit any other portion of the instrument [the constitution] to an election, except that which relates to the 'domestic institution' of slavery. This will be rendered clear by a simple reference to its language. It was 'not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way.' According to the plain construction of the sentence, the words 'domestic institutions' have a direct, as they have an appropriate reference to slavery. 'Domestic institutions' are limited to the family. The relation between master and slave, and a few others, are 'domestic institutions,' and are entirely distinct from institutions of a political character. Besides, there was no question then before Congress, nor indeed has there since been any serious question before the people of Kansas or the country, except that which relates to the 'domestic institution' of slavery."

All the obligations which "rested on the Lecompton convention to submit their constitution to an election" he assumes to be derived from the act of Congress. He contends that "domestic institutions," being synonymous with slavery, it is therefore not required to submit any other matter to the popular decision. Let us test this remarkable view by carrying it to its consequences. If "domestic institutions" mean merely slavery, then it is clear that the power given to the people "to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way," confers only the power "to form and regulate" slavery "in their own way." But this conclusion would prove too great an absurdity for its advocates to profit by. The policy of the Government with reference to slavery in the Territories, was intended to be permanently settled by the Nebraska-Kansas bill, giving to the people thereof complete sovereignty over all their institutions. All power to legislate on the subject of slavery was denied to Congress and given to the people of the Territory. Congress declared it was—

"The true intent and meaning of that act not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way."

As I read it, and as the country has thus far interpreted it, slavery was to be left to the determination of the people of the Territory just as all the rest of their domestic institutions. Indeed the whole argument for the legislation referred to, proceeded upon that ground. They, the people, were to have their institutions in their own way—all their institutions. Their power was not large or unlimited with regard to one, and small or limited with regard to another; it was equal with respect to all. I need scarcely contend that if their will is to govern, it becomes necessary to ascertain what it is. As I look upon it, therefore, the admission that the question of slavery should be submitted to a vote of the people for the purpose of ascertaining their wishes touching that institution, carries with it the further admission that all their other institutions should be subjected to the same test. The error arises from shutting out of view the fact that the territorial legislation of 1854 intended to establish a governmental policy with respect to slavery; that it was designed to leave that "domestic institution" just where all other "domestic institutions" were left—within the popular control. That by using the words "slavery" and "domestic institutions" in the same sentence, Congress did not intend they should be regarded as synonymous, but as a member and a family. Slavery is a domestic institution, not domestic institutions; it is singular, not plural; it is one, not many. To adopt this fault of interpretation, would be to do not only great, and perhaps irretrievable injury to the people of Kansas, but to those of every Territory hereafter to be organized.

Is it not too plain that popular sovereignty, so much extolled in the Thirty-Third Congress, and so highly recommended in the last presidential contest, as the sound principle upon which our Territories were therefore to be organized and governed—which was declared as giving all power into the hands of the people—is to be sweated down to the very moderate dimensions of a privilege to say whether they will hold a negro in bonds or not? No opinion can be expressed as to the organization of the legislative, executive, or judicial branches of the government; none of the constitutional safeguards afforded to life and liberty are of any importance to the citizen. He may not speak as to them; his whole voice is to be kept for his yea or nay on negro slavery. This is Tom Thumb sovereignty, or sovereignty in a nut-shell.

The case is even worse than I have exhibited it. Nothing has been submitted for popular determination. Slavery could not be voted down by voting the "constitution with no slavery," when the instrument expressly declares that, under such vote, "the right of property in slaves now in the Territory shall in no manner be interfered with." That right of property carries with it the increase of those slaves as completely as if born in South Carolina; and if that right "shall not be interfered with," slavery must continue. I have never before been taught that that is a free State in which the negro and his issue are to be holden as slaves, and where the property in slaves "shall not be interfered with." The right of the people "to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way," now means simply "to form and regulate" slavery, provided they "form" it in a State, and do not "regulate" it out. This I would designate as sovereignty invisible.

This solemn mockery of a guaranteed right is to be tolerated; not only tolerated, but encouraged and confirmed by the action of the present Congress, because the convention which perpetrated the enormity, represented, as I am told, the sovereignty of the people. No such reason exists. I would as soon recognize a bastard as a lawful heir, as the Lecompton convention to be the offspring of the people of Kansas. The fact that others may have recognized it as a legal body, imposes no obligation upon me to force myself to the same unwise conclusion. It is one of the fruits of a well-digested fraud concocted in the fall of 1854, and persevered in until the present moment; a fraud by which slavery was to be forced into the State when formed, without respect to the sentiment of the people. The very purpose of the fraud was to override the will of the people; to substitute the action of a minority for the rule of the majority. In organizing the Territory under the Nebraska-Kansas act, the first thing manifested was an anti-republican movement, subversive of the principles of the act, and those concerned in it took as much trouble to hide the facts as Periander did to conceal his grave, and committed as many crimes in doing so. The ballot-box gave no response to the resolves or wishes of the residents; it pointed only to treasonable acts striking at the very foundation of our institutions. Ruffianism has held uninterrupted sway there. It made legislators, who made a convention, which made a constitution. The great grandchild bears most unmistakable evidence of its parentage, and it would indeed be strange if it did not subvert the principle that the people are free "to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way."

"For he that once hath missed the right way,
The further he doth go the further he doth stray."

I am unwilling to marshal proofs to support the position here assumed, as the whole living history of Kansas attests its strength.

Sir, how does it happen that no man has yet been found with Democracy sound enough to bear up against the air of Kansas? Four Governors have been appointed in the space of about thirty months, from among the wisest and best of our party, and now the office is again vacant. How comes this? It finds its solution in the fact that "Democracy is morality," and unable to countenance so gross and palpable a usurpation as has always existed there. Those four high officers have all returned to us, speaking the same language, uttering the same words—that sovereignty is crushed out there. And what answer is made to this? A southern paper gives it, in declaring they are to be marked—their ears cut and tails split; they are to be read out. Take care, sir, that you do not read out the whole North. In the great political contest of 1856, how our energies were taxed to the utmost! Every vote was of importance—of vast importance—not to the North merely, but to the South—ay, to the South! How they trembled there! "Sectionalism" they thought would prevail. Looking back upon that fearful struggle, may we not well pause long enough to inquire what will probably be the result of future battles, when soldiers are so unceremoniously shot, at a time when they can be so illy spared?

I have not forgotten the almost impenetrable gloom which overhung my own State, and consequently the whole country, during the fierce conflict to which I have alluded. It was then that the persuasive voice of one who now fills a place near the person of the President was heard in our midst, proclaiming the right of Kansas to be self-governed, and expressing his determination, as a son of the South, to carry out the will of her people. His present high position was bestowed upon him, doubtless, in consequence of the influence it was his fortune then to exercise. I fear his friends who, at that time, listened to him with so much true pleasure, were not prepared for the intelligence which just before our meeting flashed along the telegraphic wires, that the President and his Cabinet were a unit in favor of the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution. But their greatest regret will, perhaps, be that they have forfeited the favorable regard of one in whose behalf they have taken so strong an interest, for the reason that they learned too well the salutary lessons he inculcated.

I cannot follow this digression further, although not unprofitable, but must resume my argument. I deny that the Lecompton convention represented the sovereignty of the people, for another reason. In the election of its members, a majority of those really entitled to vote were completely disfranchised. It was thus made to be the representative of a minority merely. In the language of Governor Walker, "it had vital, not technical, defects in the very substance of its organization under the territorial law." Out of thirty-four counties composing election districts, and in which it was requisite a census should be taken and voters registered by officers appointed by the Legislature itself, nineteen had no census taken and no representation assigned them, and fifteen had no registry of voters, and could not, therefore, vote at all. The nineteen counties were a majority of all the counties, and were unrepresented; the fifteen counties had more votes than were given to all the delegates who signed the constitution, and could not cast a single vote. How, then, can it be said that this was a convention of delegates of the people; and, as such, entitled to speak for them, act for them, and bind them? Under such circumstances, are a people left "free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way?"

A further objection exists to the composition of this convention. Its members not only did not represent a majority, but those who controlled its action procured their election by a fraud. The delegates from Douglas county, including the president of the convention, suspected of a design to fasten a constitution upon the people without submitting it to them for their acceptance or rejection, issued the following card:

"To the Democratic Voters of Douglas County:

"It having been stated by that Abolition newspaper, the Herald of Freedom, and by some disaffected bogus Democrats, who have got up an independent ticket, for the purpose of securing the vote of the Black Republicans, that the regular nominees of the Democratic convention were opposed to submitting the constitution to the people, we, the candidates of the Democratic party, submit the following resolutions, which were adopted by the Democratic convention which placed us in nomination, and which we fully and heartily endorse, as a complete refutation of the slanders above referred to.

JOHN CALHOUN, A. W. JONES,
W. S. WELLS, H. BUTCHER,
L. S. BOLLING, JOHN M. WALLACE,
WM. T. SPICELY, L. A. PRATHER.

"LECOMPTON, KANSAS TERRITORY, June 13, 1857."

"Resolved, That we will support no man as a delegate to the constitutional convention, whose duties it will be to frame the constitution of the future State of Kansas and to mold the political institutions under which we, as a people, are to live, unless he pledges himself fully, freely, and without reservation, to use every honorable means to submit the same to every bona fide actual citizen of Kansas, at the proper time for the vote being taken upon the adoption by the people, in order that the said constitution may be adopted or rejected by the actual settlers in this Territory, as the majority of the voters shall decide."

These men, by this act of baseness, not only accomplished their election, but placed the convention within their own control. Am I to be taught that our institutions can only be supported by public virtue, and then asked to defend such a proceeding as I have indicated, upon the ground that it is sovereign, republican, and binding upon the citizen? This is felon sovereignty.

The injustice of the course pursued towards the people of Kansas is very distinct. They are by law empowered to form their institutions in their own way; and yet the supporters of the Lecompton convention require them to adopt particular forms to make known that will, not because the bona fide settlers approve of them, but because their supporters approve of them. If one tenth maintain the legislation originating the constitution, and nine tenths repudiate and condemn it, can it be said the instrument is the offspring of sovereignty? But suppose every votable inhabitant had sanctioned the call of a convention, and yet a large majority should condemn the work of such a body when finished: would not a plain, common-sense interpretation of the organic act require us to reject it? The proposition is too plain for argument. I will merely inquire what the sentiment of the people is; and when I learn that, by employing such means as are likely to reveal it, I will aid it, whether I can sanction their conclusions or not. Anything else would fall short of giving a popular government; it would be but a government of force or fraud.

I deeply regret that those who support the Lecompton constitution have not rested that support upon a principle, but upon expediency. As I read the message of the President, he sanctions it in order that the country may get rid of the excitement which has so long prevailed on the subject. What excitement, pray? That which has been caused by repeated acts of violence, smothering the popular will, and gagging the popular voice. Its language is:

"When once admitted into the Union, whether with or without slavery, the excitement beyond her own limits will speedily pass away, and she will then, for the first time, be left, as she ought to have been long since, to manage her own affairs in her own way. If her constitution on the subject of slavery, or on any other subject, be displeasing to a majority of the people, no human power can prevent them from changing it within a brief period."

In my judgment a principle should never be sacrificed to expediency. But I deny the expediency of the course recommended, and the argument to sustain it is, to my mind, unfortunate. The President says: "if her constitution on the subject of slavery, or on any other subject, be displeasing to a majority of the people, no human power can prevent them from changing it within a brief period." The organic act promises the people that they may "form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way;" now they are told they should take a fundamental law, in the making of which they had no part, and of which they totally disapprove, because "no human power can prevent them from changing it within a brief period." Now, at the time they seek admission into the Union, oppression forces institutions upon them; but when admitted, that hand will be withdrawn and they will regain their rights. This is sovereignty with suspended animation.

In opposition to the proposed policy of forcing upon the people what they do not want, I place the Democratic doctrine of popular sovereignty, which will give to the people what they do want. The President requires us to take a new but ragged garment, and attempts to comfort us by saying it can be patched and made sound. I will never traffic in goods which are defective, and will not wear, if I know it, notwithstanding I may buy, others if I do not like them. I will never barter truths for errors, knowing that I may support the latter by sophistries. I believe, with Milton, that—"Truth is strong! Next to the Almighty, she needs no policies, no stratagems, no licensings to make her victorious."

And I will follow her wherever she may lead. If from power, then I am against power. If from the mass, then I am against the mass. If from my friends, then I am against my friends. If into solitude and the desert, I will make her my companion forever.

The rules of the House deny me the time to pursue this branch of my argument further, however much I may desire to do so. I shall now contend that, to adopt the course recommended by the President to Congress to support the action of the Lecompton convention, would be to violate the manifold and manifest pledges of the Democratic party touching the doctrine of popular sovereignty in the Territories.

The main or principal ground taken by the Republican party has been, that the Democracy were not to be trusted on questions involving the interests of slavery, and that their management of Kansas affairs afforded the sustaining proof. It will not do for us to say that it produced no effect upon the public mind. We were constrained to admit the policy, although we denied the justice of the appeal. In Pennsylvania, within sight of Wheatland, the home of the present Chief Magistrate, an impression had been made against us.

The reply was ready and potent, that Mr. Buchanan, having favored the extension of the Missouri compromise to the Pacific, had favored the exclusion of slavery from the territory north of that line, including Kansas; that he was a northern man, having, as such, sympathies with the white laborer, and likely, for that reason, to see full justice done him; that he had proved himself honest, and as the resolves of his party bound him to the doctrine of popular sovereignty, and the sentiment in Kansas was most unmistakably for a free State, there could be no doubt he would see the organic act fully and impartially carried out, and slavery repressed. Confidence was reestablished and a Democratic victory achieved. If the recent message could have been then anticipated, I do not hesitate to express my conviction that Pennsylvania would have cast an immense majority of her votes against him. His old congressional district—a part of which I have the honor to represent—I am satisfied would have spoken in a very different voice. You know but little of the present feeling in Pennsylvania if you suppose her sons can be induced to support the views of the Executive regarding the Lecompton convention. There is an accusation of bad faith, and I confess I have felt myself unable to answer it, and consequently unwilling to attempt it.

It was not alone in Pennsylvania our party committed itself to a faithful expression of the popular wish in Kansas. North and South, throughout the States, it was pledged in the most solemn terms to the same thing. There was no conflict of political opinion in the different sections of the Union; all acknowledged the obligation of the principle of the Nebraska-Kansas bill, and all expressed their unfaltering determination to defend the sovereign will of the people, whether its expression was for freedom or slavery. That these declarations were honestly made I do not doubt; the Cincinnati platform had then but recently been constructed, and all seemed to fully understand it. The resolution, to which I more especially refer, was demanded by the South, and fully accepted by the North. This demand was occasioned, doubtless, by a fear of the former that the latter was more or less unfriendly to the new territorial legislation. The principle of this legislation was hence reasserted and embodied, and became the bond of Democratic fellowship. It is too plain for misconstruction even now:

"Resolved, That we recognize the right of the people of all the Territories, including Kansas and Nebraska, acting through the legally and fairly-expressed will of a majority of actual residents, and whenever the number of their inhabitants justifies it, to form a constitution, with or without domestic slavery, and be admitted into the Union upon terms of perfect equality with the other States."

It did not speak for Kansas merely but for "all the Territories." "The people of all the Territories, including Kansas and Nebraska, acting through the legally and fairly-expressed will of a majority of actual residents" are to form constitutions. And here, let me observe, that in no other way are constitutions to be formed. The resolution follows the act of Congress in indicating the mode in which constitutions are to be formed, namely, by "the people acting through the legally and fairly-expressed will of a majority of actual residents." It was thus emphatically announced that a constitution could not be given to Kansas in any but the one way. Again, I say, the party was trusted, and it triumphed.

The inaugural address of the new President evinced a clear comprehension of the grounds upon which his election had been accomplished, and a determination to observe the most perfect good faith. In speaking of the Territories its language was:

"It is the imperative and indispensable duty of the Government of the United States to secure to every resident inhabitant the free and independent expression of his opinion by his vote. This sacred right of each individual must be preserved!"

This is not a passage framed for the purpose of ambiguity; it removes all doubt, if any existed before, as to the conviction of the speaker, that "the free and independent expression of his opinion by his vote" must be secured "to every resident" of Kansas, at all times. Here was a conclusion reached; and we find the President, afterwards, consistently and persistently carrying it out. Be it remembered "the resident" of Kansas was to be secured in the "free and independent expression of his opinion by his vote." The President of the United States had so determined; and with this purpose fixed, he insisted upon the Hon. Robert J. Walker accepting from him the appointment of Governor of Kansas, to effectuate it. The reason for selecting the individual named, is to be found in the fact that there was a perfect agreement of the two as to the course to be pursued. This is most evident from the letter of Governor Walker accepting the appointment, and from the instructions issued to him. In the letter alluded to Governor Walker says:

"I understand that you and your Cabinet cordially concur in the opinion expressed by me, that the actual bona fide residents of the Territory of Kansas, by a fair and regular vote, unaffected by fraud or violence, must be permitted, in adopting their State constitution, to decide for themselves what shall be their social institutions. This is the great fundamental principle of the act of Congress organizing that Territory, affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, and is in accordance with the views uniformly expressed by me throughout my public career. I contemplate a peaceful solution of this question by an appeal to the intelligence and patriotism of the people of Kansas, who should all participate fully and freely in this decision, and by a majority of whose votes the decision must be made, as the only and constitutional mode of adjustment.

"I will go, then, and endeavor to adjust these difficulties, in the full confidence, as strongly expressed by you, that I will be sustained by all your own high authority, with the cordial cooperation of all your Cabinet."

The instructions to this officer are equally conclusive of the fact:

"The institutions of Kansas should be established by the votes of the people of Kansas, unawed and uninterrupted by force and fraud.

"When such a constitution shall be submitted to the people of the Territory, they must be protected in the exercise of their right to vote for or against the instrument, and the fair expression of the popular will must not be interrupted by fraud or violence."

But the letter and instructions, as quoted, are proof of a much more important matter than that for which I have used them, for they conclusively establish that there was then an anxious wish on the part of the President that the people of the Territory should be fully protected in the exercise of their right to vote upon their constitution. I repeat his words: "They must be protected in the exercise of their right to vote for or against the instrument." Not in their right to vote for or against a part of the instrument, but the instrument—the whole instrument.

The Union, the organ of the Administration, of the 7th of July last, seems fully to appreciate the ground then held by the President, and, in defending that position, gives a most satisfactory reason for assuming it. I will read an extract from that paper of the date named:

"When there is no serious dispute upon the constitution, either in the convention or among the people, the power of the delegates alone may put it in operation. But such is not the case in Kansas. The most violent struggle this country ever saw, upon the most important issue which the Constitution is to determine, has been going on there for several years, between parties so evenly balanced that both claim the majority, and so hostile to one another that numerous lives have been lost in the contest. Under these circumstances there can be no such thing as ascertaining clearly and without doubt, the will of the people in any way except by their own direct expression of it at the polls. A constitution not subjected to that test, no matter what it contains, will never be acknowledged by its opponents to be anything but a fraud."

"We do most devoutly believe that unless the constitution of Kansas be submitted to a direct vote of the people, the unhappy controversy which has heretofore raged in that Territory will be prolonged for an indefinite time to come."

It is no answer to all this to say that other States have been admitted into the Union without submitting their constitutions to a popular vote. It would not be an answer if such had been the case with each and every one of the eighteen admitted States. If there were a thousand precedent cases of States so admitted, where there was no serious dispute among the citizens as to the particular form of their institutions, they would fall short of affording an argument for the admission of one where such difficulty does exist. Kansas is a case standing by itself; it has no parallels; it is not to be illustrated by precedent. Its feature are peculiar—anomalous; and the circumstances surrounding it such as never before surrounded the inchoate State. To its popular sovereignty most specially applies. Congress, the dominant political party, the President of the United States, the Governor of the Territory, all declared the people should have just such republican institutions as they might desire. All looked to a vote of the people as the means to determine the popular will. The people now ask that such vote may indicate their wishes. All sovereignty resides in the people, and no admitted principle refuses its exercise in the mode desired. Why shall they not, then, speak at the polls?

Here I pause for a moment. In looking back from the point now reached, we see the Democratic party and the President have alike pursued a comparatively new, yet well-defined and strongly-marked policy. The Missouri compromise line, after continuing for years, is found to be too restrictive; the common territory of the nation should be open to the occupancy of our citizens in common. The Nebraska-Kansas bill is enacted, and the people of the Territories are to "form" as they are to "regulate" their "domestic institutions." In the North and in the South the doctrine is accepted, and eagerly they push forward their respective schemes for colonizing Kansas, for now numbers shall control the institutions there. By river and by land the emigration hastens forward, and the cabin is scarcely prepared for shelter before the struggle for power, for control, commences, and it is grasped and held by the friends of the South. It is alleged that strangers to the soil, Missouri borderers, decide the contest: the reply is, you shall not inquire as to that, or any other matter; the people rule. The hasty and superficial observer declares the South has gained an undue advantage over the North, and a sound of exultation is heard around us and in the distance. Thus baffled in the Territories, will the North, aspiring to executive power, still adhere to that sovereignty which has failed her? She must do so, or abandon her long-cherished object. The pledge is presented to her; she accepts it boldly, and repeats to the world what the faint-hearted believe is to degrade her free-born and undaunted sons:

"We recognize the right of the people of all the Territories, including Kansas and Nebraska, acting through the legally and fairly expressed will of the majority of actual residents; and whenever the number of their inhabitants justifies it, to form a constitution, with or without domestic slavery, and be admitted into the Union upon terms of perfect equality with the other States."

There is a hand-to-hand encounter. Now, again, the cry, as one of victory, resounds throughout the land, "the will of the majority, legally and fairly expressed, shall be the law of the Territories." It is barely uttered before an attempt is made to stifle it; for in the far Northwest the South has been outcolonized, and slavery is likely to be excluded from the soil. We were not prepared for this; for if the act of a minority, or, at best, a doubtful majority, can, for the time, establish a domestic institution, an actual majority should be able to form and regulate and perpetuate other or all domestic institutions.

The Democratic party and the President were honest in their support of popular sovereignty. This was not only the case before, but after the election. On no other hypothesis can you account for their early, distinct, and repeated avowals of it. The President intended to enforce it in Kansas literally and truly. There had never been but one interpretation given to it by the party of which he was, the head, and he understood it clearly. It was, that the fundamental law, the constitution, which gave form and regulation to their institutions, all their institutions, should not be imposed upon the people until sanctioned and adopted by a vote of the majority. If such was not the case, how came it that the President did not at once repudiate the action of Governor Walker in giving assurance that the Leecompton convention must submit their constitution to a vote, or it would be rejected by Congress? How could he pass over this sentence, in the address of that officer to the people of the Territory, without notice?

"Kansas never can be brought into the Union, with or without slavery, except by a previous solemn decision, fully, freely, and fairly made by a majority of her people, in voting for or against the adoption of the State constitution."

It must be conceded that the President approved of Governor Walker's course, and that it required him to do so to make his own course consistent, and the party true to their avowals.

I here leave the discussion. I am unwilling to repeat points raised in the earlier portion of my remarks, to assist this branch of my argument, and I do not think it necessary to do so. I can only use this general expression, that, in my opinion, the course now recommended to us by the President in his message is unjust to, because inconsistent with, himself, and would, if carried out, rob the Nebraska-Kansas act of its vital principle, and stand as an accusing record against the good faith of the Democratic party, crippling it for years to come, if not destroying it for the future. In such an event, where is that strong hand which is to lay hold of the rudder and still direct the ship of State, freighted with the hopes of mankind, in her course of material greatness and increasing glory? What, in that day, will constitute the breakwater against which fanaticism shall dash in its wild fury, as the hurricane may bear it from the North or the South? How will then fare the Union, with which we are everything, without which we are nothing?

Do you believe you can satisfy the country of the propriety of planting slavery on that soil, from which the Missouri compromise excluded it, upon the newest doctrine that it should be left to the laws of climate and production alone, and that neither of these will exclude it? that popular sovereignty, applied by the legislation of 1854 to the rule of the Territories of the United States, may be trampled under foot upon the pretense that forms of law have been duly observed in establishing it? that popular elections may be carried under solemn guarantees to the voter, and all pledges be broken the moment they have performed their work? that the principal may instruct the agent, and the agent, by faithfully obeying the instructions given, shall render himself obnoxious to the just indignation of his superior? that that Territory is self-governed whose highest law is made and riveted upon it by a convention in whose composition one half the Territory was unrepresented and disfranchised, which was ordained by a Legislature never acknowledged because never elected? in short, that all is well, and that principle and faith are inviolably kept in Kansas, when they know that nine tenths of her citizens, acting together, are unable to prevent the adoption of institutions which they never can acknowledge without disgrace?

Do you believe you can satisfy the country of all this? I tell you here to-day plainly that the northern Democracy never will be able to satisfy northern men of these things. Unlike the ancient knight, those who support this strange policy will be known, although they may change the color of their armor at every charge they make hereafter. The time has come at last, and not too soon, when a new requisition will be made by northern constituencies—an earnest and manly defense of northern honor and of northern rights, whilst giving the utmost demands of justice to their brethren of the South. If unpardonable to insist upon so much equality, then we have reached the end of national platforms, and the beginning of sectional Presidents—to my mind the last calamity to be survived; for then will begin those acts of aggressive interference which, leading to protracted and desolating wars, must end in establishing among children of the same blood the cruel relation of conqueror and captive.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, obtained the floor.

Mr. LETCHER. I rise to a question of order. My point of order is this: that I addressed the Chair before the gentleman from Ohio even rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks otherwise.

Mr. LETCHER. Does the Chair so decide? The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does so decide.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, I appeal from the decision of the Chair, and leave it with the House to say whether I was not the first to address the Chair.

Mr. BOYCE. I hope my friend from Virginia will not press his question of order. He has frequently had the floor when he was not entitled to it. It has been usual for the Chair to regulate the matter of assigning the floor as he pleases.

Mr. LETCHER. I do not know that I ever got the floor when I was not entitled to it. I do not withdraw my appeal. I addressed the Chair clearly before any other member; and I insist that I shall be assigned the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. If I am entitled to the floor, I will proceed. If not, I will give way.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope my friend from Virginia will withdraw his question of order. It is really a question of fact, and I suggest to the gentleman that he submit to the ruling of the Chair in this respect, on the ground that the Chair has the right to determine. I do not suppose that it is generally done very fairly. I think it is the general understanding that there shall be a farming out of the floor as the Chair chooses to regulate it for the purpose of making speeches in committee. The gentleman from Virginia knows this very well, and I hope he will withdraw his question of order.

The Chair will have the rule governing the subject read.

The 33d rule was then read, as follows:

"33. When two or more members happen to rise at once, the Speaker shall name the member who is first to speak."

Mr. LETCHER. Very well. Now the question of order I raise, is, that I addressed the Chair before the gentleman from Ohio, and am therefore entitled to the floor.

Mr. PHELPS. Under this rule I hold that it has been the uniform practice of the House for the Speaker to assign the floor to whomsoever he sees fit. This has been the ruling in the House, and in committee. While I would like to hear my friend from Virginia upon the subject under discussion, I cannot go with him in reversing the practice and rule of the committee.

Mr. NICHOLS. I ask the gentleman to give way for a moment and allow me to submit a proposition to the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. If I am entitled to the floor I desire to know it.

Mr. LETCHER. I am upon the floor. I first addressed the Chair, and the Chair should have recognized me.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I call the gentleman from Virginia to order.

Mr. LETCHER. I am certainly upon the floor upon my appeal, and I mean to have a vote upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the gentleman from Virginia is out of order.

Mr. LETCHER. Have not I the right to take an appeal?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the right to appeal from the decision of the Chair; but the appeal is not debatable.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a question of order—that an appeal cannot be taken from the decision of the Chair upon such a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the question of order of the gentleman from Georgia. The gentleman from Virginia has, in the opinion of the Chair, the right to take an appeal.

Mr. SEWARD. I insist that the gentleman has no right to take an appeal, and that the Chair should not entertain the appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the question of order.

Mr. BRANCH. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from North Carolina has not the floor to make that motion, and cannot obtain it without the consent of the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield for that purpose?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. No, sir. I give way for nothing but the question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia insist upon his appeal?

Mr. LETCHER. I do insist; and before the vote is taken, I ask the Chair to state whether I was not the first to address him? [Loud cries of "Order!" and confusion.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be allowed, as it is his privilege, to make a statement. The question of order raised by the gentleman from Virginia involves a question of fact which the committee is to decide. In awarding the floor to the gentleman from Ohio, the Chair acted honestly, according to the best of his judgment. He assigns the floor to the gentleman from Ohio; and from this decision the gentleman from Virginia takes an appeal.

Mr. LETCHER. Do I understand the Chair to state that he saw the gentleman from Ohio first?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so stated.

Mr. LETCHER. Then I withdraw my appeal.

Mr. NICHOLS. I now ask the consent of my colleague to submit a proposition to the committee in reference to the extension of time for this debate to proceed. [Cries of "Order!" "You can't do that!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the extension of time is a subject over which this committee has no control. The gentleman from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, it is with some reluctance that I rise to speak to a question not now directly before the House. But, sir, as I know that the Lecompton constitution will soon be presented, and that an earnest effort will be made to admit Kansas into the Union as a State under it, I avail myself, for the first time, of the laxity of the rules in the committee, to state my opinions upon that subject. Another reason why I engage in this debate is, that I have received from the Governor of Ohio the resolutions of the Legislature of that State, requesting me, as one of the Representatives, "to vote against the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton, or any other constitution, that has not proceeded from the people by a clear delegation of power to the convention to form and put in operation such constitution, without a further sanction of the people, or which has not been submitted to, and approved by, a vote of the people."

This request is entirely consistent with my sense of duty, with the wishes of the Republican party, and the general sentiment of the people of my native State. It is said to be the product of a Democratic caucus; at any rate, it received the unanimous vote of the Democratic members of the Ohio Legislature. Although I seldom speak for that party, or act with it, and owe it no allegiance, yet, in this case, it will give me great pleasure to comply with the request.

There have been so many irritating incidents connected with Kansas from its organization as a Territory, that it is difficult to discuss any question relating to it with due moderation and temper. We have been compelled, as legislators, again and again to examine the disgraceful events which compose its history. Though these were for a time disputed, few among us would risk their reputation by doing so now. The irritation of the past is increased, rather than diminished, by the application now made to admit Kansas into the Union as a slave State, against the recent vote and the known will of a large majority of her people.

This application comes to us with the sanction of the President, and it is our duty to examine it with the attention its importance demands. The Constitution of the United States gives to Congress, and to Congress alone, the power to admit new States. The only qualifications to this general power is, that no new State shall be formed within the jurisdiction of any other State, nor by the junction of two or more States or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of Congress. This provision of the Constitution is the only one that refers exclusively to the power to admit new States. That which guarantees to every State a republican form of government applies to the old States as well as the new; and, therefore, if any of the old States should so radically change their State constitution as to adopt other than a republican form of government, the guarantee would require the interference of the United States. It is but a part of that section which secures all the States against invasion and domestic violence. As against the old States it could only be enforced by military power; but as against a State applying for admission it would be enforced simply by refusing the application. It does not limit the general power to admit new States; but is one of many reasons which, if true, would justify Congress to refuse the application.

The general power to admit new States is indispensably necessary in our system of government. The framers of the Constitution wisely considered that it might be trusted to Congress as the direct representative of the States and the people. It is a power that never has been abused. Under it eighteen States have already been admitted; and the Old Thirteen have, by peaceful constitutional progress, extended the national jurisdiction and institutions over thirty-one sister States, extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from the St. Croix to the Rio Del Norte.

And, sir, during this peaceful progress, no particular forms have been imposed upon the new States. The application need not come from the territorial government; it need not be authorized by a previous enabling act of Congress. It is only necessary that it emanate from the people of the new States; that it embody their will; is presented with their sanction and approval; and is republican in form. This simple principle was stated by Mr. Buchanan in the Senate of the United States, in 1835:

"It has been our practice heretofore to treat our infant Territories with parental care, to nurse them with kindness, and when they had attained the age of manhood, to admit them into the family without requiring from them a rigid adherence to forms. The great questions to be decided are: Do they contain a sufficient population? Have they adopted a republican constitution? And are they willing to enter the Union upon the terms which we propose? If so, all the preliminary proceedings have been considered but mere forms, which we have waived in repeated instances. They are but the scaffolding of the building, which is of no further use after the edifice is complete. We have pursued this course in regard to Tennessee, to Arkansas, and even to Michigan."

Such, sir, were the opinions of the President twenty-three years ago; and I propose now to examine how far these precepts have been applied to Kansas. Has she been treated with parental care? Has she been nursed with kindness? Have her people adopted this constitution? Are we asked to waive forms and technicalities, and comply only with the will of her people? Sir, these questions embrace the whole merits of the proposition before us, and their true answer will show how great a wrong we are called upon by the President to perpetrate.

And here, at the outset, I will state the radical difference between those with whom I act and that portion of the Democratic party who, with us, oppose this constitution. They insist that the territorial government established by Congress was subverted with fraud and violence; that the so-called first Legislative Assembly was a usurpation, which no recognition could cure—one which it was a patriotic duty of the people to resist and overthrow, peaceably if they could, forcibly if they must, and which, in fact, has been practically overthrown; that the convention was a mere emanation from the usurpation, and, therefore, not entitled to any consideration whatever. On the other hand, those who agree with the distinguished Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] recognize the convention as a legal body, and base their opposition to the constitution wholly upon the refusal of the convention to submit the constitution to a vote of the people. Sir, I admire the boldness and ability shown by that Senator in maintaining his position. I can appreciate the indignant earnestness with which he seeks to defend the act of which he is the author. He has placed himself in the breach, and has risked his reputation and hopes in the future by the effort to secure to the people of Kansas a fair vote upon the adoption of a constitution. He has portrayed in striking colors the fraud and special pleading by which a reckless cabal in the Territory, aided by the President, seek to establish a constitution, in utter disregard of the will of the people. For this I admire him, and the country has given him the full measure of praise. But, sir, we cannot forget that he was the leading spirit in the repeal of the Missouri compromise, the cause of all the strife that followed; that when the territorial government was usurped by means of armed invasions, he excused, palliated, and defended them; that when the people of the Territory complained of fraud and outrage, he met them with denial, or, when that became impossible, with sneers and ridicule. All the reckless acts of the administration of President Pierce found in him their ablest defender; it was his influence that secured the election of President Buchanan; it was his opposition in the Senate that procured the defeat of the acts of the last House of Representatives, intended to secure to the people of Kansas their admitted rights. Even after it was shown that the faction whose acts he had maintained could command less than eighteen hundred votes in favor of members of a constitutional convention, after more than half the counties in the Territory were entirely disfranchised—he still maintained their authority. It was not until this faction was overthrown, in October last, that the Senator recurred to what he now declares to be the fundamental principles of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, that the will of the people shall govern. We will not stop to inquire why, through so many years of misrule and violence, this principle was held in abeyance; why it was not applied when Missouri furnished the legislators and voters of Kansas; why the Army of the United States was necessary to restrain it? This theory was proclaimed in 1854 to excuse the repeal of the Missouri compromise. We have been steadily and earnestly endeavoring to secure to the people of Kansas this right, and have, throughout the contest, been opposed by three formidable powers—a large portion of the citizens of Western Missouri, the Army of the United States, and the Democratic party, led by none more ably than the Senator from Illinois. We are happy, sir, that our principles are now approved by very many citizens of Missouri—that we do not fear the Army—and that we shall hereafter have the benefit of the votes and influence, as well as of the theories, of a large portion of the Democratic party.

But, sir, it must be understood that the Republican party stands now where it has stood from the beginning. While we maintain the power of Congress over the Territories, yet, ever since this power was so unwisely surrendered in the organization of the Territory of Kansas, we have felt that, from the character of the Senate, this power could not be exercised until Kansas would apply for admission as a State; and therefore we accepted the contest before the people. We have steadily maintained that the popular will must not be defeated by fraud and violence. We have persistently demanded a fair vote, a fair election, and have shown conclusively that in such an event the contest in Kansas would be settled as we wish it settled—in favor of free institutions.

But it was obvious from the beginning that those who provoked this contest would not submit to the will of the people. While proclaiming popular sovereignty they uniformly overthrew it by fraud and violence. On the other hand, the Republicans in Kansas, while insisting on the power of Congress, uniformly demanded a fair election, and only resisted a palpable usurpation. The first legislative election was held on the 30th day of March, 1855. Both parties were prepared to contest it at the polls. There were then but two thousand nine hundred and five legal voters in the Territory, scattered over a large region of country, and, as was conclusively shown by proof, these electors would, if left to their undisturbed choice, have sent to each branch of the Assembly a majority in favor of free institutions. They would have practically reenacted the Missouri restriction, so far as Kansas was concerned, and thus have practically restored this question to where it was prior to 1854. But to defeat this result, and no other, (for no other motive could have induced the act,) an organized movement was set on foot in Western Missouri. It was gathered in secret lodges; and assuming the form of a military force, it invaded the Territory of Kansas. Companies of men were arrayed in irregular parties and sent into every council district in the Territory, and into every representative district but one. They went to vote, and with the avowed design to make Kansas a slave State.

I do not propose to spend any time in detailing events so familiar to the country, and so disgraceful to our national honor. It is sufficient to say that the poll-books of the election show that six thousand three hundred and seven votes were cast; and that of these only eight hundred and ninety-eight are shown on the census rolls as legal voters. Four thousand nine hundred and seven were proved to be residents of Missouri. The residence of about five hundred was not conclusively shown, but many of them were no doubt settlers who had arrived in the Territory after the census was taken. By these means the candidates voted for by the Missourians, many of whom were then citizens of Missouri, were thrust upon the people of Kansas as a Legislative Assembly, armed with all the power conferred upon the people by the organic law. It was a USURPATION, sir, which it was the highest patriotism to war against with every means with which the God of nature has furnished a free people. It was a declaration of war, to resist which the law of nations and the right of self-preservation authorized the use of stratagem, artifice, and open force.

These principles are recognized in Grotius, the highest authority on the law of nations, and are necessary for the maintenance of republican institutions. And, sir, the people have only been restrained by prudence and the power wielded by the national Executive. Submission was out of the question. I regard it as the highest compliment I can pay that people, that, from the 30th of March, 1855, to this hour, they have never thought of submission; but have, in various ways, resisted and paralyzed the usurpation, and have now completely overthrown it. The only fault I have to find with them is, that they hesitated to avail themselves of even the forms of bogus law to overthrow the substance. In a war like that inaugurated on the 30th of March, I would not chaffer about the means, but keep only in view the great principle of our fathers, that resistance to tyranny is submission to God. Amidst all the denunciation that has been heaped upon the free-State men of Kansas, I desire to record my firm conviction that they have, by their prudence and courage in resisting and overthrowing usurpation, done more to secure our republican institutions against fraud and violence than any other portion of the people of the United States since the formation of our Government. They exemplified the declaration of the Kansas committee, that "it is not to be tolerated that a legislative body thus elected should assume or exercise any legislative functions; and their enactments should be regarded as null and void."

Sir, they never were of any practical force, and from the beginning have been met with an open, organized resistance. If you attempt to continue them, by adopting this constitution, you must prepare to enforce them by arms, and by a contest in which every principle of your Government, and every aspiration of liberty, will be against you.

There are but three modes of resistance, all of which have been resorted to. The first was the organization of a government emanating directly from the people, and in hostility to the usurpation. This was commenced immediately after the invasion, by a memorial to Congress. But as this body was not in session, steps were soon taken to organize a State government, preparatory to admission into the Union as a State. The first general meeting of the people was held at Lawrence, on the 15th of August, 1855, and was followed by other popular assemblies. These resulted in the election of members of a constitutional convention, which met at Topeka on the 23d of October, and framed a State Constitution. This proceeding, like any other effort of the people to form a State government, was necessarily inoperative until it received the sanction of Congress; and was so regarded by those who took part in it. It was, however, regular and fair—every stage of it receiving the sanction of the people. From that time to this it has continued by regular elections; and now, when the usurpation has passed away, is in session, and may pronounce the requiem of its adversary. The application for admission was presented to Congress, and after full debate and examination a bill admitting Kansas as a State under the constitution adopted at Topeka, passed this House on the 3d of July, 1856, by a vote of 99 yeas to 97 nays, but was defeated in the Senate.

The Topeka movement always kept within the bounds of law. While it acted in open defiance of what was called bogus laws—namely, the enactments of the usurping Legislative Assembly—it scrupulously respected the acts of Congress. Its proceedings were only to take effect in case the application for admission as a State was granted by Congress. If, however, the bogus laws had been generally enforced, a code of laws would have been adopted under the Topeka constitution, and a collision would have been inevitable. This was known to Governor Walker and the pro-slavery leaders, and tended much to check any attempt to enforce the bogus laws.

Another mode of resisting this usurpation was by a refusal to pay taxes, or to obey the alleged laws in any way. This mode of resistance to tyranny is a familiar one in the history of every free Government. Hampden refused to pay ship money, and although a facile judiciary held it legal, yet his steady resistance contributed to the overthrow of Charles I. Our revolutionary fathers refused to recognize the claim of Parliament to levy taxes upon its colonies, and entered into non-importation agreements and various other measures to defeat the taxes, before the final resort to war. And so successful were the people of Kansas in this mode of resistance, that, to this day, the amount of taxes collected would not pay half the expenses of the collection; and it is said that many of the active agents of the usurpation have impoverished themselves in the vain effort to enforce the law. In most civil contests the judges are the subservient tools of the executive power. Such was the case in the revolutions in England, and in our own revolutionary struggle. Such has repeatedly been the case under the Constitution of the United States. The judges in Kansas are no exception to the rule. They are appointed by the President, hold their office at his pleasure, and uniformly upheld the worst acts of the usurpation. But in vain did they exercise their judicial power to enforce the bogus laws.

The only mode by which those laws could be enforced was by the employment of United States troops. The military power was the only effective instrument. Shannon, Woodson, Geary, and Walker, as Governors of Kansas, were in turn compelled to acknowledge that they could not enforce the laws except by the troops. Other means were tried in vain. A call by a civil officer for a posse comitatus only brought to his aid the citizens of an adjoining State. In two important instances—in December, 1855, and in September, 1856—the strange spectacle was presented of armed bodies of men marching from Missouri into Kansas, to aid in enforcing alleged laws in Kansas which the people of that Territory repudiated and resisted with open force. This singular proceeding, if it had been persisted in, would have lit up the flames of civil war from one end of the Union to the other. Although the contest was unequal, the people of Kansas never yielded to this invasive force; and in all cases the invaders made a sullen retreat without accomplishing their purposes. But wherever the troops of the United States appeared, then the people could yield without dishonor. However excited, they never resisted the majesty of the United States Government.

The submission was to the United States authorities, but never to the usurpation. The only government existing in Kansas was a military government, and the usurpation was utterly overthrown by the voluntary action of the people, except so far as it was sustained by military power. That such was the condition of affairs in Kansas is shown fully by the documents submitted to us by the President.

Governor Geary, in his letter to the President, of November 22, 1856, says:

"When I arrived here the entire Territory was declared by the acting Governor to be in a state of insurrection; the civil authority was powerless, and so complicated by partisan affiliations as to be without capacity to vindicate the majesty of the law, and restore the broken peace."

Governor Walker, in his letter to the Secretary of State, of July 20, 1857, says:

"There is imminent danger, unless the territorial government is sustained by a large body of the troops of the United States, that, for all practical purposes, it will be overthrown or reduced to a condition of absolute imbecility. I am constrained, therefore, to inform you that, with a view to sustain the authority of the United States in this Territory, it is indispensably necessary that we should have immediately stationed at Fort Leavenworth at least two thousand regular troops, and that General Harney should be retained in command. These troops, as far as practicable, should consist mainly of dragoons, as celerity of movement to different points is very important. We should also have at least two batteries, including Sherman's battery now at Fort Snelling."

"Permit me, before closing this communication, to renew my statement that such is the revolutionary condition of affairs in Kansas, that the territorial government is in imminent danger of overthrow, if I am not sustained by at least two thousand troops, chiefly dragoons, and two batteries. The presence of such a body of troops would probably prevent a conflict."

Again, in his letter of August 3d, 1857, he urges a reinforcement to the already large body of troops in the Territory:

"It is now, however, clearly ascertained that, but for this prompt movement of the troops to Lawrence, insurrectionary local governments, by towns, cities, and counties, would have been organized ere this throughout the Territory. The spirit of insurrection, of resistance to the laws, and to the territorial government, still pervades Kansas, and manifests itself in their newspapers, in violent harangues, in the enrollment and drilling of their troops, and in open threats for the use of the insurgent forces at the October election. Menaces, indeed, have been made in the most public manner, to drive the constitutional convention by force in September next from Leecompton. Under these circumstances, it becomes my duty to renew my request, so often made, that two thousand regular troops, chiefly mounted men, should be sent immediately into Kansas, together with two batteries."

The Secretary of State, by his letter of September 1, 1857, acknowledges the necessity of a military force:

"I learn from him [the Secretary of War] that, in addition to the four companies now in Kansas, eighteen companies are on the march for that Territory, and that fourteen other companies have been ordered for the same destination, making thirty-six companies in the whole, and comprising a force of about two thousand men. I cannot anticipate a state of things which can render a greater force than this necessary to the assertion of the supremacy of the law in Kansas."

Thus it appears that the usurpation, commenced by the invasion of March 30, 1855, was reduced to utter imbecility, except so far as it was sustained by the military power.

It only remains to record its final overthrow. It had sought to perpetuate its power by appointing all the local officers—sheriffs, clerks, justices, &c. But by the organic law the House was elected for one year, and the Council for two years. In violation of law this time had been extended, practically, for near three years. The Council elected in March, 1855, held over until October, 1857; so that, during all this period, the rights secured to the people by the organic law were suspended. The election in October, 1857, was the first moment they could resume their rights without an open resistance to United States troops. But so bitter was the hostility of the people to the usurpation that they feared their voting might be construed into some kind of an acknowledgment of its legality. Rather than make this, even by inference, they would have put in force the Topeka constitution. But they were relieved from any appearance of yielding by the authoritative declaration of Governor Walker, in his speech, made at Topeka in June, 1857:

"In October next, not under the act of the Territorial Legislature, but under the laws of Congress, you—the whole people of Kansas—have a right to elect a Delegate to Congress, and to elect a Territorial Legislature."

It is true that Governor Walker subsequently attempted to qualify this language by inserting the important word "only," so that it would read: "In October next, not only under," &c.

This was a mere evasion. The people claimed no right under the legislative enactments, but denied their legality. The act of Congress gave them a right to elect a Legislature; and the only laws of the Territory they recognized were the Constitution of the United States and the acts of Congress. Their position was entirely consistent with the formal proclamation of Governor Walker, of September 10, 1857, in which he says:

"The people of Kansas have now, therefore, an opportunity, in conformity with the Constitution of the United States, the organic act of Congress, and the laws of this Territory, to decide, by the elective franchise, the choice of their delegates to Congress, their Territorial Legislature, and all their county officers."

The question of voting at the October election was fully considered by conventions of the people, at all of which the authority of the Legislature was denied.

Thus, at a convention of the people, held at Topeka, on the 15th of July, 1857, the following resolution was adopted:

"Whereas, Governor Walker, in his speech at Topeka, as reported in the 'Kansas Statesman,' of June 9, holds the following language: 'In October next, not under the act of the late Territorial Legislature, but under the laws of Congress, you, the whole people of Kansas, have a right to elect a Delegate to Congress and to elect a Territorial Legislature'; and whereas, Governor Walker has on various occasions used similar language: and whereas, under the above decision, 'the whole people of Kansas' may participate in an election for Delegate for Congress and for members of the Territorial Legislature without recognizing the validity of a bogus Legislature imposed upon them by fraud and by force: Therefore resolved—

"X. That we recommend to the people of Kansas that they assemble in mass convention at Grasshopper Falls on the last Wednesday in August, to take such action as may be necessary with regard to that election."

The delegate and mass conventions, held at Grasshopper Falls on the 26th of August, in pursuance of this call, passed the following resolutions:

"Whereas, it is of the most vital importance to the people of Kansas, that the territorial government should be controlled by the bona fide citizens thereof; and whereas, Governor Walker has repeatedly pledged himself that the people of Kansas shall have a full and fair vote at the election to be held on the first Monday in October, for Delegate to Congress, members of the Territorial Legislature, and other officers: Therefore,

"Resolved, That we, the people of Kansas, in mass convention assembled, agree to participate in said election.

"Resolved, That in thus acting, we rely upon the faithful fulfillment of the pledge of Governor Walker, and that we, as heretofore, protest against the enactments forced upon us by the votes of the people of Missouri.

"Resolved, That this mass meeting express their unalterable determination to adhere to the Topeka constitution and government, and that all our action shall be pointed toward setting that government in motion in a legitimate manner at an early date."

Such was the position of the people, maintained without compromise or concession. I need not repeat the results of the election. It is sufficient to say that the usurpation was entirely overthrown. The faction that had so long ruled the Territory, could command but two thousand five hundred votes; about one half of the invading force from Missouri, in March, 1855. But true to its instincts, it sought to control the elections, by frauds at Kickapoo, Oxford, and McGee, of the most shameless character. At Kickapoo, near one thousand votes were voted, and but a small portion were legal. From Oxford, an insignificant village in Johnson county, sixteen hundred and twenty-eight votes were returned; the names were copied in alphabetical order from a Cincinnati Directory, and include the names of many well known citizens of the State of Ohio, and among the rest that of the Governor of Ohio. The county of Johnson is part of an Indian reserve not open for settlement; I crossed it in 1856, and did not see a white man in it, except those traveling on the road. Judge Cato, in his letter to Governor Geary, of October 29, 1856, says:

"Johnson county has not as yet had a sufficient white population to make either a grand or petit jury, and no business requiring a jury has been done in that county."

And yet, in October, 1857, more votes were returned from a single precinct in it than were cast in Leavenworth or Lawrence. Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton, who had overlooked this important city with so large a voting population, describe a visit to it in their proclamation to the people of Kansas, of the date of October 19, 1857:

"Accordingly, we went to the precinct of Oxford, (which is a village with six houses, including stores, and without a tavern,) and ascertained from the citizens of that vicinity, and especially those of the handsome adjacent village of New Santa Fé, in Missouri, (separated only by a street, and containing about twenty houses,) that altogether not more than one tenth the number of persons represented to have voted were present on the two days of the election, much the smaller number, not exceeding thirty or forty, being present on the last day, when more than fifteen hundred votes are represented as having been given. The people of Oxford, as well as those of the neighboring village of Santa Fé, were astounded at the magnitude of the return; and all persons, of all parties, in both places, treated the whole affair with derision or indignation, not having heard the alleged result until several days after it had occurred."

And yet upon these spurious, fictitious, and fraudulent returns, the convention whose action we are called upon to indorse, base their apportionment for members of a State Legislature. From the county of McGee returns were sent in containing more than twelve hundred votes. This, also, was an Indian reserve, with a sparse population, giving in June last but fourteen votes. It was an unorganized county, attached for civil purposes to the county of Bourbon.

It was by such means the usurping faction in Kansas sought to continue their power; but it was all in vain. A Legislative Assembly, fairly representing the people of Kansas, now wields all legislative power, and is now engaged in extirpating all traces of the usurpation.

And now, sir, when popular sovereignty is for the first time practically in force in Kansas, the President calls upon us to supersede it by a device of the usurpation. We are asked to invest the very faction thus defeated and overthrown by the people, with the power of a State government based upon the action of the bogus Legislature, and upon the subsequent frauds. The legislation of the people is to be defeated by the direct intervention of Congress. We are asked to sanction all the frauds and violence of the past. Sir, heretofore this intervention has been confined to the executive and judicial departments of the Government. It was the Executive power that removed successive Governors whenever they exhibited a spark of sympathy with the people of Kansas. It is that power which has imposed upon them Calhoun, Emery, Lecompt, Cato, Clarkson, Murphy, and id genus omne. But now the intervention of Congress is asked to force an organic law upon the people against their will.

Sir, you tell us you want peace; that you are tired of Kansas; want time to devote to other great interests of the country. Well, sir, we take you at your word. Give us peace; leave Kansas alone to the enjoyment of that liberty for which she has struggled so long and so well. Let us take no further thought of her, but leave her to herself. But, sir, while you cry, "Peace! Peace!" you thrust upon her an organic law, which she rejects, and you compel her to resort to revolution to overthrow it. While you cry peace, you station armies all over her prairies to overawe her people; and what is worse to a free people, you force laws upon her which she rejects and detests. And, sir, this odious tyranny is sustained by a system of technical pleading worthy of the age of Littleton or Coke, when government was based upon the maxim "that the king can do no wrong." Let us examine it.

The President at the outset assumes two propositions, neither of which is correct. The first is, that the Legislative Assembly is a valid one; the second is, that without express authority of Congress, it may call a convention, and through it bind the people to a constitution not submitted to them. Here, sir, is no reference to the people; no reference to their inalienable rights. The doctrine of estoppel is thrust in their face, and they are required to look to the Territorial Legislature as the source, the origin, the exclusive possessor of all their rights.

The legality of the Territorial Legislature is based not upon the authority of the people, but exclusively upon the allegation that Congress had recognized it as valid. This allegation is thus stated in the letter of the President to the Connecticut clergymen:

"It is quite true that a controversy had previously arisen respecting the validity of the election of members of the Territorial Legislature and of the laws passed by them; but at the time I entered upon my official duties, Congress had recognized this Legislature in different enactments."

Now, sir, I deny that Congress has ever recognized the legality of this Legislature; and am surprised that such an assumption was made by the President.

That President Pierce recognized that Legislature, and sought to enforce their enactments with United States troops, is admitted; but it will be as readily admitted that the President cannot make laws, or impose laws by recognition upon the people of Kansas. I admit that the Senate recognized that Legislature at the same time that many of its leading members, including the present Secretary of State, denounced their acts as infamous. But, sir, the Representatives of the people in this House never recognized it as a valid one; and as this is an important allegation, I invite the attention of the House to the action of the House during the last Congress.

The attention of the House was early drawn to this subject. Under a resolution of the House, adopted on the 19th of March, 1856, a committee was sent to Kansas especially charged to examine "in regard to any fraud or force attempted or practiced in reference to any of the elections which have taken place in said Territory, either under the law organizing said Territory, or under any pretended law which may be alleged to have taken effect therein since." Upon the report of this committee, the bill to admit Kansas as a State under the Topeka constitution, already referred to, and which was based upon the position that the acts of the Legislative Assembly were null and void, passed this House. On the 27th of July, 1856, this House, by the decided vote of 88 yeas to 74 nays, passed the bill, commonly known as Dunn's bill, which denied the validity of the Legislature; declared their acts void; provided for the dismissal of all prosecutions under them; and forbid any prosecution for any violation or disregard of the enactments of that body at any time. This was the deliberate judgment of the House and was afterwards constantly adhered to. The House, by a great number of votes, refused to make any appropriation for the compensation and mileage of this Legislative Assembly. This was done on the 14th of August, 1856, by the vote of 90 yeas to 97 nays, and was persisted in until the Senate yielded, and the appropriation for that purpose was stricken from the legislative appropriation bill. I defy gentlemen to point me out any law, anywhere, by which the last Congress authorized the payment of money to the first Kansas Legislature. It is true that, in the last session, in the bill making appropriations for the ordinary legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1858, the ordinary appropriation was made for the expenses of the Kansas Legislature; but, sir, this money could not be used, without a clear violation of law, to pay the expenses of the bogus Legislature. The appropriation was expressly for the year commencing July 1, 1857, and ending June 30, 1858. It was for the Legislature to be convened and held between those dates. Such a Legislature was elected, in October last, under the organic law, and is the one now in session.

Months before this appropriation commenced to run, the bogus Legislature had adjourned, and had only sought to propagate itself through a constitutional convention. And if, sir, the President has diverted the appropriation for the Legislative Assembly for the current year, to pay the expenses of the old, rejected, dishonored body, whose functions had ceased before the current year commenced, he has done it in clear violation of law, and, whatever may be our party predilections, should be impeached by this House.

Sir, this appropriation for a Legislative Assembly in Kansas for the current year ending June 30, 1858, during which the illegal Legislature was not in session, and the steady refusal of the House, finally concurred in by the Senate, to appropriate money for the year during which it was in session, instead of being construed into a recognition of that body, is a decision of both branches of Congress against its validity.

Nor can the admission of General Whitfield, at the last session, as a Delegate, be construed into a recognition of that Legislature. At the first session, both he and Governor Reeder were rejected, because neither was elected under valid law, and the House could not determine which received the greater number of legal votes. At an election in October, 1856, to fill the acknowledged vacancy, no one was voted for but General Whitfield, and no one appeared to claim the seat but him. Under these circumstances, without considering whether the law, under which he was elected, was valid or invalid, he might be admitted; and his admission would raise no implication for or against the law.

But, sir, the last House did not leave this question to implication. On the 17th day of February, 1857, it passed, by the decided vote of 98 yeas to 79 nays, a bill for the relief of the people of Kansas, introduced by Mr. Grow; the preamble of this bill was agreed to by a vote of 95 yeas to 68 nays. To show the clear, decided repudiation by the House of this legislation, I will read the preamble and first section

"Whereas the President of the United States transmitted to the House, by message, a printed pamphlet purporting to be the laws of the Territory of Kansas, passed at Shawnee Mission, in said Territory: and whereas unjust and unwarranted test oaths are prescribed by said laws as a qualification for voting or holding office in said Territory: and whereas the committee of investigation sent by the House to Kansas report that said Legislature was not elected by the legal voters of Kansas, but was forced upon them by non residents, in violation of the organic act of the Territory, and having thus usurped legislative power, it enacted cruel and oppressive laws: Therefore,

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all rules or regulations purporting to be laws, or in the form of law, adopted at Shawnee Mission, in the Territory of Kansas, by a body of men claiming to be the Legislative Assembly of said Territory, and all acts and proceedings whatsoever of said Assembly, are hereby declared invalid, and of no binding force or effect."

This bill passed the House but a little more than two weeks before the adjournment, when the President took the oath of office. It was never reconsidered, but was the final and deliberate judgment of the House. How the President could, in the face of this act, assume that Congress, of which the House is the important part, had recognized this Legislature in different enactments, is beyond my comprehension. Sir, I call upon the friends of the President to make good this bold assertion, or the whole string of technicalities by which he supports the Lecompton constitution is worse than a broken reed.

The other assumption of the President—that a Territorial Legislature may call a convention, who may put into operation a constitution without its submission to the people—my time will not allow me fully to discuss. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. Douglas] has called it a fundamental error, which lies at the foundation of the whole argument of the President. With due deference to such high authorities, I think the fundamental error is in recognizing the Territorial Legislature as having any authority at all; but as the Senator is committed by his action in the past upon this point, I will only express my concurrence with him, that in this proposition the President has committed a second fundamental error. And, sir, I wish to call the attention of the House to the speech of the President already quoted. He there says:

"No Senator will pretend that their Territorial Legislature had any right whatever to pass laws enabling the people to elect delegates to a convention for the purpose of forming a State constitution. It was an act of usurpation on their part."

Contrast this opinion, twenty-three years ago, which no Senator would then contest, with the message. Then it was an act of usurpation for a Territorial Legislature to call a convention. Now a Territorial Legislature is so potent that Congress cannot require the constitution to be submitted to the people. Then the usurpation was utterly void unless sanctioned by the people. Now it is so potent as to override the will of the people. But passing this singular inconsistency, I desire, for the few minutes I have left, to call the attention of the House to the history and character of the Lecompton convention.

The act authorizing it was the act of the bogus (I trust the House will pardon the use of a word not to be found in any dictionary, but it expresses my meaning) Legislative Assembly of Kansas. It was passed by that body just two days after the House, by a decisive vote, declared its acts invalid, and of no binding force or effect. Every act to be done under it was to be done by its creatures—persons selected, not by the people, but by it. The sheriffs and probate judges, or deputies appointed by one of them, were to make the lists of voters, and no person was permitted to vote unless his name was upon the list. The whole election was to be managed, controlled, and returned by these deputies of a power whose position was attained by an illegal election. Thus the people had no control over the election; and even if its officers had obeyed the act, the source of their authority would have cast suspicion upon their acts. But the act was not obeyed by them. Governor Walker thus states the facts in one of the documents submitted to us by the President:

"On reference to the territorial law under which the convention was assembled, thirty-four regularly organized counties were named as election districts for delegates to the convention. In each and all of these counties it was required by law that a census should be taken and the voters registered; and when this was completed the delegates to the convention should be apportioned accordingly. In nineteen of these counties there was no census, and therefore there could be no such apportionment there of delegates based upon such census. And in fifteen of these counties there was no registry of voters. These fifteen counties, including many of the oldest organized counties of the Territory, were entirely disfranchised, and did not give (and by no fault of their own) could not give a solitary vote for delegates to the convention. This result was superinduced by the fact that the Territorial Legislature appointed all the sheriffs and probate judges in all these counties, to whom was assigned the duty by law of making this census and registry. These officers were political partisans, dissenting from the views and opinions of the people of these counties, as proved by the election in October last. These officers, from want of funds, as they allege, neglected or refused to take any census or make any registry in these counties, and therefore they were entirely disfranchised, and could not and did not give a single vote at the election for delegates to the constitutional convention. These nineteen counties in which there was no census, constituted a majority of the counties of the Territory, and these fifteen counties in which there was no registry, gave a much larger vote at the October election, even with the six months' qualification, than the whole vote given to the delegates who signed the Lecompton constitution on the 7th November last."

The registry law was executed, and voters were registered in fourteen counties only, namely, Johnson, Lykins, Lynn, Bourbon, Douglas, Shawnee, Doniphan, Atchison, Leavenworth, Jefferson, Nemaha, Calloun, Marshall, and Riley. In these fourteen counties the registry was grossly inaccurate. A large portion of the best known settlers were omitted, and many non-residents were included. The result was that, at the election, out of a voting population of about fifteen thousand, less than eighteen hundred votes were cast for the members of the convention. And this was not occasioned simply by a neglect to vote, by an indifference as to the result, for several times as many persons were disfranchised in the counties where the registry was not taken and where it was imperfectly taken, as voted at the election.

When the meagerness of this vote was known through the country, it was generally supposed that the convention would never meet, that the members themselves would abandon the movement. For some time a quorum could not be got together, and finally an adjournment was carried until after the October election. It cannot be doubted that if the Kickapoo, Oxford, and McGee frauds had been successful, the convention would have been abandoned as an abortion. But the cabal saw the scepter departing, and knew that the new Legislature would remove all traces of previous attempted legislation. Then, and not till then, the desperate expedient was resorted to of putting in force a State government and thus superseding the new Territorial Legislature. This could only be done through the action of the convention by framing a constitution and putting it in force without a submission to the people. But in the way of this reckless scheme there were many difficulties. There was the imbibed hostility of the people who looked upon the convention as the only residuum of the old tyranny, and who would but for the United States troops have scattered its members by force. There was the promise of the President, in his letter of March 30, 1857, appointing Governor Walker, that the constitution should be submitted to the people of the Territory, that they must be protected in the exercise of their right of voting for or against that instrument, and that the fair expression of the popular will must not be defeated by fraud or violence. There was the inaugural address of Governor Walker, that unless the convention submit the constitution to the vote of all the resident settlers of Kansas, and the election be fairly and justly conducted, the constitution will be, and ought to be, rejected by Congress; and that Kansas never can be brought into the Union, with or without slavery, except by a previous solemn decision, fully, freely, and fairly made by a majority of her people in voting for or against the adoption of her State constitution. There were his repeated speeches and promises to the people of Kansas, made with the sanction of the Administration, that the constitution must be submitted to the people, or he and they would assist in its defeat. There was the organic law of the Territory, the party cry—the shibboleth of popular sovereignty, that the people were to be perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way. There was the recent action of the Democratic party in Kansas sustaining Walker and pledging the party that the constitution should be submitted to the ratification of the people. There was the pledge of the president of the convention, and many of the leading delegates, that the constitution should be submitted. There was the danger of the destruction of the Democratic party, without whose potent aid the whole scheme of villainy would be defeated. There was the certainty of civil war in the Territory if the attempt was made to impose this constitution without submission; and the certainty of a revolution to change it.

One would have supposed that the most desperate men would have been deterred by these obstacles. Yet they deliberately concocted a constitution, and now ask our aid to put it in force without a submission to the people, and against their known will. If this had been done directly, we must have given them credit for boldness; but, to relieve the Administration as far as was consistent with their great purpose, they submitted one clause only of the constitution, that relating to slavery, to the people. But before any one could exercise this poor privilege, he must vote "for the constitution," and swear to support it, if adopted. The vote must be "for the constitution with slavery," or "for the constitution without slavery." In any event, it must be for the constitution. One half of the promise of the President, Governor Walker, and the Democratic party, was fulfilled. They said the people should be protected in their right to vote for and against the constitution. Surely they ought to be satisfied if they were allowed to vote for it! If the people had been allowed to vote against the constitution, they would have been so unreasonable as to have voted that way, and that would have been a direct intervention, by the people, against the President! Is it not strange, sir, that the faction that marshaled three invasions, that controlled all power for three years in Kansas by force and fraud, that boasted of the Oxford, Kickapoo, and McGee frauds, should, in the last stage of its existence, be driven to so shallow an expedient to maintain their power; and that the President of the United States should sanction the fraud? Sir, this device was not for the people of Kansas, but it was pabulum for the President and the honest masses of the Democratic party in the northern States. Among the settlers it deceived no one; in the South it deceived no one. Whether the slavery clause was voted in or voted out, slavery was in the constitution and protected by it. The recent elections in Kansas show how they regard the whole scheme and its authors. Both are repudiated, rejected, and despised. They will resist it with stratagem, artifice, and open force. Under forms devised by their enemies they now have control of a trio of governments. They are now nursing a territorial and two State governments; but, if let alone, will soon supersede all these by a State government formed by a legal convention, and sanctioned by the people. They do not ask your intervention. When it might have saved them from fraud and violence you did not interfere, but allowed the President, with the whole power of the Government, to uphold an odious tyranny over them. Having overthrown this, they only ask to be let alone. They hold you to your words—NON-INTERVENTION AND THE WILL OF THE PEOPLE.

Sir, I am conscious that but for one event it would be in vain to resist the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution. It would be in vain to point to the invasion of March 30, 1855; to the illegal Territorial Legislature and its progeny; the constitutional convention; and to the innumerable frauds that form the history of both. All these would have been but as a rock in the way of a mountain torrent. They might have prolonged the struggle in this House, but experience has taught us that the interests of slavery and Federal patronage, when combined, can overcome all obstacles like honor, good faith, party promises, the will of the people, and the peace and prosperity of the country. When we met here I knew these were against us, and while prepared to resist, it was without hope. The Supreme Court had become the mere citadel of a local institution and was enthroned for life. The Senate, although much improved, was still against us. The message of the President only served to show that a struggle had taken place between his conscience and duty on the one hand, and his allegiance on the other; but that the result was against us. We knew that a majority of the Cabinet was from the South, and thus controlled the immense patronage of the Government. The signs of disaffection in high places, and among the northern Democrats were visible. But we knew the power of party drill and what weak pretexes would "correl" the disaffected. We knew that the Democratic party was in the ascendant, and this party everywhere was controlled by the superior numbers and sagacity of the southern branch of it; whose guiding star through storm and sunshine, through victory and defeat, was ever the same—the domination of slavery. Under these circumstances, what could we hope? If a slave constitution was presented, what did the "inner temple" of the dominant party care that fraud, violence, and civil war stood in the way; that honor, personal and party pledges forbid; that their rallying cry, the will of the people shall rule, was trampled upon. I expected, as a matter of course, to see northern Democrats wince and bear the yoke impatiently; but in due time we see them excuse and then applaud the notable device—of submitting a constitution to the people but requiring them to vote "for the constitution," and prohibiting all votes "against the constitution."

And, sir, now the only hope I have to defeat this constitution here is, that I can see no way in which slavery can, as the matter now stands, gain any practical advantage by indorsing this constitution. We now have the returns of the recent election. The returns of the vote on the 21st of December, on the submission scheme, show 6,063 "for the constitution with slavery," and 576 "for the constitution without slavery;" but included in the 6,063 are the following returns: Marysville, 232—a trading post one hundred and fifty miles from the Missouri river, and where there is scarce a settlement; Oxford, 1,266, and Shawnee, 729—both in Johnson county, and within an Indian reserve, where white men cannot settle; Delaware Crossing, a ferry station within the Delaware reservation, 254; and Kickapoo, a small village opposite Weston, 1,017; in all, 3,498. These returns are manifestly fraudulent and spurious; leaving but 2,565 "for the constitution with slavery." This number includes alleged illegal votes at Fort Scott, Leavenworth, Iowa Point, and other places; but I reject only those that are manifestly dictitious, as returns from places where three hundred legal votes could not have been given; and this miserable faction is represented by 2,565 votes. On the other hand, at a legal election held under authority of the Territorial Legislature, on the 4th of January, 1855, and certified by Governor Denver, a vote of 10,226, all confessedly legal votes, was polled against the Lecompton constitution.

Now, sir, if you dare, in the face of this vote, attempt to fasten upon the people of Kansas the Lecompton constitution, you will only deepen their hostility to it and to slavery, and enable them, by its speedy overthrow, to add another wreath to their well-earned laurels. They will resist you, and all the powers you can bring against them; and craven be he that would not aid them in the holy contest. Calhoun may, if he dare, certify and return a pro-slavery majority to both branches of the Legislature. The President may station troops in sight of every cabin. You may arm Lecompte and Cato with injunctions, attachments, writs of mandamus, and all the enginery of the law. You cannot force that people to submit to this constitution. They will resist it and overthrow it; and, sir, they will not be friendless and alone in this struggle.

But I trust that this dark cloud may pass away; that a returning sense of justice in southern Representatives, or some show of manly firmness in those from the North, will defeat this measure. I trust that the same sense of fraternal kindness that guided our fathers in their revolutionary struggle; that smoothed many difficulties in the formation of this Government; and, more potent than all else, that the guiding hand of Divine Providence may save our beloved country from the shock of civil strife, or civil revolution—the inevitable consequence of any further tyranny upon the people of Kansas.

In conclusion, allow me to impress the South with two important warnings she has received in her struggle for Kansas. One is, that though her able and disciplined leaders on this floor, aided by executive patronage, may give her the power to overthrow legislative compacts, yet, while the sturdy integrity of the northern masses stands in her way, she can gain no practical advantage by her well-laid schemes. The other is, that while she may indulge with impunity the spirit of filibusterism, or lawless and violent adventure, upon a feeble and distracted people in Mexico and Central America, she must not come in contact with that cool, determined courage and resolution which forms the striking characteristic of the Anglo-Saxon race. In such a contest, her hasty and impetuous violence may succeed for a time, but the victory will be short-lived and transient, and leave nothing but bitterness behind. Let us not war with each other; but, with the grasp of fellowship and friendship, regarding to the full each other's rights, and kind to each other's faults, let us go hand in hand in securing to every portion of our people their constitutional rights.

Mr. BURNETT obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. GREENWOOD, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 202) to appropriate money to supply deficiencies for the paper, printing, binding, and engraving, ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, and had come to no resolution thereon.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

Mr. HUGHES submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House, if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interest, all authentic and official information in his possession touching the present condition of affairs in Kansas.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved that the House adjourn.

On a division of the House, there were—ayes 63, noes 74.

Mr. CLINGMAN demanded tellers; tellers were not ordered.

So the House refused to adjourn.

WILKINS'S POINT.

Mr. HASKIN submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the special committee appointed by the House to investigate the sale and purchase of the Fort Snelling property be, and they are hereby, authorized to investigate the facts connected with the sale and purchase of property at Wilkins's Point, Queens county, New York, purchased by the Government during the year 1857, for fortification purposes, with the same instructions and powers, as are conferred upon them by the resolution creating said committee.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I will not object to this resolution. But I wish to inquire of its mover upon what ground it is based. There seems to be a delicacy in the House in reference to matters of this kind. Three select committees have been raised already, without objection. It will be remembered that when those committees were raised, and when large powers were conferred upon them—

Mr. SEWARD. If debate continues, I shall object to the resolution.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I object, anyhow.

Mr. STANTON. Objection comes too late.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think the objection is too late.

Mr. HASKIN. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as one of the responsible majority in this Hall, to withdraw his objection.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I withdraw it.

Mr. BURNETT. I renew the objection, for the reason that that committee has as much to do now as it can well attend to.

And then, on motion of Mr. KEITT, the House (at four o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, January 29, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. J. A. HARROLD.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PRINTING DEFICIENCY BILL.

The SPEAKER. The question first in order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. PHELPS. The time is fixed for closing general debate on House bill No. 202, and I have risen for the purpose of moving that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a statement, and to submit a motion which relates so directly to the interests of the country that I am sure it will meet with no opposition from any quarter. It is known that in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union debate has been in progress with a printing deficiency bill under consideration. It involves items of expenditure of the utmost importance to the country. These have grown out of a system which has aided in bankrupting the Treasury; and if this system be continued there is no knowing where it will end; and yet, sir, not one single member of the committee that reported this bill—the Committee of Ways and Means—nor one member of the Committee on Printing, has been enabled to get the floor, but the whole debate has been diverted to general subjects. General debate will expire at half past one o'clock to-day. Under this state of facts, and the importance there is in bringing out what has led to this system of abuses, I ask all parties here to unite and extend this debate until four o'clock, with the distinct understanding that no man shall speak to any question except the bill itself. Let us, Mr. Speaker, give one day, and this day, to the country, and give every other, if you please, to the negro.

Mr. HOUSTON. Make it one o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HOWARD. I desire to send to the Clerk's desk a resolution; but before doing so, I wish to say, that if we will come forward as honest men, and give this whole day to the country, we may check abuses that will be of more importance than all we have done during the session. If we do this for the country, our constituents will forgive us, perhaps, if we give the remainder of the session to Indians, negroes, Mormons, and Buncombe generally.

Mr. PHELPS. I certainly approve of the suggestion made by my friend from Michigan, and hope he will extend the time until to-morrow at

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1858.

NEW SERIES... No. 31.

one o'clock, and provide that the debate should be confined to the subject-matter of the bill in committee.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I concur in the proposition of the gentleman from Michigan as far as it goes; but I suggest that he amend his proposition so as to provide that debate shall be strictly confined to the subject-matter under consideration, not only so far as this bill, but so far as every other bill is concerned.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the gentleman will not embarrass my proposition with such an amendment at this time.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I am for adopting such a rule.

Mr. FLORENCE. Let us have it settled now.

Mr. GROW. I object to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HOWARD. I submit the following resolution. It is modified to suit the gentleman from Missouri:

Resolved, That the time for closing debate on House bill No. 292 be extended until one o'clock to-morrow; and that each member who shall participate in the discussion shall confine himself to the subject-matter of the said bill.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I object to the resolution, and simply for the reason that it comes too late. The proposition was offered yesterday. The motion was put before the House, and the House distinctly refused to confine the debate to the subject under consideration. Therefore, sir, until this House shall come to the resolution that debate shall be at all times confined to the subject under consideration, I shall object.

Mr. GROW. The gentleman from New York will remember that the objection made yesterday was not to devoting this day to the discussion of the bill. Every one upon this side of the House agreed to that. But let me say to the gentleman from New York that when the time shall come when general discussion in Committee of the Whole shall be put a stop to, and the debates there confined to the subjects immediately under consideration, you will have put a legislative despotism upon the House; for when you go into Committee of the Whole, the chairman who has charge of the business can move to strike out the enacting clause of a bill, and prevent all amendment, or debate upon it. So that if gentlemen were confined to the discussion of the subject up for consideration, they would have no chance at all to discuss some measures. Now, I am in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Michigan, and hope it will be adopted.

Mr. GIDDINGS. It seems to me that it is unnecessary to adopt this resolution. So far as I know, no gentleman upon this side of the House designs to speak to-day, except to the bill itself; and if gentlemen on the other side will pursue the same course, the bill can be discussed to-day without the adoption of any resolution invading the ancient right and usages of the House.

Mr. BURNETT. I think the House ought to adopt some rule in regard to discussion in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and I desire to suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE] that he permit the resolution of the gentleman from Michigan to be received, and then we can amend it so as to provide that after the House shall have fixed the hour at which debate shall close upon any particular bill, then the discussion shall be confined to the bill under consideration.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I shall object to the resolution if it is to be amended in that way.

The SPEAKER. This debate is all irregular and out of order. The business before the House is the call of committees for reports; and this being private bill day, reports are in order from the Committee of Claims.

Mr. LETCHER. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WARREN. I appeal to my friend from Virginia to withdraw that motion, that I may inroduce a resolution which I know he, and I apprehend every gentleman upon this floor, will agree to. It has direct reference to the business of the House, and I hope gentlemen will hear it read.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know what the resolution is, but I object to it, and I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. WARREN. It is a resolution designed to expedite the business of the House.

Mr. MORGAN. I must object.

The following is the resolution which Mr. WARREN desired to introduce:

Resolved, That from and after Monday next, all debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union shall be confined to the bill or resolution directly submitted to the committee, and nothing else; and that Monday nights, Wednesday nights, and Friday nights, of each week, shall be appropriated to the discussion of matters arising out of the condition of the Union generally, or such other matters as gentlemen may be disposed to discuss.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. I desire to make a report from the Committee of Claims.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is upon the motion made by the gentleman from Virginia, that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MILLSON. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair upon a point of order. If this bill shall be reported to the House, will it not be competent for the House afterwards, if they deem it proper to do so, to recommit it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of having such further discussion as may be necessary?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would. The House can recommit either to the Committee of the Whole or to one of the standing committees.

Mr. MILLSON. So I supposed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair. Can the House, in recommitting it, instruct the committee to confine the debate to the subject of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then what would be the use of recommitting it?

Mr. GROW. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand that either of the gentlemen rose for the purpose of debating any question. They simply rose for information upon a question of order.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make one remark, regarding the objection I interposed a moment ago.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. If the gentleman means to withdraw his objection, I will not object to his being heard.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot determine that.

Mr. SEWARD. I object to debate out of order.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. What is before the House?

The SPEAKER. The pending question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Virginia, that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. Is that question debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. Then I object to all debate.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I rise to make an inquiry. Did I understand the Chair to say, in response to the gentleman from Tennessee, that if the House should recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it could not commit with other instructions?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not with the instructions indicated by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Not so as to confine the debate to the bill?

The SPEAKER. That is the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I merely want to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that last session the House did give such instructions to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, when the tariff bill was under discussion.

The SPEAKER. Was it not done under a suspension of the rules?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I know such instructions were given, but I do not remember whether it was done under a suspension of the rules or not.

The SPEAKER. It must have been done under a suspension of the rules, which required a two-third vote.

Mr. PHELPS. I appeal to the House to allow me to submit a proposition to extend the time for debate until one o'clock, to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I object.

The question was then taken on Mr. LETCHER's motion; and it was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the

PRINTING DEFICIENCY BILL.

Upon which Mr. BURNETT was entitled to the floor.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to pursue the course adopted by other gentlemen who have addressed the committee since the House fixed a time for closing the debate upon this bill. The committee have been entertained with speeches upon Mormonism, Free-Soilism, and every other ism having no connection with any measure of legislation now before the House, and, as yet, not a single speech has been elicited bearing upon the subject immediately under consideration. If gentlemen will debate abstract questions in Committee of the Whole, let them do it before the House fixes a time for closing debate upon the bill then before the body; but when that time is fixed, and but a few hours are left to speak to an important measure, it seems to me that it should be confined to a practical discussion of the bill before us. It was from this conviction that I endeavored to arrest that character of debate, and raised the point of order upon gentlemen who preceded me who did not utter a single word with reference to the printing deficiency, but the point was overruled; and until now, no opportunity has been afforded for debating the merits of the question properly before us. Feeling, sir, that the interests of the country demand a reform in this practice, I propose myself to confine my remarks to the bill under consideration.

The investigation of the subject of printing, as connected with the two Houses of Congress, is one of difficulty and embarrassment to any gentleman who will undertake it. This is owing to the fact that there is no regularity in the action of Congress making appropriations for printing purposes; there is no limit upon the work when the appropriations are exhausted. There are orders constantly being made by both Houses for extra printing, and it is only by an examination in detail of the entire legislation of each Congress that the amount of the appropriations for printing can be discovered; which involves a vast amount of difficulty and labor. The subject of the printing of Congress has, for the last few years, attracted much of the attention of the country. It has been a theme for the newspaper press.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I desire to present a question of order to the Chair. I understand that the gentleman from Kentucky proposes to discuss the bill under consideration. I would inquire of the Chair whether that is in order? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the question of order.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Then the Chair rules the discussion of the subject-matter under consideration to be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. BURNETT. I am not surprised at the point of order raised by the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. GREENWOOD,] for I am aware that it is a novelty for any gentleman in this body to do what I am now doing—debating the merits of the bill before us. I was remarking, sir, when I was interrupted, that this subject of printing had occupied much of the attention of the press and politicians of the country.

It is charged that it is a source of corruption through which the public Treasury is robbed, that gentlemen who hold the office of Public Printer acquire in a short time princely fortunes, and that extensive combinations are formed at the commencement of each Congress by which the printing is to be obtained and controlled. I do not make these charges, nor do I say that they are true, but they are made, and I am glad—yes, sir, I congratulate the country, that we have a committee organized which is to investigate this entire subject, and to make a report to this House. I hope, sir, that that investigation may be a rigid and thorough one, and that this House and the public may be furnished with all the facts connected with it.

It is high time that these charges of corruption that are made in regard to this subject should be met, and if they are not true, their falsehood should be shown, so that they may cease. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] alluded to the clamor that has been raised against the Public Printer. I must confess that so far as I have investigated the subject, it is a matter of mystery to me how the Public Printer can be guilty of corruption, unless there is a collusion between him and the agent of the Government who has the superintendence of the subject. And yet it is a fact, and one well worthy the consideration of this committee, that the Public Printers of both Houses of Congress do amass immense fortunes, and that reasons are sometimes given by their friends why we should reflect them to that office, that they have expended thousands of dollars in the presidential canvasses; that they have been ready in one particular State, or locality, to open their purses and give large gratuities for the purpose of carrying elections. The inference from this is, when holders of this office can be so liberal in aiding in elections, that we are paying too much, and that the matter is a proper subject of investigation for this House.

Now the law of 1852, passed by Congress, had for its object the fixing of prices for the public printing, and not only that, but it established the office of Superintendent and defined certain duties for him to perform. These duties are laid down and expressed so plainly that there can be no mistake about them. He is required to keep an exact statement of all the work ordered by Congress in the hands of the Public Printer. If he does his duty he ought to know what amount ordered has been executed, what amount is in the process of completion, and what amount has been ordered but not commenced. And yet the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] told us the other day, when I asked him how much of this work was completed and how much was yet to be done, that we were not to expect the Committee of Ways and Means to enter into such details or to be able to give the House this information. Now we do expect the Committee of Ways and Means, when they ask us to vote for a deficiency bill for printing to the amount of nearly a million of dollars, to tell us and tell the country what amount of the work for which this money is paid, has been done, and what has not been done. The means of information are within their control; and how? Why, as I said before, if the Superintendent of Public Printing discharge his duties, the information is in his office; and, being open to the Committee of Ways and Means, that committee should be possessed of it before they ask us to make appropriations of so extensive a character as those contained in the bill. Ought not the Superintendent, for instance, know what portion of Gilliss's report is in the hands of the Printer and how much of it is not? And I have applied to the proper source of information for a member of this House, as I supposed, and yet the Committee of Ways and Means cannot answer, nor do I believe any member of this House can answer, how much of that report is yet unprinted.

I call the attention of the committee particularly to another fact. If you investigate this subject of public printing, and look at the action of past Congresses, you will find that that item of the public expenditure has grown enormously within the last few years. Let us go back as far as the Thirty-Second Congress, and see what the expenditure of the public printing of that Congress amounted to. The expenditure of the Thirty-Second Congress was $950,287 30. The expenditure of the Thirty-Third Congress was $1,699,381 51; and of the Thirty-Fourth Congress, $2,334,087 27. This last item includes the amounts estimated in the bill now under consideration; but none of the items include special appropriations for special objects. For example: the appropriations for the publication of the Seventh Census, Index to Private Claims, &c.

Mr. NICHOLS. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me to—

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman will excuse me, if he pleases. If gentlemen want to know why I do not consent to be interrupted, it is because I do not intend to have my time occupied by members catechizing me on this subject. I give the information which I have from your Clerk. My calculations are based upon estimates furnished by his office. If erroneous, the fault is in the figures furnished me, not in my calculation based upon those figures.

You find that, in two Congresses, this item of expenditure has increased from less than a million of dollars to over two millions. And to the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber I have this remark to make. During the Thirty-Fourth Congress, as you well remember, there was, on this side of the House, or on the part of a large portion of it, a fixed and settled opposition to this wild and extravagant expenditure in the publication of books. We, or at least the great body of us, were found opposing every proposition looking to the publication of the books which increased this expenditure to such an enormous extent. You will find, by an examination of the Journals of this House, that the resolutions for their publication generally emanated from your side of the House. But I will say this, in that connection, that I presume that the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON,] who offered the resolution in reference to the publication of Gilliss's report, did not suppose, and that no other member of the House supposed, that it would reach the large number of volumes it already has. I wish to read to the House the resolution under which this report has been printed, and is now being printed:

“Resolved, That there be printed and bound, by the Public Printer and Binder of the House, six thousand copies of the report, and two thousand copies of the observations of the United States naval astronomical expedition to Chili; five hundred copies of the report and observations for the use of the Secretary of the Navy, two hundred and fifty for the superintendent of the expedition, and the remainder for distribution by the members of the present House; said work to be printed in quarto or octavo form, as the work will admit; and the Committee on Printing may direct.”

Is there anything in this resolution which contemplated that, after its passage, the report was to be enlarged at the discretion of its author and extended to an unlimited number of volumes? Can it, by construction, be tortured into authority for printing any more manuscript than was then contained in it? Is there in it anything to allow Lieutenant Gillis to go on as he has for four years?—sir, it was four years ago this resolution passed—and prepare manuscript, or to go on for as many years more as he may want to and do so, to be printed at the public expense? I maintain the position, which no man on this floor can controvert, that every sheet of manuscript furnished since the passage of the resolution to the Public Printer by the Superintendent, and every certificate for payment for every sheet so furnished, was a direct and palpable violation of the resolution and of law. The same reasons apply to the printing of the Japan expedition, the Pacific railroad survey, Emory's report, and the commercial relations and stamps; the action by which the printing of them is now being executed; also as direct and palpable violations of the resolutions under which they were ordered, and of law.

The gentleman from Missouri remarked the other day that when there was no division on the question of the publication of these books, he felt his responsibility alike with that of all the members on this floor. I occupy no such position—and why? Because my course on this floor has been, from the commencement of my service here to the present time, a uniform and persistent opposition to all this expenditure of public money for the publication of books which are worthless in their character. I believe there is not a member on this floor but will agree with me as to their worthlessness. Here we have this history of Chili, by Lieutenant Gilliss. We have these eleven volumes of the Pacific railroad survey. We have this coast survey, the illustrations of which cost many thousand dollars. I venture the assertion that there is not a man on this floor who has ever examined either one of these works thoroughly—not one. I say, then, to the gentlemen on the other side of the House, that when they ran up the cost of the printing of the last Congress (where they had the majority) to $2,334,087 27, they are responsible for it. Now look at it: you voted these resolutions and propositions involving this large expenditure; and now that this deficiency bill comes in, how many of you will vote for it? You ask us to come and take the responsibility and vote this appropriation; and my friend on my left [Mr. PHELPS] may ask me: “Sir, are you in favor of repudiation? Are you not willing to meet the debts of the Government?” My answer to that is this, that so far as debts are contracted, so far as the work is executed, I will vote to pay them; but as to work not executed, I am in favor of stopping it.

Sir, let us contrast the difference between these items of expenditure for three years, and see how rapidly it has grown; and then I ask gentlemen if this matter of the public printing is not well worthy the attention of Congress?

What does this deficiency bill ask us to do? It is for deficiencies created in the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses. This bill asks for an appropriation of $790,000 to meet the deficiencies created in the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses. Now, gentlemen, let us look back to the Thirty-Second and Thirty-Third Congresses, and see what is the history of these deficiency bills. At the first session of the Thirty-Third Congress, we were called upon to vote an appropriation out of the public Treasury. For what purpose? To meet the deficiency created in regard to this very matter of printing. How much was the deficiency? The amount was $127,596 40. That was at the first session of the Thirty-Third Congress, to meet a deficiency in the appropriations of the Thirty-Second Congress.

Mr. STANTON. I think I misapprehended the gentleman, or he was laboring under a mistake. I understood him to say that I offered the resolution in this House for printing Gilliss's report.

Mr. BURNETT. I so understood it.

Mr. STANTON. I will say to the gentleman that he is entirely mistaken. I have never offered a resolution for printing extra copies of any report.*

Mr. BURNETT. Then you deserve credit to that extent, and no further.

Mr. STANTON. I trust the gentleman will also do me the credit to say that I have generally voted with him against all these resolutions.

Mr. BURNETT. Sir, the Thirty-Fourth Congress, if I recollect right, voted another deficiency bill for these very same items for which we are now called on to pass this bill. That deficiency bill, according to the figures which I have before me, appropriated money to the amount of $625,877 21, for deficiencies created in the Thirty-Third Congress. I will give the items:

For printing.....	$201,331 95
For binding in the Senate.....	11,000 00
For lithographing.....	99,600 00
For lithographing in the House.....	174,200 00
For binding in the House of Representatives...	82,715 56

Sir, these deficiency bills, in my judgment, are all wrong. I am for making specific appropriations, and when the money is expended, stopping at that point until we make additional appropriations necessary to pay for the work. I regard the present practice as a great evil. Past experience has shown it to be such; and it is one which is rapidly increasing. Perhaps gentlemen will tell me that it has existed for a long time, and that we must always have deficiency bills. But, sir, it strikes me that, to a very great extent, we may avoid them.

* This mistake arose from the fact that the resolution was offered by a namesake of Mr. STANTON.

Now, sir, the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS], the other day, when the question was propounded to him, said: "Sir, do you expect the Committee of Ways and Means to report to this House legislation stopping this printing? Is it a part of the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to report such legislation?" He tells us that it is the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to report appropriations; but, sir, when that committee asks us to vote a large appropriation of money from the Treasury, it does strike me that it ought to be able to tell us how much work has been done, and how much is left to be done.

Now, I will call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri to another item in this bill. I see by the report of the Superintendent of Public Printing, that there are items for dry-pressing, which, as I understand, is smoothing out and preparing the paper for printing. Sir, there is no authority of law for it. They have no authority to charge for it; yet we find that for five volumes of one of these works (the Pacific railroad report) this item for dry-pressing amounts to $9,978. It is true gentlemen may say that is a remarkably small amount in the expense of the Congress of the United States; but you find that this item is to be used as a precedent, as one of the items to be charged for in the public printing. If it is not legal, then it strikes me that it is the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means, or of the Superintendent of Public Printing, rather, to see that these charges are not made. We find that this item of dry-pressing extends through the whole of the annual report of the Superintendent of Public Printing, and amounts in the aggregate to the snug little sum of near thirty thousand dollars. It has been allowed the Public Printer, and will be paid him, when the whole charge is in violation of law, and was not contemplated by the act of 1852.

Sir, the means of information which we have in regard to this whole subject are derived from the Superintendent's annual report, and his response to the Committee of Ways and Means. The latter is uncertain and vague in its meaning and character. It is impossible for any man to separate the items as reported by him, so as to arrive at a correct conclusion as to how much of this printing has been executed, in order to reach a proper understanding of the indebtedness of the Government for it.

Sir, this bill can be reduced; and it presents itself to my mind most conclusively that it is due to the country that it should be done. According to the calculations I have made, based upon the information furnished by the Superintendent's report and the Committee of Ways and Means, $420,000 will cover every item of indebtedness by the Government for printing, paper, lithographing, &c. The balance of these deficiencies, making up the sum of $790,000, is for work not yet done, and a large portion of which is still to be written.

We learn, sir, from the report of the Superintendent of Public Printing, that three volumes of Gilliss's report have been completed and delivered. One volume is nearly ready for the binder. The other three volumes, which complete the work, so far as he furnishes any information, are not yet commenced. There are four volumes of the Pacific railroad finished, four in a forward state of completion, and three volumes which have not yet been commenced. My friend from Missouri shakes his head. I read from the Superintendent's report to show that I am correct:

2d. Reports of explorations and surveys to ascertain the most practicable and economical route for a railroad from the Mississippi river to the Pacific ocean, ordered at the second session of the Thirty-Third Congress. The printing of seven volumes of this report has been completed, four of which have been bound, and the other three are nearly ready for the binder. The letter-press and most of the illustrations for the eighth volume are printed; but some delay will be occasioned in its completion in consequence of the destruction by fire, in Philadelphia, of ten of the copper-plates. It is estimated that the entire work, when completed, will make eleven large quarto volumes, including one volume of maps and profiles."

He only furnishes us with an account of eight volumes; while, at the same time, he states that the work will embrace eleven volumes. Hence, three volumes yet remain to be printed. And, sir, so far as the purpose of the Government in ordering the publication of these Pacific railroad surveys is concerned, I think that we could now safely abandon what yet remains to be published, and to stop on the volumes which have been begun just where the work has advanced.

To go on with the report: Emory's report of the survey of the boundary line between this country and Mexico, ordered at the first session of the Thirty-Fourth Congress: one volume commenced, the other not. The gentleman from Missouri remarked, the other day, that the plates for the second volume had been contracted for in Paris. However, the letter-press for this second volume has not been commenced; at least, the Superintendent of Public Printing does not, nor does the gentleman himself, give us any account on that point.

Mr. Chairman, I am convinced that if members of this House would pay some attention to the cost of these works, there would be less disposition than there has been heretofore to order their publication. Look at the second volume of the Japan Expedition. Every member, I presume, has received a copy of that volume. It cost the Government the modest and inconsiderable sum of $99,635 42!

Mr. BURROUGHS. How much is that per copy?

Mr. BURNETT. Five dollars and forty cents. Here, sir, is an estimate of the cost of volumes three, four, five, six, and seven, of the Pacific railroad surveys. The maps and illustrations embraced in these surveys are utterly valueless, except the one or two which show the lines of routes and their relative practicability for a line of railroad to the Pacific slope. All others, except those few maps, are utterly worthless. And, sir, I beg leave to differ with the gentleman from Missouri, who said that these works embodied a vast amount of information of a region of country heretofore unknown; I beg leave to differ with him as to the value of the information contained in that work.

The total cost of volumes three, four, five, six, and seven, is $473,053 96. The illustrations in them alone cost $198,729 24. The maps of the Coast Survey, extra copies of which we were again called on the other day to publish, and which is a work entirely worthless for distribution, cost $21,715 75.

My friend from Tennessee [Mr. Jones] inquired what was the cost of the squirrel picture in the agricultural portion of the Patent Office report. Well, sir, the plates of rats, mice, owls, woodcock, &c., contained in that work for 1856, plates which in my judgment are unnecessary, and not worth the paper upon which they are printed, cost the Government the sum of $45,421 22.

With these facts staring us in the face, I appeal to you, Mr. Chairman, and to the House, whether, even if we must pass this deficiency appropriation bill, it is not time for us to put an end to this extravagant expenditure of the public money. I voted for the resolution increasing the number of the agricultural portion of the Patent Office report, for the reason that I believe, with many other members, that it contained information valuable to the agricultural interests of the country, and which is wanted and demanded by those interests. But, sir, few of us, I venture to say, thought by that vote that we were authorizing the expenditure of the sum of $45,000 for plates of rats, mice, squirrels, &c. I might refer to other books, but I will not do so now.

There is not a gentleman on this committee who will not agree that these extravagant publications should be stopped. The gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Virginia, both of them members of the Committee of Ways and Means, will agree that these publications are wrong. They, sir, are in favor of an economical expenditure of the public money for printing as for every other thing. But ought they not to come here with clean hands in the case of this deficiency bill, and tell us how much we owe, and how much we do not? We were told by the gentleman from Missouri, in his opening remarks, that this bill was for work already executed. I do not understand that this is so from anything I have seen on the subject.

We find in table No. 3, of the estimates of the Committee of Ways and Means, furnished by the Superintendent, that the sum of $74,951 64 is "for printing yet to be executed." I have not the experience either of my friend from Virginia or Missouri as to the duties of the Committee of Ways and Means, never having served on that committee; but, as I before stated, it is certainly their duty to furnish plain and correct statements justifying the appropriations they ask this House to make.

Mr. Chairman, when the Superintendent of Public Printing furnishes an estimate which he says is for work yet to be done, I regard that as plain English, meaning that the work has not yet gone into the hands of the Public Printer, or been executed by him. What else do we find in the estimates, as furnished by the Superintendent? In table No. 4, you find that the Superintendent, in accordance with law, has issued his certificate for the amount of $104,000, which amount is due for work done; and there is the sum of $65,132 98, the estimate for work not yet done. When we come down to the report of the Clerk of this House, what do we find? Binding documents for the Thirty-Third Congress; binding seventy thousand extra copies of the Pacific railroad survey; binding ten thousand copies of the Pacific railroad report; and so on, with Gilliss's report, &c.

These items, making a sum larger than both of those referred to in tables No. 3 and 4, is, as I learn through the Clerk's office of the House, for work yet to be done. And still Congress must go on furnishing and publishing works, which no private publisher in the country would publish, because they would be regarded of no value by the trade; and merely because the Thirty-Second and Thirty-Third Congresses may have ordered works then written to be published, we are to go on printing and publishing, ad infinitum, as long as their authors may think proper to continue to write; and that, too, at a cost which, before they are completed, will reach millions.

Mr. Chairman, I have effected the object I had in view in taking the floor. I am in search of information. I want light. And, sir, if this is a debt due and owing by the Government under contracts executed and completed, although I have uniformly opposed the printing of these books, and this extravagance in regard to the public printing, as far as I could, I will vote to pay it; for I am in favor of paying the debts of the Government. But, sir, if the work is not yet completed, I say to gentlemen here, that I never will give my countenance to such legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I believe the first section of this bill has been read. I move, now, to strike out all after the word "Congress" in the seventh line to the end of the bill, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

The sum of $420,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. LETCHER obtained the floor.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I should like, with the consent of the gentleman from Virginia, to ask one question before he commences his remarks.

Mr. LETCHER. I have only thirty-five minutes, and I must decline to give way.

Mr. Chairman, this subject is one of very great interest and importance; but it certainly never would have occurred to any man, who had entered this Hall at any time since the close of the speech of my colleague on the committee [Mr. PHELPS] up to this morning, that anybody felt the slightest interest in it, or that it related in any way to the interests of the tax-paying people of this country. When a proposition comes up to appropriate $790,554 27 to pay contracts which have been the result of the legislation of this House, instead of discussing that matter, investigating the items, examining them, and presenting them in such shape as would make an impression upon the mind of the country, we have been entertained with speeches on Kansas, on Mormonism, and every other conceivable subject, until the time for debate has almost expired, and there is hardly enough left even to notice the prominent points which are the subject of controversy.

In the remarks which I propose to submit, I shall confine myself to the legitimate business before the committee. And, in the first place, in order to make myself intelligible, I propose to refer to the duties of the Committee on Printing, as laid down in the rules of the House, so that the distinction between their duties and the duties which legitimately belong to the Committee of Ways and Means may be ascertained and appreciated. According to the rule in regard to the public printing, you have a committee here, acting in conjunction with the committee of the Senate, whose duty it is to look into this matter, to regulate contracts, and to present their views in the shape of reports in regard to all books and documents which are proposed to be printed by this House, in order that the House may pass an enlightened judgment upon the report so presented; and until that report comes in and the judgment of the House is pronounced upon it, not one dollar for printing, lithographing, engraving, or anything else connected with this subject, can be expended—not a dollar. That is the business of the Committee on Printing, as the rule on the subject clearly shows. This is the rule, and to it I invite the attention of gentlemen.

"22. A committee of three members of the Senate and three members of the House of Representatives shall be appointed by the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House, to be called the Joint Committee on the Public Printing, which committee shall have a right to decide between the Superintendent of the Public Printing and the Public Printer in any dispute which may arise as to the propriety of the decisions of the Superintendent making deductions on account of work which the Superintendent may refuse to receive, or which, in his opinion, may not be done with proper dispatch, as required by law; and the said committee shall pass upon the accounts of the Superintendent of the Public Printing. Said committee shall have power to adopt such measures as may be deemed necessary to remedy any neglect or delay in the execution of the public printing: provided that no contract, agreement, or arrangement entered into by this committee, shall take effect until the same shall have been approved by that House of Congress to which the printing belongs, and, when the printing delayed relates to the business of both Houses, until both Houses shall have approved of such contract or arrangement. All motions to print extra copies of any bill, report, or other document, shall be referred to the members of the Committee on Printing from the House in which the same may be made."

Now, sir, what is the business of our committee—the Committee of Ways and Means? We are to take the estimates which are sent to us from the Departments at the other end of the avenue, to take the estimates which are sent to us from the subordinates under those Departments and under the House of Representatives, to ascertain what contracts they have made under the law, what sum of money is necessary to meet those contracts, and then it is our duty to report a bill to the House for the purpose of discharging the obligations which the Government has incurred through those duly constituted agents.

Now, sir, that, I take it, is the true distinction between their duties and ours; that they are to report to us what contracts they have made, and it is then our duty to report to this House the amount of money which is necessary to meet those contracts, and to pay the obligations which have been incurred by the Government under them.

But, sir, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BURNETT] and other gentlemen in this House, have undertaken to say that this is not the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means; that it should not pursue this line of conduct; but that they must come here and propose legislation; that it is their business to recommend where these publications shall stop, and then that the House should act upon their recommendation.

Sir, it will be recollected that, during the last Congress, when the Committee of Ways and Means took charge of a subject which was legitimately brought to their attention in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and which report was referred to them for their consideration, in regard to marine hospitals; and when that committee introduced a proposition into this House, they were punished for their attempt to legislate by the defeat of the bill; and some of the very gentlemen who complain now that we have not undertaken to legislate on this occasion, are for punishing us for not legislating, while a year ago they were for punishing us for legislating. If it was wrong then, is it not equally wrong now? And if it was right then, why were we not sustained by the House, and a precedent set upon which we could act in future, in all cases where legislation was demanded, and where the public money could be saved. It will be recollected, sir, that, under that marine hospital legislation which was proposed at that time, thousands of dollars would have been saved to the Government if the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury had been carried out by the passage of the measure, which was proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means. But, sir, it was not sustained, and that was regarded then as a good reason for defeating it.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LETCHER. Yes, sir; for a single moment.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I think the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BURNETT], who has just closed a very able speech, was one of those who opposed the proviso which the gentleman from Virginia alludes to in regard to the marine hospitals.

Mr. LETCHER. Now, sir, it seems to me that I have clearly defined, according to the rules of the House, the relative duties of the Committee on Printing, and of the Committee of Ways and Means.

I come now to the action of this House, under which this expenditure has been made necessary, and which, I think, will illustrate with sufficient clearness the propriety of the course of the Committee of Ways and Means in reporting this bill. The first item to which I call attention, is that of the naval astronomical explorations to Chili. My friend from Kentucky [Mr. BURNETT] is under a slight mistake when he tells us that but three volumes of that work have been printed, and that three or more volumes remain yet to be printed. If I am not much mistaken, six volumes of that work have been already printed and delivered to the members of this House.

Mr. BURNETT. No, sir; only three volumes have been printed and delivered.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. They have printed the sixth volume, but have not printed the intermediate ones.

Mr. LETCHER. Another volume is prepared, and two more are in process of preparation. The whole work will be comprised, as now reported by the Superintendent of Public Printing, in seven volumes. Now, who originated that publication? Was it not done in this House? The Representative from the State of Kentucky [Mr. Stanton] was the man who introduced it here for the action of this body, and it was passed under his advice and under his direction. And now let us see what it will cost, taking the average of the cost of the volumes already printed. The average cost, per volume, will be $16,441 91. The seven volumes, therefore, will cost $115,107 37. Now, when the House of Representatives ordered this book to be printed, did it intend to print it? When the Committee on Printing was ordered to make contracts for the execution of the work, did they intend to fulfill those contracts, or did they intend—as my friend from Kentucky would have them do—after the contracts were made, and when progress was made in their performance, that the House should then undertake to declare that the balance should not be completed?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Will the gentleman read the authority of the House for its publication.

Mr. LETCHER. I cannot refer to it just now.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is a resolution that six thousand copies of the report and two thousand copies of the observations of the United States astronomical expedition to Chili be printed. That is the only authority I find for it at all.

Mr. GROW. When was that resolution adopted?

Mr. LETCHER. That was at the first session of the Thirty-Third Congress.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LETCHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Is this sort of construction to be given to the resolution? Is it to be presumed that this House intended to print anything but a report then made? And is it not a fact that that report is still unfinished and that men are actually engaged in writing other volumes?

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman from Georgia has waked up very late. When the Commercial Relations were ordered to be printed, it was said here that they would occupy but one volume; and yet the gentleman from Georgia did not last year arrest the publication of the third or fourth volumes of it. So in regard to others which I shall have occasion to allude to directly, in connection with the Pacific railroad. Now, why is it that this thing has passed along quietly until the attention of the people has been attracted to it? Why is it that while you have gone on here to publish and distribute the first and second and sixth volumes of a work, you are to stop in regard to that work, and not publish the third, fourth, and fifth volumes? But I must go on, for I have little time to dwell on this subject. I call attention to these items only to show how this thing is begun.

I now come to the Pacific railroad report. Seven volumes have been already printed, and the eighth volume is about prepared for delivery. The average cost of the volumes already printed is $77,526 49½. The eight volumes, then, amount to $600,211 94½. There are yet three additional volumes to be supplied; which, at the same rate, will cost $232,579 48; making for that publication alone, when completed, $832,791 43½.

That work was ordered at the second session of the Thirty-Third Congress, and the work has been going on from that day to this.

Now I come to another work—the report of Major Emory. Let us see how that came to be published, and what it was expected at the time would be its cost. I have a letter here from Major Emory, dated July 29, 1856, addressed to the then Secretary of the Interior, Mr. R. McClelland, in which Major Emory says, that besides the volume then sent there would be an appendix. The appendix has proved to be about the same size as the first volume.

The letter is as follows:

OFFICE UNITED STATES BOUNDARY COMMISSION,

WASHINGTON, July 29, 1856.

Sir: I have the honor to send herewith my report on the boundary between the United States and Mexico, together with proofs of such maps and illustrations as have been completed, numbered from one to sixty-three. The plates and blocks from which these proofs are struck are held by me subject to your order, or that of Congress.

The general map cannot be completed until next winter; and the map of the new Territory is not quite completed; but when finished, no delay will ensue in the publication. By consultation with the printer, I find these maps will be done quite as soon as the printing of the report, should it be concluded to print that report.

Besides the volume now sent in, there will be an appendix, containing reports upon the botany and natural history of the country adjacent to the boundary, with from two to three hundred illustrations, many of which are already engraved and the plates deposited in this office. These reports are in the hands of Drs. Torrey, Engelman, and Professor Baird, and other savans of the country. They promise to have them all finished in the course of the year. These reports not being of the same general interest, I concluded it was proper not to delay sending in the general report until their completion.

Should it be deemed proper to publish the general report and a limited number of copies of the appendix, I beg to call attention to my letter to you of April 23, 1856, by which it will be seen there is a large surplus of funds which may be made available for the purpose, and which has been saved from the appropriations made by Congress for the prosecution of the work. That surplus is at present more than $100,000.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant.

W. H. EMORY,
United States Commissioner.

Hon. ROBERT McCLELLAND, Secretary of the Interior.

So says Major Emory. On that letter the report was sent in to this House for publication. Now let us see what it cost. The first volume of that report, as ordered by the Senate, cost $26,190 65. The same volume as ordered by the House, cost $47,035; making the total cost of the first volume, to say nothing of the appendix, $73,225 65.

The second volume, or appendix, (three thousand four hundred copies,) for the Senate edition, contains five hundred and twelve pages, and will cost $25,840 11. The edition ordered by the House will cost $37,400; making the cost of the second volume, for the Senate and House, $113,240 11; to say nothing of engravings, maps, illustrations, and other things of that sort. And then, sir, the item of engraving constitutes a separate charge. The two volumes, then, give us a cost of $186,465 76. Well, sir, it is proposed to color a parcel of these engravings in the second volume. It is said that if ninety-two plates of natural history out of two hundred and seventy-five plain illustrations be colored by hand, as has been suggested, at a cost of seven cents per impression, there will be one million three hundred and seventy thousand eight hundred impressions, which will cost $95,956, which, with the amount I have already stated, makes the entire cost of the two volumes $282,421 76.

But that is not all. Accompanying these books are nine maps; one of which covers the entire country between the forty-ninth parallel of latitude and the southern boundary of the United States; the plate for which was engraved in the first instance, but it was erroneously engraved, and was rejected as being incorrect. This plate was engraved at an expense of $1,500. Well, now, sir, it is asked that these nine maps shall be engraved and printed. The expense for printing alone, to say nothing of the cost of engraving, is estimated at about $15,000; for paper, $3,600; making a cost of $18,600 for publishing these maps. Then the cost of engraving is so much in addition, which, according to the estimate I have, will amount to the neat little sum of $40,000 more; so that when you come to foot up the bill for printing this report of the boundary survey by Major Emory, you find that the total cost of printing the report is $340,021 76!

Now, sir, when was the printing of that report ordered? It was ordered at the second session of the Thirty-Third Congress.

Well, now, sir, I come to the printing of the report on Commercial Relations. The first, third, and fourth volumes of that report have been printed. Let us see how it got into this House, and let us see upon what information the House acted. I refer to the Congressional Globe, volume 32, part first, page 630:

"Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he has made any estimate, or received any, as to what size the work is likely to be—how many volumes, and how many pages quarto, it will be likely to make?"

"Mr. WASHBURN. It will make one volume quarto, I suppose, of about three hundred pages. It is important, as I stated before, that it should be printed in quarto form, because it embraces tables which it will be difficult to print on pages of less size."

"Mr. JONES. It seems, Mr. Speaker, to me, from the pile of papers upon your table, that the work must be a very voluminous one; and the character of the work is one that will be very expensive in printing. It will be fully as large, I should think, as the large volume of the census report."

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Read the resolution which was offered.

Mr. LETCHER. The resolution was in these words:

"Resolved, That the answer of the President of the United States to the resolution of the House of Representatives, of December 14, 1853, upon the commercial relations of the United States with all foreign nations, be printed by the Printer of this House in quarto form, under the direction of the Secretary of State, who is hereby authorized to cause all corrections therein, which, in the course of printing, may be found requisite, to be made, and also cause to be made all additions thereto of commercial information which, subsequently to the transmission of said answers to this House, may reach the Department of State, which shall, by him, be deemed of sufficient importance."

Yet, sir, we have now gotten the first volume, of eight hundred and twenty-eight pages; the third volume, of seven hundred and ninety-two pages; the fourth volume, of seven hundred and six pages. The second volume is not yet printed, and as it is to be the last, it is hard to guess, even, how many pages it will contain. [Laughter.] Now, sir, I refer to page 790 of the same volume, where the Committee on Printing made their report upon the same subject:

"Mr. CRAIG also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a resolution of the House of March 10, 1856, instructing the committee to inquire into the expediency of printing twenty thousand copies extra of the message and accompanying documents from the President of the United States, in reference to the commercial relations of the United States with all foreign nations, and into the probable cost per volume of printing the same, presented a report that the committee had made inquiry and had arrived at the conclusion that the probable cost of printing the same would be $1 59 per volume; and in relation to the extra copies the committee report the following resolution:

"Resolved, That ten thousand copies extra of the message and accompanying documents from the President of the United States, in relation to the commercial relations of the United States with all foreign nations, being the comparative tariff and commercial statistics of all nations, as prepared by the Secretary of State, be printed for the use of the House, and five hundred copies additional for the use of the State Department, and that the same be printed in quarto form

"Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire whether the $1 59 per volume includes the binding?"

"Mr. CRAIG. It does. I call for the previous question. The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted."

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Right here I wish to ask a question. It is, whether the resolution authorizes the publication of any matter other than that then prepared?

Mr. LETCHER. Yes, sir; it provides that the information subsequently furnished shall be published.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. If I understood the resolution just read, it authorizes the publication of nothing except the matter then reported, and before the House.

Mr. LETCHER. The first resolution directed that the report should be printed, and provided that all subsequent matter which should be furnished should be printed, with what was then before the House. When the resolution went to the Committee on Printing, after consideration they reported back that the extra copies should be printed. The committee reported that the printing would cost $1 59 per volume. Whether more than one volume or not was contemplated, I leave the House to infer.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I say nothing about subsequent matter.

Mr. LETCHER. What is the meaning of the declaration of $1 59 per volume, if there was not a doubt about the number of volumes?

Mr. NICHOLS. I say, sir, that the report for the printing of that document was based upon an official communication from the Department of State to the Committee on Printing, in which the work was estimated at four hundred and fifty pages, and the exact number of words in a page.

Mr. LETCHER. Then it is only surprising to me that when the Department had estimated it at three hundred and fifty pages, and when the gentleman who introduced the resolution, and the Committee on Printing subsequently estimated it at four hundred and fifty, they should not have inquired into the discrepancy.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The discrepancy is caused by the fact that additional matter was supplied.

Mr. LETCHER. Grant it to be so; but will the gentleman from Georgia undertake to say that this House had the most distant idea, at the time it ordered that book to be printed, how many volumes it was ordering, or what the cost of printing would be?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I think we did. The gentleman says that I have waked up late. I recollect the facts; and I will say that I never contemplated, by my vote, to order anything to be published except that embraced by the report of the Committee on Printing. And, sir, I will never sanction the going on and gathering up other material to make four or five volumes.

Mr. LETCHER. These volumes were published at the last session of Congress, as well as at this session of Congress. When the deficiency bill for printing was up here last year, why did not my friend from Georgia then raise his voice against this outrage of writing books and publishing books beyond the number submitted to this House for consideration? Then was the time to have stopped it, and then the time to rebuke the extravagance of the House.

Look at the manner in which this thing is done. Here are the first, third, and fourth volumes, leaving the second volume to be written last, in order that, when it is printed, the work will be complete. The first volume of that book cost $28,659 98; the third volume, $43,263 67; the fourth, $39,771 46; and when the second is done, at the average cost of those which have been printed already, it will amount to the round sum of $148,926 81 for the Commercial Relations. That book was ordered at the first session of the Thirty-Fourth Congress.

Well, sir, I will go to another set of books. The mechanical portion of the Patent Office report for the year 1856—and the last one printed—cost $110,638 20, and the agricultural portion $147,199 64. I say nothing about the illustrations to which my friend from Kentucky has referred, because he has superseded the necessity for my doing so. Let us see what amount these few books foot up. I have not included the Coast Survey; I have not included many other books which have been directed to be printed by this and the other House; but let us see what the small number I have included amounts to, as printing for these bodies. The total cost of those I have named reaches the enormous sum of $1,599,729 21. If the cost of coloring by hand the plates for Emory's report ($95,956) is to be added, it will make the amount $1,695,685 21.

I might have gone much more into detail, but I have gone thus far only for the purpose of arresting the attention of this House, in the hope that we could put a stop to this printing extravagance; that, if it could not be stopped here, we could, at least, so far enlighten the public mind at home as to hear from them, and have a voice come up to this Hall that would operate upon the action of members; a voice proclaiming that there must be "retrenchment and reform" in this branch of the public service.

Sir, I trust that such a voice will come up here; that we shall hear from the people that a rigid economy must be observed, and this leak must be stopped. You may say what you please of these books, but the publication of them amounts to nothing more nor less than this: that the Congress of the United States is to be the book publisher for those whose works will not tempt the bookseller to buy them; the publisher of such works as will not be sold to the booksellers and printed by them for sale to their customers throughout the country. These books, sir, are to be brought here, and we are to print them; and, under the disguise of distributing them amongst our constituents, we are to saddle the tax-paying people of this country with the amount of money necessary to foot the bill. And if members have looked into the subject, they will find whole volumes in which there is little else save a title-page. In some of these astronomical explorations, there is nothing except stars and lines, and one thing or the other of that sort, that nobody but an astronomer could understand, and that not one of every twenty members here could understand.

If there is to be a reform in this matter, adopt a regulation by which you will hold the heads of Departments of this Government to a responsibility for whatever is to be printed here. If a work is to come from the Department of the Interior or the Secretary of the Treasury, let the officer, upon his responsibility and after due examination, report the manuscript, and appeal to this House to print it for the Government of the United States if it shall be in need of it. And, sir, when it comes here finished and ready for publication, with his recommendation, let it be examined by a committee, and then we can never be caught in a scrape like that in which we have been caught, of taking one volume and committing ourselves to the printing of as many other volumes as the party chooses to write. And I believe that even now this book-writing is going on. The second volume of Emory's report has been written in part, and probably printed in part. Yes, sir, printed in part and written in part, and not yet completed in either respect; and they are going on continuing this writing until they get the book to suit themselves.

Now, sir, finally—for I have not the time to go over the ground I intended to occupy if I had the usual limit—let the House come up squarely and meet the question. If they have authorized their Committee on Printing to make these contracts for the publishing of all the books; if they have gone on and executed its order; then, sir, however economical I may be; however much I may favor retrenchment in the expenditures of the Government—as everybody knows from my past course I have done—yet, sir, when the credit of this Government is involved by a contract entered into by the vote of this House, over my own head and against my vote, I shall be prepared, at least as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, and as a member of this House, now and at all other times, to appropriate the amount necessary to fulfill that obligation on our part. I am ready, sir, to meet that responsibility, to go before my people on every such vote; and I think I know them well enough to say that they will approve of my course in doing what is necessary to maintain the obligation which the Government has assumed, and to discharge that obligation on its part.

I ask then, sir, whether this House, after taking this course of proceeding, after the contract has been made, the materials have been furnished, the work partly executed, and the printer has gathered together the necessary types and other fixtures to accomplish the entire job, after all that is done, will take advantage of its own wrong, and declare that it will not pay because this thing has run into the wildest species of extravagance?

The CHAIRMAN stated that the hour had arrived at which the debate was closed under the order of the House.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Chairman, as the member who reported the bill, I am entitled to one hour to close the debate; but I have sought the floor to submit a proposition that the committee do now rise for the purpose of going into the House, and extending the time for debate upon this bill. I hope it will meet the approbation of the committee. I submit the motion that the committee do now rise.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I suggest to the gentleman that that is useless; because if the time for debate is extended, we shall undoubtedly have this Kansas question, with which the patience of the committee has been already abused, brought up in a little while. I think, sir, we can accomplish all that is really necessary in the five minutes' debate upon amendments.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that he will have to dispose of the bill in some way. Let it be reported to the House, and then he can move to recommit it to the Committee of the Whole. Otherwise it will not be in order to extend the time for debate. It has been limited by the House, and a motion to reconsider the vote so limiting it has been laid upon the table. The only way in which his object can be attained now is for the committee to do something to the bill and report its action to the House, and then the House can recommit it.

Mr. PHELPS. I have every confidence, from the manifestations that have been made by members of the committee, that unanimous consent will be given to prolong the debate and confine it to the bill under consideration. I have, therefore, submitted the motion that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 202) to appropriate money to supply deficiencies for the paper, printing, binding, and engraving, ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PROPOSITION TO PROLONG DEBATE.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to submit a resolution extending the debate in Committee of the Whole upon House bill No. 202 until two o'clock to-morrow, and that the members discussing it shall confine themselves to the subject-matter of the bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I suggest to the gentleman from Missouri, whether it would not be better to bring the bill before the House and allow it to be discussed in the House proper, where the rule limiting debate to the pending proposition will be enforced? If we go back into the Committee of the Whole, we have no guarantee that other questions will not be immediately introduced into the debate. I suggest that, by common understanding, the bill be brought before the House and discussed until to-morrow at two o'clock.

Mr. FLORENCE. I do not desire to interfere much with the debate at this time, nor to consume the valuable time of the House, which has been so much wasted this week. But if we take up the bill in the House, what guarantee have we that the previous question will not be demanded, and the bill put upon its passage?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. We can vote it down.

Mr. FLORENCE. True enough we can vote it down, but if there is a disposition to put a stop to debate, the previous question can be demanded and sustained without opportunity being given to debate the merits of the bill. I hope it will be the general understanding that in committee the bill shall be discussed upon its merits until two o'clock to-morrow. We shall thus attain the end desired by the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution extending the debate on House bill No. 202 until two o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. SEWARD. I object.

Mr. GROW. I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that he ask unanimous consent that we shall go on and discuss the bill in the House, and then go back into the committee for the five minutes' debate.

Mr. PHELPS. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the

PRINTING DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. MILLSON. With the consent of the gentleman from Missouri, I will now submit a motion which will, I am sure, effect his object, and it is the one suggested just now, very properly, by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] and which I rose to make at the time he suggested it. It is, sir, that the committee rise and report the bill to the House. Then we get rid of the resolution of the House closing debate altogether. The House may immediately recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the committee can, at any moment thereafter, when weary of the debate, rise for the purpose of stopping farther debate.

Mr. PHELPS. As to the future disposition of the bill—

Mr. SEWARD. I shall object to the gentleman consuming an hour in closing the debate because he waived his privilege. I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Missouri only waived it temporarily, and is entitled to the floor. The Chair would remark further, that the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] is not in order, or would not be in order pending an amendment, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BURNETT] is now pending.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Chairman, the course which I proposed to the committee would have secured a fair and legitimate discussion upon the subject-matter under consideration; and, furthermore, it would have reserved to the committee the debate under the five minutes' rule. But the proposition indicated by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] would have had the effect of precluding the five minutes' debate. Where, under that arrangement, could you propose amendments and debate them?

I was desirous, sir, of securing to the fullest extent debate legitimate to the subject under consideration; but as the proposition which I have made, and those which have been submitted by other members, have been objected to, we must pursue such course as the rules point out for the consideration of this bill. Certain it is, that no one can impute to me a desire to preclude discussion of the matter now under consideration.

Much, sir, that I designed to have said upon the merits of this bill has been spoken by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] my colleague upon the Committee of Ways and Means, and he has explained to the House some of the reasons which influenced the Committee of Ways and Means in reporting this bill to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The other day, while this bill was under consideration, I referred to the various resolutions under which the printing had been directed to be executed, and, when my time for debate expired, I was proceeding to the consideration of the enormous expense appertaining to the public printing, and was proceeding to show that while there was a great deal of clamor about the emoluments which the Public Printer of the Senate and the Public Printer of the House of Representatives receive, yet, in fact, a large amount of the money paid for public printing was received by persons other than the Printer. For the sake of illustrating and proving this I will refer to some tables. I refer to tabular statement A, in Miscellaneous Document No. 3, which I will thank the reporter to insert in the report of my remarks.

This statement exhibits the number of copies of documents ordered by either House of Congress; the cost of printing, folding, and binding; of engraving maps and plates; the cost of paper and illustrations; the cost of binding extra copies; the cost of binding reserved copies; and the total cost of the work. This tabular statement also shows the actual cost of each volume of extra copies of the works therein mentioned, which were ordered to be printed. From this it will appear that the Public Printer, out of the total expenditure of $673,000, only received the sum of $93,496 63. The cost of dry-pressing is an item of expenditure which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BURNETT] objects to, and which he says is not authorized by existing law. My only answer in respect to that is this: that it has been so adjudicated under your act, providing for compensation to the Public Printer, by the First Comptroller of the Treasury, who audits and settles the accounts of the Public Printer. Therefore his censure must be a censure against the executive department of the Government—not a censure either of the Public Printer or of the Superintendent of the Printing, or of the House itself. If this construction of the law be erroneous on the part of the Comptroller, it is time for the House to correct it; but I am yet to ascertain that it is erroneous.

The cost of the paper on which these volumes have been printed amounts to the sum of $128,939 73—much more than you pay to the Printer; and the cost of illustration amounts to the modest sum of $266,408 54; and of binding the extra copies, to $140,876 37. For binding reserved copies—those which are distributed to public libraries, and of which one copy of all these documents is read by each member of Congress—is the sum of $28,050 40; the total cost being, as I before remarked, $673,173.

These figures carry out the remarks that I made the other day. I stated that these maps, illustrations, and engravings, were executed to accompany works ordered by Congress to be printed, and that the compensation actually paid to the Public Printer ranged only from one sixth to one twelfth of the total expenditure.

I also remarked the other day—though the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BURNETT] misunderstood me—that it was proposed by this bill to pay for works already executed, and for works which were in process of execution under authority given by one or other House of Congress.

Mr. SINGLETON. Does your estimate cover the whole ten thousand copies of the report of Emory's boundary commission?

Mr. PHELPS. It does not, and I will tell the gentleman why it does not.

Mr. SINGLETON. I will say this to the gentleman and to the committee. There is now in the hands of the chairman of the Committee on Printing of this House, a resolution proposing to strike off five thousand copies of the second volume of that work, the committee believing that we can dispense with that number, without any detriment to Congress or to the Public Printer. Again, sir; geological maps, to be printed in thirteen colors, have been ordered to be printed with this second volume. We propose, in this resolution, to dispense with these colored maps, so far as the extra number of copies are concerned. Let these colored maps go only with the regular copies. By these means a saving of $30,000 can be effected.

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman from Mississippi heard read the letter to the Secretary of the Interior. And let me remark, with reference to this boundary survey, Major Emory, who was appointed commissioner on the part of the United States to run that boundary line, has furnished the matter for the first volume of the report; and, as I understand, the engravings are being prepared. They were probably prepared when that first volume was distributed, some time during the past summer. They were prepared, however, under the authority of Major Emory. And here let me invite the attention of the House to a resolution which was reported from the Joint Committee on Printing, and which was passed in the Senate. This resolution proposed to divert the balance of the appropriation for running this boundary line to the printing of the report. But that gave no authority to the Secretary of the Interior to disburse the money in that manner.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I would like to ask a question of the gentleman from Missouri. I desire to know whether, if these works were stopped where they now are, any considerable sum of money would be saved to the Government?

Mr. PHELPS. I doubt whether anything would be saved to the Government by stopping the further execution of them, from the fact that a large amount of the work consists of plates, that are being engraved. A portion of them have been already executed, and the remainder are in process of execution at this time. I have here a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, giving additional information on this subject.

Mr. CLINGMAN. What about the coloring of the plates?

Mr. PHELPS. With regard to the coloring of them, I suppose the decision is to color them.

They are specimens of natural history and botany obtained by the scientific gentleman who accompanied that boundary survey commission; and I suppose that that scientific gentleman would inform the gentleman from North Carolina that if the plates were not colored, they would fail to convey such information as they are intended to convey.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I want to ascertain whether some considerable portion of this money might not be saved by our refraining to take any more of these plates than we have already taken?

Mr. PHELPS. I can answer you on no other terms than I have answered; because we do not know to what extent these engravings have been executed. We have gone on and made contracts for the engraving and printing of these plates; and if we now have their execution suspended, why, as a matter of course, the engravers would have equitable claims on Congress, as well for the work done as for damages on account of our violation of the contract; and you would have your Committee on Claims burdened with applications of this kind, to ascertain the amount due them. As these works are being executed, and the engravings being prepared in distant cities, the Committee of Ways and Means could not obtain the information in time for legislation. There are thirty-six of them being prepared in Europe.

Mr. CLINGMAN. My object, as the gentleman will see, is to obtain the facts in relation to the matter. While I am opposed to all publications of this sort, at the same time, if our contract has gone so far that no money would be saved by the defeat of this bill, I would not be in favor of defeating it.

Mr. PHELPS. My own opinion is, and I believe that is the opinion of a portion of my colleagues on the Committee of Ways and Means, that we could not stop the printing of this work, and save the Government of the United States any considerable portion of the expense.

Furthermore, I will state that we were actuated by this principle in the course we pursued: that when you have directed your printer, and when you have directed your engraver, to perform a certain work, and then refuse to appropriate the money under the contracts made by authority of the House and Senate, or by authority of the Government, we actually become repudiators—a position which I will never, by my vote, assume.

Mr. SINGLETON. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to another point. I wish to know whether the gentleman has any evidence as to whether or not these ten thousand maps ordered to be struck off have been executed; and if they have not been executed, whether we could not dispense with them without seriously impairing the value of the work?

Mr. PHELPS. In reply to the interrogatory, I will read a letter from the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SINGLETON. I wish to state further that we, as members of the Committee on Printing and Binding, have had before us individuals who were well acquainted with these maps, and we learned from them that none of them had been colored; that thirteen stones upon which this work is executed, and the coloring itself, have not been done; and so far as the ten thousand copies of the second volume are concerned, that we may dispense with those maps without any injury to the work itself. By refusing to color these maps we save the Government some $10,000.

Mr. PHELPS. If the gentleman expects the Committee of Ways and Means are going to examine into what is necessary to illustrate these works which the House has ordered to be printed, the House must appoint some other person than myself as a member of that committee; for it is an impossibility for us to investigate all these items of expenditure. When you have a Committee on Printing, whose duty it is to investigate and inquire into this matter, it is their duty to inquire whether you can dispense with any portion of the public printing, and whether, in their opinion, we can dispense with these plates which are being prepared in Europe, in Georgetown, in New York, Buffalo and Philadelphia. I now refer gentlemen to a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, in answer to certain inquiries made by myself. It is the following:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
January 27, 1858.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of yesterday, asking "how many plates of the boundary survey (Mexican) have been executed, where executed, how many are yet to be executed, and when?" and in reply I have to state that all the illustrations for the first volume have long since been completed. They are comprised in seventy-four steel engravings, three diagrams on copper, twelve stone engravings, and twenty wood cuts. (See "contents" of first volume.) As it will require some time to investigate this volume, so as to reply to your queries, and as it is nearly ready for distribution, under the Senate and House orders, I refer that you have reference more particularly to the illustrations of the second volume or appendix.

Major Emory, United States Commissioner, in a communication, addressed to the Department, dated October 7, 1857, stated that there were at that time one hundred and thirty-three pages (eighty-one plates) completed, illustrations for the second volume, being principally illustrations of the natural history and botany of the route, &c., about to be turned over to the Department; and further stated that there were about one hundred and forty-four pages more in progress in the hands of artists, viz:

33 steel pages, in the hands of Dr. Engelmann, in Europe.
28 (27) steel pages, in the hands of W. H. Dougal, Georgetown, District of Columbia.

2 lithographic plates, botany, in the hands of Ackerman, New York.

48 lithographic plates, botany, in the hands of Prestelle, Buffalo, New York.

25 lithographic plates, birds, in the hands of Cassin, Philadelphia.

4 or 5 plates (?) placed in the hands of some Paris engraver by Dr. Torry, of New York.

Since the date of Major Emory's report above referred to, Mr. Dougal has finished the twenty-seven (reduced one by rearrangement of material on the steel plates) in his hands. Ackerman has furnished informally seven proofs of botanical (stone) engravings. Prestelle has furnished nothing. Cassin has furnished nothing. Torry has furnished nothing. Engelmann has forwarded from Europe sixteen pages of botany, (steel plates,) now in the custom-house at New York, and daily expected here.

The Department has no official knowledge of the progress of the plates now in the hands of artists, nor any definite idea as to the exact number. Those remaining in the hands of Doctor Engelmann will not probably be finished in twelve months. Cassin's birds are about completed. Ackerman has probably in hand some ten or twelve plates, (stone,) which, it is understood, are a part of the forty-eight above referred to as being in the hands of Prestelle.

There appear, therefore, to be completed and in the custody of the Department, one hundred and sixty pages for the second volume, and about one hundred and sixteen in progress.

I am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. THOMPSON, Secretary.

Hon. JOHN S. PHELPS, M. C.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Missouri, whether in his opinion, if the execution of these works be arrested here, there will, either in law or equity, be a violation of any contract with any person whatever?

Mr. PHELPS. My opinion is that there will be. If any engraver has made a contract with a legally appointed officer of the Government to perform certain work, the Government becomes liable, in my opinion, not only for the work actually done, but, in strict justice, to damages for the non-performance of the contract.

Now, sir, in reference to the matter of how much is due the printer, gentlemen seem to misunderstand the position of the printer who is to perform the work. Some of these works were ordered to be printed by the House and Senate in the Thirty-Third Congress, and they are to be executed by the gentlemen who were the printers for the Thirty-Third Congress, and not by the printers whom the Senate and House have elected for the present Congress. Mr. Nicholson was elected printer of the House for the Thirty-Third Congress, and what is due on account of the printing ordered by the House for that Congress is due to him. Mr. Tucker was the printer for the Senate for the same Congress, and what is due on the work ordered by the Senate for that Congress is due to Mr. Tucker. You had two printers at the last session. Mr. Nicholson was the printer for the Senate, and Mr. Wendell for the House; and, sir, there are amounts due to these gentlemen for printing ordered to be done by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the Thirty-Fourth Congress. There is, too, a mass of printing executed which is only in part of works ordered; and so soon as the works shall be completed, and turned over to the Superintendent of Public Printing, these gentlemen will become entitled to their pay, according to the rates provided in the act of Congress of 1852.

Mr. GARNETT. I will ask the gentleman a question in connection with the inquiry of the gentleman from New York, and it is this: are not some of the contracts for engraving of this character: The contract is made by a certain party with the Committee on Engraving, to do a certain work, to engrave the drawings and maps; that is, that the contract is indefinite, like the order to the printer of the House, that he shall do all the work at a certain price which is put into his hands? If this be so, is not a portion of this engraving then of such a character that we can rescind the order in respect to drawings not yet in the engraver's hands without any violation of a contract? Does the gentleman from Missouri mean to say that the sum of $490,000, provided for by this bill for binding, lithographing, and engraving, is all the committee intended to pay, not only for orders already made, but for work actually in the engraver's and binder's hands?

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman has propounded several inquiries. One is, as I understand it, whether the contracts have not been made with one person to execute the engraving for a particular work? My information is different from that which the gentleman's question would lead us to infer he has received.

Mr. KELSEY. With the gentleman's permission, I will answer that question. There has been no contract made by the Committee on Engraving during the last Congress with any artist to do all the work appertaining to a particular work. The work has been divided among a large number of artists, in order that it should be finished in time; nor has any particular number of plates been assigned to any particular artist, so far as I am informed. After fixing the price to be paid for the work, the committee directed contracts to be made with several persons, dividing the work between them.

And here, sir, let me say that the entire amount of engraving ordered by the House, independent of the Senate, during the last Congress, as reported to me by the Superintendent of Public Printing, is $76,291 94. That does not include the engraving that the Committee on Engraving on the part of the House ordered in connection with the Committee on Printing on the part of the Senate.

Mr. GARNETT. The gentleman does not answer my question. I mean to inquire whether the contract was made for the engraving of a particular number of plates, or was it an indefinite contract for plates attached to a certain work?

Mr. KELSEY. The contract as directed to be made by the Committee on Engraving, is not for a specific number of plates, but that the plates belonging to a particular work shall in equal proportions be divided amongst a certain number of artists who bid for it.

Mr. GARNETT. And therefore if you rescind the order for plates not yet in the engraver's hands, there is no violation of contract?

Mr. KELSEY. I think not.

Mr. GARNETT. That is what I wanted to get at.

Mr. PHELPS. I referred the gentleman from Virginia, the other day, to the joint resolution passed on the 18th of January, 1855, which directs the Superintendent of Public Printing, whenever any drawings, maps, diagrams, views, or other engravings shall be required to illustrate any document ordered to be printed by either House of Congress, those engravings shall be procured by the Superintendent of Public Printing, under the directions of such committee as the House shall appoint. As I am informed, the Superintendent of Public Printing invites proposals, the Committee on Engraving inspects them, and the contracts are then made by the Superintendent. These engravings are divided up. And, sir, the gentleman from Virginia had an answer to his inquiry, in the letter from the Secretary of the Interior, which I read, if he had listened to it. There we were informed that six or eight different engravers are engaged in executing illustrations for that second volume of Emory's survey.

I was remarking, Mr. Chairman, when I was interrupted, that the amount which was due to the Public Printers, is not due to the Printers for the Senate and the House elected at the present session, but to the gentlemen who were the Public Printers at the time the work was ordered. Some four volumes of the Pacific railroad report have been printed, for instance, and other volumes are still to be published; and the compensation for printing those other works will go to Mr. Tucker and Mr. Nicholson, who were the Public Printers at the time the publication was ordered. So with the Commercial Relations, Mr. Nicholson was the Public Printer for the Senate, and Mr. Wendell for the House, when that book was ordered to be printed during the Thirty-Fourth Congress; and when it shall be completed, they will be paid for that work. Gentlemen seemed to misunderstand me when I remarked the other day, when I endeavored to explain, that the Superintendent of Public Printing never certified the account of the Public Printer to the Comptroller, to be audited and allowed, until the entire volume was furnished.

There are now several incomplete volumes in the hands of the gentlemen who have been executing the public printing for the last two Congresses. There is a portion of Gilliss's report to be finished. I was led into an error myself in reference to that work. I stated that there were two volumes of the manuscript which had not yet been placed in the hands of the Superintendent of Public Printing. That statement gave an erroneous impression to this committee, and I was misled myself, by the information I had received from the Superintendent of Public Printing. I had conversed with that gentleman, and with the gentleman who has been the chief clerk in the office since it was established, and I was informed by them that the manuscript for the fourth and fifth volumes of that report had never been placed in the charge of the Superintendent of Public Printing. But yesterday I was waited upon by the author of that book, who informed me that, in pursuance of a verbal order given him by Mr. Seaman, the late Superintendent, the manuscript had been sent directly to the Public Printer who is to execute the printing. The proof-sheets, as they were ready, had also been submitted to him. He informed me that a portion of the manuscript of each of those volumes had been furnished, under the order of Mr. Seaman, to the Public Printer, and that a portion of each had been printed. I argued, the other day, from the statement furnished to me, that the manuscript had not yet been furnished to the Superintendent or the Public Printer, that that work had not been commenced.

Mr. BURNETT. I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri if the sending of the manuscript, by the author, to the Public Printer in the manner in which it has been done, is not in direct violation of the law of 1852?

Mr. PHELPS. What provision of the law?

Mr. BURNETT. The provision requiring that all manuscripts shall be filed in the office of the Superintendent, and by him transmitted to the Public Printer.

Mr. PHELPS. Yes, sir; and I think that the action of the House, in ordering a document to be printed which was not written, was in violation of the spirit of the act of 1852. I think we ourselves have been guilty of a violation of the law of 1852, regulating the public printing. We ordered this very report of Lieutenant Gilliss to be printed before it was written.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. No, sir. Where is the resolution ordering it to be printed? It did not order anything to be printed that was not then prepared.

Mr. PHELPS. I read, the other day, the resolution under which that work was ordered to be printed. It is as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed and bound, by the Public Printer and Binder of the House, six thousand copies of the report, and two thousand copies of the observations of the United States naval astronomical expedition to Chili; five hundred copies of the report and observations for the use of the Secretary of the Navy, two hundred and fifty for the superintendent of the expedition, and the remainder for distribution by the members of the present House; said work to be printed in quarto or octavo form, as the work will admit and the Committee on Printing may direct."

Now, I state that the observations accompanying the report were not, at that time, reduced to a form for publication.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The gentleman means that matter, which has since been printed, was not then prepared; but did that resolution contemplate the printing of anything that was not in the report at that time? Did the resolution authorize the publication of anything afterwards to be written? I say, no.

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman and myself differ as to the construction of the resolution. But you have directed the Pacific railroad surveys to be printed before they were written. You directed, by a resolution of the House, the reports of Lander and Colonel Fremont to be printed, and it is well known that neither of these gentlemen had furnished reports.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I call again for the authority to print anything that was not written. We differ entirely about the construction of the authority.

Mr. PHELPS. Very well; we differ with respect to the construction of the authority. I tell the gentleman, and the committee, that the reports of Fremont and Lander had not been written when the resolution passed directing them to be printed. And I state further, that the Patent Office report has been ordered to be printed before it was here.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The resolution authorizing the publication of the Pacific railroad surveys did not authorize the publication of anything not then written. It is true, that under the construction given to the resolution, matter that was not then written has been published. I suppose, too, that, under the resolution authorizing the publication of Lieutenant Gilliss's report, the same thing has been done, and that they are going on now writing upon it, and will continue to do it just so long as this House sanctions it. But what did the resolution which the gentleman has read authorize? It authorized the publication of the report. What was meant by the report? Why, something in writing. For what purpose was it to be printed? For distribution among the members of that Congress. Does not that show that the resolution did not contemplate the publication of something which was to be written during succeeding Congresses, and which is still being written?

Mr. PHELPS. I will give the gentleman information in relation to another document ordered to be printed before the manuscript was even in the possession of the Secretary of State or of the House, and that is the report on Commercial Relations. The resolution was adopted by the House in this form:

Resolved, That the answer of the President of the United States to the resolution of the House of Representatives of December 14, 1853, upon the commercial relations of the United States with all foreign nations, be printed by the Printer of this House, in quarto form, under the direction of the Secretary of State, who is hereby authorized to cause all corrections therein which, in the course of printing, may be found requisite to be made, and also to cause to be added all additions thereto of commercial information which, subsequently to the transmission of said answer to the House, may reach the Department of State, which shall by him be deemed of sufficient importance."

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Why, Mr. Chairman, that is the resolution which was first offered, and which was referred to the Committee on Printing. Will the gentleman now turn to the resolution that was reported by that committee?

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman from Georgia is mistaken. That resolution was adopted, except so far as directing a certain number of extra copies to be printed.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. No, sir; that resolution, under the law regulating the public printing, had to go to the Committee on Printing; and that committee reported it back. Why, the gentleman has this day stated to the committee that the very number of pages which the work would make was given by the Secretary of State.

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman is in error, unless his statement is to contradict the records of the House. I read now from the Journal:

"To the House of Representatives:

"I transmit the report on the commercial relations of the United States with all foreign nations, in answer to the resolutions of the House of Representatives of December 14, 1853.

FRANKLIN PIERCE.

"WASHINGTON, March 4, 1855.

"The same having been read, Mr. ELLIHU B. WASHBURN offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to, to wit:"

Then follows the resolution which I have read, and which directs the printing of such information as should be subsequently received, as the Secretary of State might deem important. The Journal then goes on as follows:

"On motion of Mr. ORR.

"Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on Printing on the part of the House to inquire into the expediency of printing twenty thousand copies extra of said message and the accompanying documents."

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Will the gentleman allow me—

Mr. PHELPS. Not just now. I wish to explain.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The gentleman needs to explain.

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman is wrong in this. The House may order the printing of the regular number of any document; but when it is proposed to print extra numbers, the propriety of printing those extra numbers is referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. PHELPS. You may order the printing at any time of the President's message and the accompanying documents; but a proposition for the printing of extra copies for distribution is a matter which the Committee on Printing have to examine into. Now, I say that the resolution which I have read directed the printing of additions to be made to the report.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Missouri will give way to me for a moment. I know something in relation to the printing of this work entitled Commercial Relations; and as I have been alluded to by the gentleman from Virginia in his remarks as being in some degree responsible for the printing of it, I wish to refer to the record to show how it stands. I hope the gentleman from Missouri will let me have a very little time to explain this matter.

Mr. PHELPS. Do not take too much of my time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will be brief. It will be recollected by those who recollect anything about this subject, that the resolution in relation to these commercial statistics was introduced by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. FAULKNER,] on December 14, 1853, requiring this information to be given. On the 10th of March, 1856, the President of the United States transmitted to the House the information which was required by that resolution; and the then Secretary of State (the late Mr. Marcy) addressed a letter to me, as chairman of the Committee on Commerce of the last Congress, on the subject, and inclosed a form of resolutions to be passed by the House, which he supposed would answer the purposes of the original resolution requiring the information. That resolution was passed by the House unanimously. It provided for the printing in the manner therein specified.

The Secretary, in his letter to me, also transmitted a letter from the Superintendent, Mr. Flagg, the gentleman who had charge of the work. And it was not only on the authority of the information contained in that letter that I made my remarks before the House, but on the authority of the information which I obtained at the Department before I reported the resolution. I went to the State Department and examined the manuscript and somewhat into the character of the work. I was informed by the Superintendent that it would make a volume like one which he had in his office and printed by order of the British Parliament. I brought that volume to the House, and held it up to the view of the House in order to let it be seen what sort of a volume it was supposed it would make. The manuscript was sent in to the House at the time the resolution was passed, and the mistake was on the part of the Superintendent and Secretary as to how much printed matter the manuscript would make.

It only amounts to this, that the work being printed in a style and manner appropriate for such a work, it has made more than it was supposed. I will read what Mr. Flagg says in his letter:

"5. The report will probably make, if printed, a quarto volume about the size of one of the volumes of Executive Documents No. 91, containing the 'Report of Explorations and Surveys, &c., for a Railroad to the Pacific Ocean,' printed by order of the House in 1855, or the 'Coast Survey,' or the 'House List of Private Claims.' Commercial and statistical matter, like that of the present report, is generally printed by other Governments (by Great Britain, France, Belgium, Austria, Spain, Mexico, &c.) in the large quarto form, for the more convenient arrangement of tabular statements."

Mr. PHELPS. I have made no reflection upon the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I say further, that I had nothing to do with the extra copies; my resolution did not provide anything of the kind. The motion for such extra copies did not come from me. It came from the honorable Speaker of the House, who proposed twenty thousand extra copies; and as to all that matter of the price of printing, I had no knowledge.

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman has misunderstood my object in referring to this. I quoted that part of the resolution which directed the printing of any subsequent information that the Secretary might deem important, and which resolution the gentleman from Illinois says was prepared by the Secretary of State. I quoted it to sustain the position that I took. In reply to the interrogatory of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] I stated that the resolution directing that document to be printed had passed unanimously, and that it directed the printing of matter where the manuscript had not been received.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. One word more. I will show that the House did not act in the dark; that members were not misled. Here is the letter of Mr. Flagg on this subject, read in the presence of the House, and I want to read it now to do him justice, and to show further that the House was fully advised in the premises and knew what it was about:

"It is very respectfully suggested that, inasmuch as it is important that the House should comprehend the character and contents of the report about to be transmitted, in order that they may act understandingly in its disposition, and, inasmuch as very little can now be known of it, and, if printed, months must elapse before it can appear, and inasmuch as the introductory letter of the Superintendent to the Secretary of State gives, in about a dozen foot-scrap pages of ordinary writing, a complete resumé of the whole report, it might be well if a few thousand copies of that letter were printed at once for general information."

Although this work has cost a considerable sum, it has cost less than any work of the kind ever printed. It is undoubtedly the most comprehensive, most important, and most valuable work ever printed by Congress, and does great credit to the gentleman (Mr. Flagg) who got it up. It has given us great credit at home and abroad.

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman from Illinois has paid a very handsome compliment to Mr. Flagg, which I endorse.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I suppose that the gentleman from Missouri will no longer insist on that resolution which he has read, being so construed as to authorize the printing of two or three additional volumes.

Mr. PHELPS. The resolution does sustain my position, that the House did order the printing of manuscript not in its possession, but not that it ordered the printing of extra copies. I am not contending for that. It ordered the printing of manuscript which might be thereafter compiled under the direction of the Secretary of State. It ordered the printing of information which might be received subsequent to the date when he communicated that document to the House, and which the Secretary might regard as important to the commercial relations of the country.

But the gentleman from Georgia seems to find fault with this public printing. Has not that gentleman been aware that a resolution was adopted directing the printing of the Pacific railroad surveys? Has he not been aware that expenses were incurred in the procurement of the paper, in placing the manuscript in the hands of the printer, and in directing him to execute the work in pursuance of the act of 1852? Has he not been aware that maps and illustrations have also been placed in the hands of engravers, under contracts made by lawful authority, and that the expenses were running on day after day? And when has he interfered to arrest this expenditure?

But now that contracts have been lawfully made, and that the work has been progressing under them, a singular spirit of economy seems to have come over the committee; and certain gentlemen are willing to put in practice the principle of repudiation, and to repudiate and refuse to pay the obligations which our predecessors have incurred and which are as valid and binding on us as the bonds of the Government which were issued under the act of 1847, and which are now outstanding, or as the Treasury notes that were authorized to be issued the other day, and that are now in the hands of the community. Go to the public printing office here, and you will find some four hundred persons employed, and you will find an amount due to the persons engaged in the management of that concern of nearly sixty thousand dollars. During these late hard times indeed they were compelled to borrow money to pay their workmen, at the rate of from three to five per cent. a month. And yet members of the House of Representatives are unwilling to pay the amount due for this public printing, so as to enable the printer to pay the wages of the workmen in his employ.

There is another view to be taken in connection with this matter. That is, that one who was a Public Printer is now abroad, and has left that duty to be discharged by another person in his name—to execute the printing ordered by the Senate during the Thirty-Third Congress; and liabilities have been incurred, and money is due to him on this account.

What else? You have sent abroad over the country inviting proposals for furnishing paper, according to the directions of the act of 1852. Paper manufacturers have made their proposals to the Superintendent of the Public Printing. Their propositions have been accepted, and they required to furnish from time to time paper for the public printing, and have furnished it; and at this time there is over one hundred thousand dollars due to these paper manufacturers, and they are embarrassed on account of the non-payment of the amount due them. They appeal, not to the liberality of Congress; but they ask that the contracts which they made shall be faithfully executed and observed. They ask Congress to place at the disposal of the Government the money necessary to liquidate their just demands under their contracts. The same may be said of the engravers, lithographers, and copper-plate printers, scattered through the northern cities. They have been employed under competent authority to execute these works, to furnish these maps and charts to us; and they want from this Government the money justly due them.

These, Mr. Chairman, are some of the reasons that induced the Committee of Ways and Means to ask for the passage of this bill. We must endeavor to guide our course in future by the examples that we have had. I was pleased, the other day, to see the defeat of the resolution reported by the Committee on Printing, providing for the printing of the Coast Survey report. It was estimated that the cost of these copies would amount to $20,000; and yet, in my opinion, the expense would have exceeded the amount estimated by that committee. Gentlemen will recollect that the cost of the printing of the Coast Survey report for the last Congress was near forty thousand dollars, and although the Committee on Printing proposed to reduce the number of copies ordered to be printed for the present session, yet they will not thereby diminish the cost in the same proportion. The cost of composition will be the same whether you print one copy, five hundred, or five thousand.

Mr. Chairman, I have had no desire, as the committee will bear me witness, of precluding debate upon this bill. The Committee of Ways and Means were actuated by the belief that the appropriation of this money was necessary to comply with the contracts of the Government. We, however, desired to put the items relating to this subject in a bill by itself, for the purpose of calling the attention of the country to the extravagance of the preceding Congresses, in the hope that the constituents of the members of the present Congress will hold them to a strict accountability, and that now, while the Government is borrowing money, while we concede that the former Congresses ordered documents to be printed which were unnecessary, and which it would have been expedient not to print, let us govern our course in future in view of the experience we have derived from the acts of the preceding Congresses.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri to the disparity of the cost between the same volumes of Commercial Relations, as published by the House and by the Senate. I find, for instance, that the first volume ordered by the Senate contains eight hundred and twenty-eight pages, and cost $2 53 per volume; while the same volume, ordered by the House, contains eight hundred and twenty-eight pages, and cost $2 38 per volume.

Mr. PHELPS. I will answer the inquiry of the gentleman in one moment. The price paid to the binder of the Senate was a little higher than that paid to the binder of the House. The gentleman is aware that the binder of the House is appointed, and that his compensation is regulated by the Committee on Printing upon the part of the House; and that the binder of the Senate is appointed and his compensation regulated by the Committee on Printing upon the part of the Senate. The Senate paid a little more for its binding than the House, and this accounts for the disparity to which the gentleman alludes.

Mr. BOYCE. The gentleman from Missouri speaks of some of these plates having been executed in Paris. I wish to ask him whether they could not have been as well executed in this country?

Mr. PHELPS. I suppose they could; but it is probable, in consequence of the large amount of engraving in the process of being executed by the engravers in our country, it was impossible to have the work executed as soon as required, and, therefore, engravers in other countries were employed.

Some conversation here occurred between Mr. PEYTON and Mr. PHELPS, entirely inaudible to the reporter, when the hammer fell, the hour for closing debate having expired.

The CHAIRMAN stated the question to be on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BURNETT.]

Mr. CRAWFORD. I move to strike out all after the tenth line, and to insert the following:

To pay for paper, $104,000.

To pay for the printing ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives during the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, $47,619 94.

To pay for the binding, lithographing, and engraving, ordered by the Senate during the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, $164,569 64.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Public Printer is hereby instructed and required not to print any further "reports of the results of the United States naval astronomical expedition to the southern hemisphere," nor "of the explorations and surveys to ascertain the most practicable route for a railroad from the Mississippi river to the Pacific ocean," nor "of the United States commission to survey a boundary line between the United States and the Republic of Mexico," other than such reports of each as may be now written and in his hands for publication.

Mr. Chairman, as the hour debate has been terminated, I have not the time to discuss these questions as I would like. I will speak of some others than those I shall now address myself to, as the debate progresses.

I am in favor of paying for the work that has been done. I only propose to cut off everything that has not been done. I find, that in reply to an interrogatory from the Committee of Ways and Means, the Superintendent of Public Printing has declared the amount due and required to pay for the paper for the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses to be $104,000. That is due, and we ought to pay it. He says in his report that he answers this question, although he was not requested to do so; yet other questions which were propounded to him he does not answer. I propose to pay for this paper, and to cut off the rest. This will save the Government $65,000. I propose to pay also for the printing ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives during the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses. The amount is $47,619 94. We owe that much, according to the report of the Superintendent of Public Printing, and we ought to pay it. I propose to pay also for the binding, lithographing, and engraving, ordered by the Senate during the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses. The amount is $164,569 64. That is due, and ought to be paid. The whole amount which I propose to cut down is $474,000.

We were called upon, in the deficiency bill in 1856, to supply the sum of $406,000 as deficiencies in lithographing and engraving. Congress did vote that amount for the purpose specified; and we were called upon in 1857 to vote the round sum of $250,000, to supply deficiencies in the same character of appropriations. We are called upon now to vote an additional appropriation of $790,000—making, in round numbers, in all, $1,446,643—to supply deficiencies for printing, binding, &c., of books; some of which, it is stated, are not yet written, while others are in the process of preparation. In regard to Gilliss's report, we are informed by the Superintendent of Public Printing that he has no information when that work will be finished—to what number of volumes the results of the astronomical surveys in the southern hemisphere will run. I propose to stop these works, all of them, just where they are; I propose to cut down this bill to $316,000, which is the amount the Government owes, and ought to pay. I would rather pay the damages we will subject ourselves to, than to run up a deficiency bill to $1,000,000 at each session of Congress.

The Superintendent of Public Printing tells us, sir, that he has no information, I will repeat, as to the period at which the completion of Mr. Gilliss's report is probable; and if we are to continue in this line, there is no telling the amount of money that will be required to supply deficiencies before the work is printed. I understand the author has been relieved from his position in the Navy, and that he has nothing to do now but to write out his report of his surveys, &c., in South America. Are we in a condition to afford this? With a necessity existing, calling for extraordinary means to get money into the Treasury, and while war threatens with Utah, are we to extravagantly lavish hundreds of thousands of dollars upon this book? These are pertinent questions.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am sorry for it. Others have obtained the floor to discuss Kansas affairs and other questions, when I have failed to get it with a view to discuss the bill before the committee.

Mr. SANDIDGE. Is further amendment in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order to reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia, if the gentleman wishes to do so. The gentleman can only speak to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. NICHOLS. With the gentleman's permission I will make some remarks in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia. If I understand the amendment, it proposes to dispense with any work necessary to complete the works now in progress. It may be very proper for the House to manifest its sense of what has been done in reference to some of these works. To that I have no objection. I believe, sir, that the pruning knife might be applied even to this bill, and amendments made to it, which will work good. But I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, and for this reason: Take one single work—there is the Commercial Relations of the United States with all nations; you have the first, third, and fourth volumes printed. I presume there is no question in the mind of any gentleman as to the value of that work. The amendment of the gentleman would stop the publication of the only volume necessary to complete the series, the second volume.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman misunderstands my amendment. There is nothing in it about the report on commercial relations.

Mr. NICHOLS. As I understand the proviso of the gentleman from Georgia, it cuts down all that is not now printed. That is what I oppose. I want this report on Commercial Relations completed. I want also the Pacific railroad surveys completed. Have gentlemen who served in the last House of Representatives forgotten that, upon a distinct question made in reference to that work after prolonged discussion and fierce controversy, the money was placed within the control of the Secretary of War for the express purpose of preparing the maps, engravings, and illustrations, which gentlemen are now talking so much about?

I say that, if the work is costing money, it is the fault, not of the House, but of the officers who are preparing it, and the House which heretofore authorized this publication, and placed the means in the hands of these officers of swelling the expenditures in reference to it. For this reason, and believing, too, that the work itself is a work of great utility, I wish to see it completed.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that it is necessary to complete that work, or the work of Emory, in the style and manner that they are estimated for here. Why, sir, I find in these estimates forwarded to the Committee of Ways and Means, a sum set down here for colored engravings. Let any gentleman take the second volume of the Japan Expedition, and look through it, and he will find that the views of scenery are not colored; but when you come to a picture of a little fish, you find it spotted with a color or two, and the increased cost is in consequence of this change in the ordinary mode of illustrating these works. Strike down all these profuse illustrations; put a limitation upon the appropriation which shall restrain the contractors to that end, but that which is useful of itself—of practical utility—I ask the House to retain.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Is it in order now to offer an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that it is not. The amendment to the amendment must first be disposed of.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I desire to say to the committee that I will withdraw my amendment in the shape in which it now is, and present it as a substitute for all after the tenth line of the bill.

Mr. GROW. I object to its being withdrawn for that purpose.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I will withdraw the amendment, if there is no objection.

Mr. GROW. I object. Let us have a vote upon it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that the gentleman from Georgia proposes to withdraw his amendment as he has presented it, and submit his amendment by way of a substitute for the entire bill, or for two thirds of it.

The CHAIRMAN. There is objection to the withdrawal of the amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. There can be none.

Mr. GROW. I object.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Georgia has a right to withdraw his amendment, and then submit another.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that he has no such right.

Mr. EUSTIS. I desire to ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRAWFORD] a question.

[Cries of "Order!" and "Question!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. GROW. Is it in order now to move to strike out the fourteenth and fifteenth lines?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not. The question before the committee is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. EUSTIS. I desire to ascertain—and I ask the Chair if it is not in order for me to ask the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. CRAWFORD]—whether the amount of $104,000, which the gentleman from Georgia proposes to substitute for the amount reported by the Committee of Ways and Means to pay for the paper of the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, includes the amount which will be required to pay for the paper of the second volume of the Commercial Relations, or is that excluded?

Mr. LETCHER. Certainly it is excluded.

Mr. EUSTIS. The third and fourth volumes have already been published, and we ought surely to appropriate the money to pay for the paper of the second volume.

[Cries of "Order! Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana is not in order.

Mr. GROW. I rise to a point of order. The motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BURNETT], as I understand it, is to strike out all after the enacting clause. The motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRAWFORD] is to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky. Now, it is in order to amend any portion of a bill proposed to be stricken out; and, therefore, it will be in order to move to strike out lines fourteen and fifteen of the bill; because, sir, if you cannot amend before the motion to strike out is carried, you cannot perfect the original bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I want to know the state of the question.

Mr. GROW. I ask the Chair to decide my point of order which is, that any portion of the bill proposed to be stricken out is open to amendment before the vote is taken on striking out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not in this stage of the proceedings, and overrules the question of order.

Mr. GROW. I would like to know, then, how you can perfect the original bill?

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to know what is the precise state of the question?

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending, and also an amendment to the amendment which will be reported.

The Clerk read the amendments.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRAWFORD] is intended as a substitute for the bill. It is competent for the committee to perfect the original bill before the vote be taken between it and the substitute; and it is also competent to amend the substitute offered by the gentleman from Georgia before the vote be taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not, and that the vote must be taken on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SHAW, of Illinois. I desire to know whether the substitute proposes to appropriate a sufficient amount to pay for all the matters now in the hands of the artists?

Mr. MORGAN. Are we to have the question put, or is this dialogue to go on over there in a corner?

The CHAIRMAN. Discussion is not in order.

Mr. CRAWFORD demanded tellers on his amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SMITH, of Tennessee, and DEAN were appointed.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I desire to know whether, if the substitute be adopted, we can amend the substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chairman thinks so, at present.

Mr. LETCHER. I desire to inquire whether, if the substitute of the gentleman from Georgia be adopted, it would be in order to strike out any part of it?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not. No part of the substitute can be stricken out.

Mr. GARNETT. Would it not be competent for the committee to amend it by way of addition?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I would inquire from the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] whether he agrees with my colleague [Mr. CRAWFORD] that, if his amendment prevails, it will cover all we owe for work done or executed? Will it relieve us from all we owe in that matter?

Mr. LETCHER. No, sir, I do not agree with him in any such thing. Suppose I contract to purchase a plantation from you at so much an acre, which is estimated to contain five hundred acres, but which, on being surveyed, is shown to contain one thousand acres, am I not bound by my contract to pay you for the whole quantity it contains?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move, before the question be taken, to amend the original bill, by striking out the sixteenth line, "to pay for printing and lithographing."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that motion to be out of order, the House being in the act of dividing.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Then I raise a question of order. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRAWFORD] proposes to strike out all after the ninth line of the bill. Before that question is put, I have a right to amend the bill as it stands. Most assuredly I have.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The House is dividing on the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRAWFORD] to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BURNETT.]

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The Chair does not seem to understand my point of order. The motion made by my colleague was, to strike out certain lines of the original bill. Before that motion is put, it is in order to amend the original matter. Does the Chair overrule my point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does overrule it. The Chair is of opinion that it is not in order now.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Then I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment to strike out all after the seventh line of the bill and insert other words. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRAWFORD] proposes another amendment. The other gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] makes the point of order, that it is in order to perfect the original bill before the question be taken, and the Chair overrules the point of order. From that decision of the Chair the gentleman [Mr. STEPHENS] appeals. The question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

The question was taken; and there were, on a division, ayes 67; noes 51.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. BURNETT. With the consent of the committee, I will accept the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. CRAWFORD,] and incorporate it as a part of my amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. I object.

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman has clearly the right to modify his amendment.

Mr. BURNETT. Then I modify my amendment as I have indicated.

Mr. HOWARD. I object, and submit that the gentleman has not the right to modify his amendment. Tellers were ordered, and the vote was being taken, and the gentleman, at this stage of the proceedings, has certainly not the right to modify his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the gentleman cannot now modify his amendment.

Mr. BURNETT. I understand that I can modify my amendment at any time before the vote is being taken upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will resume their places.

Mr. GROW. I rise to a question of order. I submit that the rule provides expressly that a member may withdraw or modify his proposition at any time before a vote has been taken on it. Now, sir, no vote has been taken upon the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky and he has a right to modify it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. BURNETT. I think I have clearly that right, and I shall be compelled to appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have the rule read upon which he bases his decision.

The 34th rule was read, as follows:

"34. No member shall occupy more than one hour in debate on any question in the House or in committee; but a member reporting the measure under consideration from a committee, may open and close the debate: Provided, That where debate is closed by order of the House, any member shall be allowed, in committee, five minutes to explain any amendment he may offer, after which any member who shall first obtain the floor shall be allowed to speak five minutes in opposition to it, and there shall be no further debate on the amendment; but the same privilege on debate shall be allowed in favor of and against any amendment that may be offered to the amendment; and neither the amendment nor an amendment to the amendment shall be withdrawn by the mover thereof, unless by the unanimous consent of the committee."

Mr. BURNETT. I understand the rule to prevent a member from withdrawing his amendment except by unanimous consent; but I do not propose to withdraw my amendment, but only to modify it so as to accept the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks otherwise and overrules the question of order. The tellers will resume their places.

Mr. COVODE. I submit that the proposition is a new one.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is out of order.

Mr. COVODE. I rise to a point of order. A vote was taken and tellers were ordered. After the tellers were ordered, an amendment was offered. It is now a new question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman is mistaken. There has been no amendment proposed since tellers were ordered.

Mr. GROW. I rise to a point of order. My point is this: The gentleman from Kentucky moved to strike out a portion of the bill. Now, sir, I submit that before the motion can be put, the friends of the matter proposed to be stricken out must have an opportunity of perfecting it. I refer to the one hundred and fifth page of Jefferson's Manual, which says:

"In like manner, if it is proposed to amend by striking out a paragraph, the friends of the paragraph are first to make it as perfect as they can, by amendment before the question is put upon striking out."

Now my point of order is, that under that rule, the question cannot be put upon the motion to strike out until the words proposed to be stricken out are perfected, and then the motion to strike out will come up.

Mr. SEWARD. I move the committee rise.

The question was agreed to; there being, on division—ayes 92, noes 38.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 202) to appropriate money to supply deficiencies for the paper, printing, binding, and engraving, ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, and had come to no resolution thereon.

HENRY KING'S HEIRS.

On motion of Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the Court of Claims the claim of Henry King's heirs, and that it be referred to the appropriate committee of the House.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. BOYCE moved that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to Monday next.

Mr. WARREN moved that the House adjourn to seven o'clock in the evening.

The SPEAKER. The amendment is not in order.

Mr. HOUSTON demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE demanded tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WRIGHT, of Georgia, and BUFFINGTON were appointed.

The motion was agreed to; the tellers having reported—ayes 95, noes 67.

RESOLUTIONS OF OHIO.

Mr. HALL, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, presented the resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Ohio, relating to Kansas affairs; which were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask the consent of the House that the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of certain papers in relation to the construction of a railroad to the Pacific, and that they be referred to the select committee on the Pacific railroad. The papers were referred to the Committee on Public Lands before the select committee was organized.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman present this paper?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes, sir, some time ago Mr. WALBRIDGE. I object.

Mr. ROBBINS. I ask leave to introduce a bill of which previous notice has been given.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask the regular order of business.

And then, on motion of Mr. WARREN, the House (at thirty-three minutes past three o'clock p. m.) adjourned until Monday next.

IN SENATE.

Monday, February 1, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. JOSHUA MORSELL.

The Journal of Thursday last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WADE presented the petition of S. W. Turner and A. A. Turner, praying for compensation for the transportation of the mails from Cleveland up Lake Superior; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I present a memorial from the General Assembly of the State of Alabama, for the erection of an arsenal of construction in the coal region of that State. The memorial sets forth that there are inexhaustible fields of bituminous coal in that State, which has been proved, by actual experiment, to be equal to any in the United States, for fuel, the generating of steam, the manufacture of iron, and for other purposes. In the same region are found inexhaustible quantities of lime rock and iron ore which is unsurpassed for its yield and the fineness of the iron produced from it. That region of country is one of the most healthy of the State of Alabama, and it is in the midst of a virgin forest, through which there has recently been constructed a railroad, by which the lime, the iron, and the coal which are found there are brought within, perhaps, four hours' run of the Alabama river, and within, perhaps, eighteen or twenty hours' run of the bay of Mobile and the Gulf of Mexico. The memorial represents, also, that the whole Gulf coast, and all the Gulf States, have heretofore been deprived of the benefits of an institution of this kind, the nearest being that at Springfield. They ask for an arsenal now with the more confidence, because there is in process of construction what is called the Northwestern and Southeastern road, connecting with the railroads to the West, and there will soon be in process of construction a railroad from Pensacola to Montgomery, and one from thence to that rich mineral country, through which facilities of transit will thus be supplied. The General Assembly has elaborated all these facts in this memorial, and they ask Congress at least to order an examination or survey of that country preparatory to the establishment of an arsenal of construction. I beg leave to submit this memorial, and move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SEWARD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 106) for the relief of Elijah F. Smith, Gilman H. Perkins, and Charles F. Smith; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GWIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Mrs. Jane Turnbull; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also submitted a paper on the subject; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COLLAMER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 111) to alter the times of holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the district of Vermont; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

STATISTICS OF MINES AND MANUFACTURES.

Mr. BIGLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 16) in relation to the statistics of mines and manufactures of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What reference of the resolution does the Senator propose?

Mr. BIGLER. I ask that the Senate proceed to consider it now.

Mr. STUART. That resolution had better be referred to some committee. I move to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BIGLER. It does not relate to foreign affairs; it treats of domestic subjects.

Mr. MASON. It should be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BIGLER. If Senators will permit me, I will make a very brief explanation of the purpose of the resolution. It does not involve a dollar of expenditure. When the last census was taken, the statistics of mines and manufactures were taken under the law, and they are now in the Department of State, scattered in loose sheets. This resolution simply directs the Secretary of State to cause the digest to be completed, and these statistics to be included. He says it can be done without any additional clerkships, for the force in the Department is sufficient. It is only intended to give him authority to put the papers in proper order for reference and use hereafter. This is the census up to the close of the middle of this century; and it seems to me that it is a very important matter to have these papers in convenient form, but the Secretary has no power now to do the work. The resolution involves no expenditure, and no question of printing.

Mr. GWIN. I suppose the resolution goes over under the rule.

Mr. BIGLER. I have no objection to its reference to any committee.

Mr. MASON. I would suggest the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BIGLER. Very well; I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that it had passed a bill (H. R. No. 63) to supply an omission in the enrollment of a certain act therein mentioned.

The bill was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 79) to increase the military establishment of the United States, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. TOOMBS to strike out the first section.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, not being prepared to support this bill, I think it proper to offer a very few remarks on the subject this morning. I believe it is a principle in our Government not to encourage the raising and maintenance of large standing armies in time of peace. This principle should not be departed from. The disposition of the present military force of the country is doubtless correct; and if I could perceive any advantage to result to the country from the adoption of this proposition, or if the present exigency was such as to require an additional force, I should with much cheerfulness render my support to the measure. I trust, sir, that this subject is presented in such a way that opposition to it will not be construed into opposition to the Administration or the general measures of the Government; but that, viewed upon principle, the right of every member of this body to form his conclusions in relation to its policy will be accorded to those who may be opposed to it. I have every disposition to render an earnest and cordial support to the Executive in those measures he may propose, which may strike me as in accordance with the wants of the country; and in regard to those measures in which I differ from him, I shall pay all due deference to the wisdom and patriotism of the chief of the nation. But, when measures of this character come up, it is the right of every individual Senator to form his own opinion of the necessity which may exist for them, and to render or withhold his support as he may think proper.

The section of country from which I come has been referred to as an example inculcating the necessity of an increased military force. Texas, it is said, has called for an additional force. It is true that Texas, through her Legislature, has memorialized the Congress of the United States for a military force, but not for an increase of the regular Army. She asks for a regiment of rangers to protect her frontier. In my opinion it is necessary that that peculiar description of force should be accorded to Texas. Texas has been peculiarly situated since her annexation to the United States. At that time she had peace on her borders, from one extremity to the other; she had not a regular soldier within her limits; she had not a military company in service within her limits or upon her borders; since then, thousands of regular soldiers have been there, and millions of money have been expended for their support. In 1853, the regular troops in Texas amounted to about three thousand. That has been the average number since. The military force there at this time amounts to three thousand three hundred and fifty-two. These troops are distributed upon our frontiers at different stations. More than nineteen hundred infantry are there; but, so far as they are concerned, in efficiency, and in affording protection to the settlements, they might as well be at Passamaquoddy bay, as on the frontiers of Texas. Men stationed and stationary on the frontiers of Texas are utterly useless. Within sight of their fort a foray may be made on our borders, or an inroad of Indians may penetrate into the country for an indefinite distance, and return again, in sight of the fort, and these men be utterly inefficient to protect the country. They can give no protection, for the reason that they cannot pursue their assailants; and the Indians, seeing that they are perfectly harmless and inefficient, regard them no more than they would a parcel of stockades. I have yet to learn that when an inroad has been made within our settlements, regular troops have pursued the Indians, and made reclamation for injury, or have retaken property. There may have been such instances, but I cannot think of them. If they had occurred, they would have made a deep impression on my mind. I have heard of none such; or, if I have, I have not retained them in my memory.

This is the situation of the frontier of Texas. In order to remedy the existing evils, in consequence of the description of troops you send there, and their stations in relation to our frontier, Texas desires to have a more efficient force. She wants men who understand the disposition of the Indians, and who understand the description of warfare that will render a defensive force efficient against them. She does not ask for an increase of the regular military force of the United States. You may withdraw every regular soldier of the artillery, infantry, and dragoons, from the border of Texas, and take them to Utah or any other station you think proper, if you will give her but a single regiment, one thousand or even eight hundred men, of Texas rangers to protect her frontier. She would derive real advantage from that, but not from stationary forces.

The expense now incurred for transportation and provisions alone, for the regular force there, would nearly support that number of Texas rangers. They are men who are acquainted with action; they are efficient; they are athletic; they are inured to toil, to enterprise, to danger; and they carry with them a spirit that is not to be found in the troops that are generally collected in the regular Army, who are confined to a routine of duty, uninured to toil and exercise, and without a quick eye to perceive the movements of an adversary. Every man who would be in the corps of rangers would be a man who is himself capable of controlling a campaign; some of them would be men accustomed from early infancy to duty and enterprises of this kind. This is the force asked for by Texas. It is of a peculiar description, such as her necessities and her condition require, but not such as have been stationed there for years past.

It was alleged by the honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. IVERSON], that the fortresses which had been constructed on our frontier had been for the purpose of protecting settlements, and that they had always accompanied the settlements. That gentleman, I must say with great deference to his general intelligence in this peculiar branch of knowledge, has been unfortunate; for you will find that some eleven stations in Texas, which have been occupied by the regular Army, where over three thousand men are stationed, have been advanced to very great distances beyond the settlements. You will find Fort Duncan advanced one hundred and twenty miles beyond the settlements when it was established; Fort Clark not less than forty-five miles; Fort Davis, three hundred miles, Fort Mason, fifty miles, Fort McKavitt, seventy-five miles; Fort Terrett, seventy-five miles; Fort Chadbourne, one hundred and fifty miles; Fort Graham, thirty miles; Fort Lincoln, sixty-five miles; Fort Inge, eighty-five miles; Fort Belknap, one hundred and sixty miles; making the mean distance beyond the frontier seventy-nine miles at which these forts have been established.

The expense of furnishing supplies at these various forts is at least equal to the amount that would support a regiment of rangers on the frontiers of Texas. The expense is immense. The provisions, and, if cavalry is stationed there, the forage for the animals, costs an immense sum. So, these troops may be withdrawn without detriment to Texas, and with benefit to the general necessities of the regular Army of the United States, if you leave Texas with eight hundred or a thousand rangers, who will give more protection than all the regular Army of the United States. They would be men who can ride on horses, who understand thoroughly the disposition of the Indians, who know their inclination, their points of foray and attack, and who can pursue them to their fastnesses, or track them as the beagle would the deer. When, however, you take men such as constitute the regular Army, who are unaccustomed to frontier life, to whom Indian habits are unknown, who are utterly incompetent for these duties, they are useless on our frontier.

For this reason I will cheerfully vote to give Texas such a force; and I would, if I were capable of doing so, advocate to a successful achievement the application for a regiment of rangers to protect her frontier. It is necessary; it is indispensable; and without it no efficient protection can be given. The force which has been there heretofore, though well designed, has been placed there under a misapprehension, and has not accomplished the purpose for which it was intended; and therefore it is comparatively useless. There is a plan by which protection can be given to that country. If a regiment of a thousand rangers be placed there, it would only be necessary that they should touch at the several fortresses. It would not be necessary for them all to be on the scout or ranging at one time; a portion of them, if there were invalid horses or men, could keep the several stations, whilst the élite of the command would go out in quest of the Indians, and for the protection of our border, keeping up constant vigilance and activity.

Our frontier can be protected without so large a standing Army as we now have numerically. Upon our frontier establish a fortification, or keep the fortifications that are established, with fifty or one hundred men, and there set up trading houses. Let the Indians go there to trade. Do not hunt them up in their hunting parties, to make war upon them when they are at peace, but invite them there to trade. Finding the convenience of obtaining such things as they need, either for taste, or dress, or otherwise, or supplies of provisions such as could be furnished them in part, they will become reconciled to the white people; they will meet them on other occasions than those of hostility, and they will meet them amicably; they will associate with them; they will discover some good qualities in them; they will discover some kindness to the Indians, and not perpetual war and hostility, which places them either in an offensive or defensive position towards the United States. This will create a state of feeling in their breasts that will influence their councils and their conduct. Finding that it is for their advantage to maintain these amicable relations, they will soon become domesticated, if you will allow the term, or reconciled to the white people, and peace will take the place of depredation and warfare on our frontiers. Let them get the supplies that are necessary at these trading houses, and not have to go to other sections and to other people to obtain them, and they will be content.

It is said the Mormons are rendered formidable by their relationship to the Indians, and that the Indians in their neighborhood are to join them. Why should they join the Mormons in opposition to the United States? They are in juxtaposition with them, and if they have been hostile to them, the Indians will necessarily cherish a reciprocal hostility to them. The Indians have received annuities from the United States, and if properly treated it would be the natural tendency of their feelings that they should be friendly with the United States. Instead of that, we find them ready to associate with a people who do not confer benefits on them, but who, in their personal and tribal intercourse, treat them with a degree of friendship that they do not receive from the agents of the United States, or from our border men, or our soldiers. If that course had been pursued by us, how could the Mormons, without resources, control the feelings of the Indians or secure their alliance? We had the power, and if we had managed it with the same policy that they have done, the Indians would not only have consulted their interest by remaining faithful to the cause of the United States, but they would have been our allies and our friends, opposed to the Mormons. It is by extending to them kindness, friendship, hospitality, when they have an opportunity, and justice on all occasions, that you secure the confidence of the Indian; for it is only justice he wants. He may be a beggar, and if you refuse him alms, he has sense enough to know that it is your right. If you have aught to give him, give it graciously; for he can appreciate the manners and feelings of the white people as well as Chesterfield could in the Court of St. James. These are the considerations which influence the Indians.

If you will establish trading houses with a sufficient force to give protection to the traders, and let the Indians form an intercourse there, you will secure their friendship, and you will need no army to protect your frontier. I have never yet known a frontier to be protected by stations and by forts. It might be, if the Indians knew you could pursue them successfully; but so long as they are aware that you are harmless in your fortresses, they will defy you. They are not going to stand up and let you shoot them from the fortresses; and out of them our troops are inefficient.

If it is necessary on this occasion, for the Mormon war or any other purpose, I care not what, to raise an additional force, of what description should that force be? Is it to be composed of active and efficient men? Are they to be such men as could be raised in the United States? No, sir. We are told that owing to the present depression of affairs and the existing monetary derangement, there will be no difficulty in filling our regular Army. Of what material will that Army be formed? Who are the men that are thrown out of business? Are they not men about manufactories? Are they not artisans about cities who have never been on the frontier? who know nothing of it? All their education, all their observation, has been confined to city life, to streets, to alleys, and to houses. They know nothing about the forest and the wilderness. They know nothing about the red man or his habits. They are not inured to active toil, to marches, and to equestrianism. These are the men, and this is the material, from whom you are to organize an army! Why, sir, they are men who have never, perhaps, shouldered a gun, or even made mimic war with a cornstalk in a company muster-field, and who would cut an indifferent figure even at that. They are men who have never bestrode a horse in their lives, and who know nothing about horses. These are the men that you are to convert into cavalry; men taken from cities, who never fed a horse, or bridled a horse, or saddled a horse, or rode a horse; and they are to form your dragoon corps! These are the men to pursue wild Indians that could ride a buffalo, if necessary, in a chase!

I have heard something of their drilling. They are drilled on the frontier of Texas; and I am told it is an elegant farce to see it done. Sometimes they are so awkward that, really, they have to be tied on the horses in order that they may not fall off. After some experience in that way they are untied, not knowing how to brace themselves, or make taut the rein, or apply the spur, or handle the sword; and a stand is made of bars, for the purpose of practicing leaping, and in jumping three feet high on a horse. They either, in alighting, go heels over head, or, at the first rising to leap, they go head over tail. [Laughter.] These are the men who constitute your cavalry! These are the men that are to pursue Indians! These are the men that are to take care of their horses! They know nothing about it. On the frontier it requires an accomplished equestrian, a man who is qualified to take care of his animal; who understands his disposition, knows how to regard him, and continue his usefulness, or make him more useful. These men do not know how to take care of their horses. What is the consequence? The cavalry stock of the United States must die off; a new supply must be brought; fine animals purchased. One of these men cannot hobble his horse, that he may graze for food, or stake him out to the end of his tether, where he may range and be refreshed in the morning. He has knowledge enough to induce him to tie him up to a tree at night, that he may be safe in the morning, and if he can luxuriate on the bark of the tree, very good; if not, he may starve. These are the men whom you enlist for cavalry; who know nothing about the exercise or disposition of the animal, or about his duty. Such men have to learn everything. It is a new existence to them. They enter on a new theater. After having habituated himself to a different life, such a man is to be transformed into a new animal himself.

This mode of producing an army will never do. Who are they generally that would enlist now? Are they men of enterprise? Are they men of activity? Can they render efficient service, or will they be mere counters in the Army? Will they count one, two, three? They are that description of persons; and moreover, not intending the slightest reflection on their mechanic arts, or upon their origin, or upon the circumstances which surround them, I would venture to say, they are that description of men who are unqualified for these pursuits, and are thrown out of employment, or they are men who have been thrown on our shores from distant countries, alien in feelings to the United States, having no identity with us, who are not naturalized, and who go into the service as a resource; not from choice or motives of patriotism. These are the men that constitute our regular Army, and doubtless one third or one fourth of the men now in the service are not men who are "to the manner born." Are we to rely on these men for defensive purposes, or for other useful purposes to the country? No, sir. We have a resource in our country to which we can always have recourse.

There is another impediment to respectability in the rank and file of the Army. To make the rank and file of the Army respectable, you must hold out to a man some inducement beyond the mere receipt of eight dollars a month, or whatever the pay may be, clothes for the time being, and rations. To a man of any pride of feeling, or expectation, or of hope, you must hold out some inducement beyond the mere waste of human existence in the routine of military service. You must say to the gallant non-commissioned officer or private, to the man who in civil life would have expectation, if he had not exchanged it for the military profession: "Sir, upon your trial and your conduct depends the circumstance of your promotion to an office, an ensigncy, a lieutenancy, or even a cadetship." By doing that, you hold out to him an inducement to enlist in the Army of the United States. But when you limit a man to the mere routine of a soldier's duty, to what he considers a degradation, and reduce him below the quality of men generally in society, and place him in a position where he is looked upon as a different class of being, you can never fill your ranks with respectable men, whose hearts are stimulated by high and holy motives of patriotism. Pride is as necessary to a soldier as are his rations to his physical existence.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will suspend his remarks for a moment. The hour of one o'clock has arrived, which was assigned for the consideration of the Pacific railroad bill. The Chair, after a good deal of consideration and reference to the rules, has felt it to be his duty to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that he feels himself bound, when the hour arrives for which a subject has been assigned as a special order, to bring the matter to the notice of the Senate. It will be for the Senate to say whether they will proceed with this question or take up the special order.

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator from California [Mr. GWIN] desires to take up the Pacific railroad bill, I wish now to send to the Chair an amendment to this bill, as a substitute for it, for the purpose of having it printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. At present, the Senate have not determined what will be the order of business.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the Senate will progress with the bill which we have under discussion to a conclusion. I think it must be generally admitted that there will be great loss of time, and loss of a just understanding of the subject, if we now take up a new bill, discuss that, and return to this, discuss this in its turn, and so changing from one subject to another, divide the attention of Senators, and surely delay the time for the completion of the bill. It cannot be expected that the railroad bill will be settled in any short period. I have been greatly disappointed in the time consumed in the discussion of this bill. I did innocently—ignorantly, if you please—believe, when it was taken up, that the half hour assigned to it would suffice. The debate has widened, and I see no prospect of its ever being narrowed down to the subject under consideration, except by confining the attention of the body to it. I hope, therefore, the Senate will postpone the special order fixed for to-day at one o'clock, and proceed with the discussion of the bill now under consideration.

Mr. GWIN. I do not wish to interrupt the consideration of this bill, because I believe the right way to progress with business is to take up one subject and dispose of it. I agree with the Senator from Mississippi in that respect; but I understand that the Senator from Massachusetts intends to offer an amendment to this bill, and it may be that it would be better for it to go over, in order that the amendment may be printed, and be before the Senate when the bill shall be finally decided. I do not intend to interrupt this bill.

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly, we can never progress if the debate is to be arrested, and the subject postponed by the introduction of an amendment. After it is read, we can have the amendment printed if necessary; or if the debate continues, we shall see the amendment in to-morrow morning's paper. The debate of to-day will not depend on the amendment.

Mr. GWIN. I suppose, if this discussion goes on, that the special order fixed for one o'clock will not lose its place.

The VICE PRESIDENT. By postponing it until to-morrow, it will be continued as a special order.

Mr. IVERSON. I suggest to my friend from California that there is no special order after to-morrow until next Monday. There is a special order for to-morrow, February the 2d—the bill repealing all laws or parts of laws allowing bounties to fishing vessels; but there is no special order for Wednesday, Thursday, or Friday. We can have until next Monday for the consideration of his Pacific railroad bill, by making it the special order for the day after to-morrow.

Mr. GWIN. There is a special order for to-morrow.

Mr. IVERSON. That bill will hardly interfere with this one.

Mr. GWIN. I am willing to have the Pacific railroad bill passed over until to-morrow. I do not know whether or not the Chair has decided that the bill now under consideration has preference. I should like to have that point settled.

Mr. STUART. I think this is a very proper occasion to determine the construction of the rules which govern us, and I beg leave to submit a few suggestions on that subject. The 15th rule of the Senate provides that—

"The unfinished business in which the Senate was engaged at the last preceding adjournment, shall have the preference in the special orders of the day."

The bill now under consideration was the unfinished business at the last adjournment, and therefore it has priority over all other special orders under the express terms of the 15th rule. I think there is no want of harmony between the 15th and 31st rules. Take the case now in hand. The Pacific railroad bill is a special order for to-day at one o'clock, and was made so on the 19th of January. The unfinished business of the last adjournment stands precisely as if it had been made an older special order by an express vote of the Senate; and the 31st rule provides that the priority of special orders shall be decided according to the time at which they were made special orders. Now apply these two rules thus harmonized to this case: the unfinished business of yesterday, legislatively speaking, has a preference over all other special orders, and has a precedence over this one, so that it is the duty of the Chair, on the arrival of one o'clock, to call it up. If called up, by the express terms of the 15th rule, the unfinished business has priority. I think it very important that the Senate should decide, through the Chair, these subjects correctly; for I think there is no difficulty in the two rules, and no difficulty in the construction of the 31st rule. I do not believe that human language can make it plainer. Here is an order, special order made on the 11th January—"the motion by Mr. DOUGLAS to refer so much of the President's message as relates to Kansas to the Committee on Territories." That is a special order having priority over the Pacific railroad bill by the express terms of the 31st rule.

Mr. HOUSTON. I believe, according to the opinion of the gentleman, I may be permitted to go on with my remarks.

Mr. STUART. Certainly; I insist that the Senator from Texas has a right to proceed; that the unfinished business of the preceding day has preference over all special orders, no matter when made, and we shall produce anything but harmony if we resort to any other construction.

Mr. GWIN. Is that the decision of the Chair?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was about to give his opinion. The 15th rule is, as suggested by the Senator from Michigan, that the unfinished business has preference among the special orders. This bill was unfinished business. The Chair considers it much the same as if the Senate had been in continuous session considering this question up to this time; in which event, when the hour arrived for the consideration of an order fixed by a vote of the Senate, the Chair would deem it his duty to call the attention of the Senate to that fact. No inconvenience can arise, because the Senate may postpone either one or the other. The Chair calls up the special order under this portion of the 31st rule:

"When the hour shall have arrived for the consideration of a special order, it shall be the duty of the Chair to take up such special order, and the Senate shall proceed to consider it, unless it be postponed by vote of the Senate."

Under this rule the Chair deemed it his duty to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that, some weeks ago, by special vote, it assigned this day, at one o'clock, for the consideration of the Pacific railroad bill. It is in the power of the Senate to consider the present question by postponing that bill.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope that, all around, by unanimous consent, we shall defer any action on this question, and suffer the Senator from Texas, who has the floor, to proceed with his speech, and when he has got through, then will be the proper time to settle this question. It is very unpleasant to a Senator, who is in the midst of a speech, to be interrupted and broken off. I move that the honorable Senator from Texas be allowed to proceed by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. By unanimous consent, the special order is postponed, and the Senator from Texas will proceed.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have no doubt of the propriety of the course adopted by the Chair, in calling for the order of the day; and I think it was perfectly right and perfectly a matter of course that the orders of the day be postponed, and the unfinished business proceeded with.

As I was remarking, it is impossible to constitute a good regular army, unless you furnish inducements beyond the mere pay the soldier receives. You must hold out some honorable inducement, some reward for meritorious services, or you never will constitute a regular army that will be reliable and efficient in time of difficulty. From the mere circumstance of a soldier entering the service, knowing that he is restricted to a certain degree of respectability or character, he will be regulated by no such feeling as possesses the man of an honorable and ambitious heart, but such as would become a drudge and a slave.

The time was, Mr. President—and I well recollect it—when the Army held out inducements to honorable emulation. It was in the war of 1812; promotions then were made not only from private life, but from the ranks of the Army. When a man enlisted, if his capacity and intelligence were such as to commend him to the notice of his superiors, he was promoted to the rank of a non-commissioned officer. Then higher promotion invited him, if his deeds were worthy of it. He was promoted to be a lieutenant, and might hope at some day, by brevets and promotions, and by gallant conduct, to reach the very chief command of the Army. This road is now blocked up; insuperable barriers are interposed to it; and I have not, within the last twelve years, heard of a single appointment—though there may have been instances—from the ranks to commissioned officers. Thus it is that you see the great path to glory, to honorable achievement, blocked up. An impassable barrier is placed in the way of the advancement of your soldiers. How is this done? It is by an institution that I am not altogether opposed to. After an education has been granted at the Military Academy, young men are taken from there, and placed over the head of old veterans. They have not experience; they are from the drill of the Academy. It is the great duty of life, and we see it commence with infancy in well-regulated families, that obedience is the foundation of future usefulness and future character. First learn an individual to obey, and then he will know how to exercise authority with proper deference to the feelings of his subordinates and inferiors. But when you place him in command before he has learned the duty of obedience, he becomes presumptive, haughty, tyrannical, and domineering, and will not seek to create and foster in the Army a proper esprit du corps.

It is said a regular army is dangerous. The danger does not consist in its numbers. It is not from the number of the regular Army that danger is to be apprehended. They are too much dispersed over a vast area of the country to be congregated and rendered formidable. There is an outside pressure that is too terrible to be resisted in the sovereignty of the States, that would crush out and at once annihilate a congregated regular Army. Sir, the evil begins here; it begins at the other end of the Capitol. It begins in the political structure of our Government. The danger is in the Military and in the Naval Academy. There privileged classes are inaugurated. No matter how promising a youth may be—he may be an orphan boy that has sprung up with the impress of genius in his mind, and nature's nobility stamped on his heart; but if he has no political influence—if he has no friends—if he has no patronage with which to reciprocate patronage, he is neglected and overlooked. The members of Congress, in selecting individuals from their districts for these Academies, are guided by an eye to policy. "Who among these candidates will bring me the greatest support in my district?" is the question. No matter how stupid a boy may be, if he has influence to back his application he is selected by a member and sent to West Point Academy, where he is nursed and cherished and fostered till he graduates. Then, forsooth, provision must be made for him in the Army. You create places; you add companies to the regiments to make room for subordinate stations, or subordinate appointees. A graduate of the Military Academy must be provided for; you will not return him to the walks of civil life to add his mite to the general contribution of society—to make us great and glorious as a people. No, sir; but he is stultified as to all usefulness, by placing him in the regular Army. This influence continues. It has not ceased with the Academy, but is disseminated throughout the whole community. The consequence is, that no reduction in the Army can ever take place. Why? Because here come the relatives of the man whom you propose to turn out; he has raised them to action on the subject. All the thousands of officers whom we have disseminated throughout the various States and the various congressional districts, go around and influence their Representatives. They have relatives and friends to say, "My son must be retained; my brother must be retained; or my father or somebody else must be retained." This outward pressure on Congress will prevent the reduction of the Army. You may add to it, but you cannot reduce it. You may go on by degrees till a great portion of the community becomes interested in exercising an influence through their Representatives, in increasing the Army, but never in diminishing it. This is the evil that is to arise in the country, and thus it is that the Army is becoming formidable. It is to become ingrafted with the corruptions that always grow up at a capital, and the country's institutions will gradually decline as these privileged orders rise to the ascendant.

You may depend upon it, Mr. President, that things here are not as they once were. I say it in sorrow, for I feel it in my heart. The time was, that when officers were employed here, they were employed for useful purposes; and they were to be found at remote stations when usefulness required it. They were not congregated here in masses; and every officer was proud to wear, either in his hat-band, or upon his shoulder, or upon his person, some insignia, telling the world: "Look at my conduct, and see that I walk worthy of the insignia I wear." They were not sneaking about in citizens' clothes, identified with the masses, lest they might attract attention, and the people become alarmed at the formidable number about the Capitol. They were set apart, and the uniform was worn for their circumspection and demeanor. There were no bureaus here then. There were no men to influence the Departments, and dictate indirectly to the Government, as there now are. The Departments once in four years become subservient to these stick-fasts, these set-fasts, these chibblains on the Government, as they are—yes, sir, these plague-spots on our institutions, that are here now. They are adroit and cunning; they have got themselves placed here; and whenever a new Cabinet officer comes in, necessarily unacquainted with many of the forms and details, and indeed some of the principles of the Department—for there is no man that possesses perfect intuition—these men are ready to take possession of him, and make him a mere supple instrument in their hands, and impress on him, like the metal upon the wax, what impression they please.

These bureaus ought also to be changed every four years. I am told that really some families are very much distressed, and have been so for fourteen, fifteen, or seventeen years, perhaps, for fear their husband would be ordered off to do his duty as an active sailor or soldier. That is a most distressing condition of anxiety! I want to relieve them of those distresses. These men are either necessary on the decks of their ships, or they are necessary in command of their regiments, or at their post as commanders or subalterns, or they are not needed in the Army and Navy. They ought to be at their posts; but if they are here, they ought at least to certify to the world, "I am an officer; here is the evidence." The world expects it. Continue your present system, however, and the very instruments of the nation's salvation, to counsel wisdom and legislate for the benefit of the nation, will be rendered subservient to these privileged classes; and this will be accomplished through the medium I have stated.

There is the danger arising from a standing army. It is from the manner of its construction. You will never have men, until they are promoted from the ranks, who will feel that they have a motive for acting worthy of their vocation. Whenever you make promotions from the ranks, you will furnish a good army. This is a matter that is discretionary with the head of the War Department; and I trust, from his known chivalry and just appreciation of an esprit du corps, that it will now be adopted. Gentlemen most capable of doing it have talked of it. I have known men who enlisted with the hope of getting promotion. They had to go into the ranks because they had no political influence to enable them to get a commission, and feeling self-reliance enough that when they had an opportunity they would recommend themselves to the consideration of their superiors and the nation, and that promotion would be the consequence. Open that door and you invite men of pride, of character, and of family, to enter your Army. Knowing that that is the highway of promotion, they will enlist; but never until that avenue is open to them. The man who could not properly appreciate a commission and aspire to it is not fit for a soldier on whom to throw the responsibility of defending the liberties of his country. The man who will toil only for animal existence, to draw nutrition and vegetable and rot, is not the man that is to vindicate our liberties.

But, sir, if you want an additional force, you have the means in your control. We have a standing Army, the most invincible on earth. It is an army of freemen—men who feel clustering around their hearts all the sympathies of life, country, friendship, and honor; sensitive to their country's glory and honor as they are to their own family relations. Call upon such men to volunteer, and they will do it with pleasure. Tenders are made, throughout the country, of volunteer services. Accept them; let them go; they are efficient; they are equestrians; they are marksmen. Let them go and serve till the emergency is over, and they will then return to the greetings of family and the embraces of affection, and all the cherished hopes of life will cluster around them on their return triumphant from a glorious campaign.

Who achieved the glories of the war with Mexico? Were they regular soldiers? They fought well and could be shot down; but who were the efficient men? Who were the men most gallant and daring on that occasion? Is not the Palmetto regiment of the South immortalized? Is not the Mississippi regiment also immortalized? Yet they tell me that volunteers are not to be relied upon. Sir, if you have no reliance upon them the country is not free, for freemen constitute your volunteers. These are the men that are always ready to go. They are men who are capable of taking care of themselves and their animals; acquainted with frontier life; men who are not more expensive than regular troops of the same description—mounted men. The Government buys animals for the regulars and keeps a supply on hand for men who let them die through their carelessness or want of knowledge of the means to preserve them. The frontier-man's next and best friend in a campaign is his gallant steed. He will take care of him, and is responsible for him, while no responsibility rests on the regular dragoon! If the horse is gone it is no loss to him; if the volunteer's or ranger's horse goes, the loss is his and he feels it. Rely on them in every time of emergency, and you place your reliance, not on a broken reed, but on a strong, firm staff, that will not deceive you or wound the hand that presses on it.

Thus, sir, I am decidedly in favor, in emergencies like the present, of calling for men who will go into active service. If you were now to undertake to recruit a regular army, how long would it take to do it? How long would it take the regular Army to be filled, even from the material I have described? It would take a twelvemonth. Would not the expense be greater than the expense of volunteers? You may say not, because the volunteers present a round sum of per diem; but if the volunteer does not keep himself supplied with a horse, you reduce him to the grade of footman. He always keeps himself supplied, and he is an efficient horseman. If the regular soldier loses his horse, he is not bound to supply another. He is to all intents and purposes on the sick list so far as efficiency goes, and the Government supplies the deficiency.

As I have said, troubles with the Indians will cease if they are treated as I have proposed, by establishing trading houses and forts not defended by more than one hundred men at any position, or merely by way of keeping guard there; and employing such men as are necessary for spies, or skulks, or for messengers, or for expresses. Let them be employed from the different Indian tribes; let them be placed in your confidence; they will reciprocate that confidence. Encourage them, create a spirit of emulation amongst them, and when one man proves himself faithful, it will open the door to others. They will look forward to distinction in the confidence of the white man, and each will be emulous to rival his fellow in confidence, in usefulness, and fidelity. In this way you will conciliate the Indians. They will see that they are not regarded as enemies, but incorporated into the list of friends; that confidence is reposed in them; and no man has stood up in my hearing on earth to say that an Indian deceives. The white man teaches him deception, and by way of retaliation he may deceive him. The white man, thinking all will stop with his own deception, concludes that the Indian has no right of retaliation; but the Indian retaliates faithfully. Put confidence in him, and he is as constant as the northern star that has no fellow. He is truthful and accustomed to risk his life for his friends, or die in seeking revenge on his adversary. Do him wrong, and it is unforgiven. The idea of punishing the Indians and pursuing them with your regular troops is preposterous.

I recollect the time I determined here, some years since, never again to vote for an increase of the regular Army unless in time of war, and imminent necessity, which could not be supplied from volunteers or the militia. That determination is as unshaken as my life. It is a purpose that I will cherish, and I hope to leave my prejudice against an inordinate increase of the Army as a heritage to my children. If I leave them nothing else, it will be a pledge that I love my country.

When four regiments were raised a few years ago, it was announced that for years the Department had been calling for an increase of the regular Army; successive Secretaries of War had called for it; and reports had been made. That is very true. I do not deny the fact that reports were made in favor of it. The four regiments were raised, and I presume if you would calculate the net expenses of raising and supporting them up to the present time from the time the law passed, you would find it just about equal to the deficit of $20,000,000 in the Treasury.

That is the advantage which has resulted to the country from that action. Now, what have these regiments done? What are the glories that they have won? What deficiency in the public defense have they supplied? They have had a war with the Indians, under the lead of a gallant man, I admit, and report said they killed one hundred and fifty, of whom one hundred and thirty were women and children. That is the way these regular troops act. They may surround women and children; they may attack the warriors on the prairies, when they are attended by their women and children; moving, perhaps, to winter quarters, or, perchance, coming to hold a treaty, and seeking amity with the United States. They are surrounded from the consideration that some achievement ought to take place to show that the regular force has not been idle, and that there was some excuse for having raised them. I saw that in olden times on the frontier of Texas. A company was raised for a certain time, and just before it expired they would have a difficulty with the Indians to protract their services.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator from Texas allow me to ask him to what case he refers, in which one hundred and fifty women and children were killed?

Mr. HOUSTON. I said one hundred and thirty.

Mr. DAVIS. What was the case?

Mr. HOUSTON. The case where General Harney attacked them on the Platte.

Mr. DAVIS. The Blue Water?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes; I believe that was it; and it was done at the very time when they wished to confer. The onset, it was said, was made unadvisedly. The onset was made while the Indians were attempting to escape. Why were they not let go? Why were not the women and children allowed to pass unscathed? If you cannot attack the warriors, for mercy's sake let the little ones flee. But that is not all. There was another furious Sioux war, where a lieutenant went out and made an outrageous attack on the Indian camp; and when the matter was investigated, it was proved conclusively that it was an indiscretion on his part, a madness that had seized upon him from some influence or other, which brought on that war. It may be said that the Indians went to the trading houses exasperated, and took things that were there. The fact was that the white people had not paid them their annuities as they had promised to do; and the Indians, feeling that wrongs and aggressions, without provocation, had been inflicted upon them, could only regard the whites as enemies.

But, sir, I say here that if you will treat the Indians justly, kindly, truthfully, let them come and open useful commerce with the whites on the frontier; the Indian will become useful to the white people; he will preserve peace, and the chiefs of the various bands, when brought thus in contact with the citizens or officers of the United States, will chastise any of their fugitive warriors who may commit aggressions. They would punish them, because it would be to their interest to do so. If they obtained from the United States fair treatment, they would not allow individual members of the tribe to act to the detriment of the tribe; but the Indian is not thought of; he is not cared for; as I have observed before, he has no political influence; he has been an object of rapacity and robbery ever since our first intercourse with him. More than one hundred millions of money have been paid to the Indians, and what have they benefited by it? Against all the malign influences the white man has interposed to their civilization, many tribes have risen up into respectability, civilized, enlightened, and christianized. Those tribes have overcome all the difficulties, have dispelled all the clouds of ignorance and heathenism that surrounded them, and now have the bright light of science and the immortal light of religion shed around their heads and in their pathway to direct and guide them.

The Indians, Mr. President, have amongst them men who have overcome these difficulties; for within my recollection there was nothing of the artisan in a whole nation now so civilized and enlightened—the Cherokees. Fifty years ago they were in darkness; they were wild, rude, and savage; but in half a century they have become cultivated, civilized, enlightened, and christianized. They were surrounded by whites, and sympathy resulting from that acquaintance on the borders gave them, in most instances, that protection which left them to themselves to imitate the arts of the white man; and as their ambition arose and civilization shed its benign influence upon them, education took the place of ignorance and light of darkness, until they have now become illumined by the full radiance of literature and science. Why cannot other Indians do the same? Because they are not objects of sympathy; they have no political influence; they have no vote to give; they can reciprocate nothing that is done for them; are objects of cupidity, of rapacity, and of rapine. Whenever you undertake to exercise an influence, such as a Christian, an enlightened, and a glorious nation as this ought to do, you will reclaim the Indian from his wild pursuits, convert him into the agriculturist, the grazier, the artisan; you will make him a man of social and domestic habits, and all the blessings of civilization will recompense him for his efforts in that direction. This can be done. Let it be commenced and followed up with an earnest and honest determination on the part of this Government, and you can dispense with your frontier army; you will not have the Indians to war against; you will not be required to annihilate them; they will not be objects of rapacity; they will not feel indignant at you; they will not find it necessary to make reclamation for wrongs done to them or property taken from them; they will be able to explain their grievances if they have any; and the attitude which they may occupy before this nation will not depend on the statements of interested parties. When this shall be your policy in regard to the Indians, you will need no standing army among them.

It has been said in the course of the debate that volunteers are more cruel than the regulars. Sir, I do not know from what facts that conclusion is drawn; but I may say, that I have never known of any acts of atrocity within the last half century on the part of volunteers that would not find a parallel in the action of regulars. I am not aware of any greater inducements they have to cruelty or butchery than the regular soldiers. I would much sooner trust them than I would trust men who know nothing about the Indians, who have no sympathies with them, who have been reared where oceans rolled between them and the Indian, and who have only heard of them as of beasts for slaughter. The volunteers generally have some sympathy, though they may be exasperated at aggressions committed by lawless Indians, and by lawless parties from different bands. We often find that some lawless individuals will congregate and depredate on the settlements while the councilors and the mass of the Indians know nothing of their purposes. The depredators flee. A company immediately pursues their trail, which lies in the direction of a village. They escape their pursuers by a by-way, but the pursuers come on and attack the village whose people are harmless. Whilst the murderers escape, the innocent are the sufferers. That is the kind of warfare which is liable to be pursued by the regulars, if they ever pursued anybody successfully, as well as by the volunteers; but I have not heard of their overtaking any Indians that committed depredations. It will be recollected that those on the Blue Water were not pursued; but they were met accidentally, with all the incumbrances of camp equipage and provisions for the season, and they were attacked at a time when they were in a fit condition to negotiate, but not to fight.

I prefer a volunteer force because I believe it to be more efficient, more useful, and certainly equally as cheap as, if not cheaper than, a regular force. When volunteers are out of service, they return to their homes to support themselves. If emergency calls for them, they are on the spot in a few days; and when they perform the service for which they are needed, they return to their homes, and mingle again with their fellow-citizens; they contribute by their industry to the general mass of the national wealth; while a regular army is a continued incubus on the nation, utterly unproductive, a drain on the country's resources, who never add aught to its revenues. I am not prepared, therefore, to support this bill; and I have come to this conclusion, with all deference to the recommendation of the President and the Secretary of War. I oppose the bill without any enmity to its origin. Neither of those gentlemen has given his attention to the national defense as a matter of peculiar consideration and investigation. They are dependent on military men for the suggestions which are made as to the necessity of an increase of the regular Army; and how are they prompted? Promotion is a desirable thing in the Army. It is only denied to worthy non-commissioned officers and privates; but promotion is a great thing for all commissioned officers, and the more you increase the Army the more rapid promotions are. Though you may say this bill does not open the door to high promotions, as it only adds two companies to each regiment, yet you will find that it opens the door to a batch of cadets that are to come in, and in a very short time it will be found that the companies are not as efficient as they would be if they had smaller numbers, and then they will be reduced; and thus regiments will be multiplied, brigades increased, and then will come a request for brigade generals. I recollect that when the four new regiments were raised some years ago, it was supposed that an honorable member of this body would be appointed a brigadier general in the Army. I have no doubt that idea inclined many minds kindly to the measure. It was understood that various individuals were applicants for colonelcies, and they operated on their friends in Congress. The measure received countenance and support from considerations of that kind. Finally it was passed; but none of the gentlemen that I knew of, who were expectants for high office, received the appointments, from some circumstance of misunderstanding, I presume, in their own expectations.

I am not disposed to incumber the country with additional expense at this time. If volunteers cannot defend us, cannot reach Salt Lake, if necessary, in half the time that regulars can be raised and do it, it is of no use to attempt the war. If they can be assembled and reach there in one half or one fourth the time regulars could reach there, they are the most efficient force, because efficiency often is increased by expedition. If the Mormons are preparing, the less prepared they are when our troops meet them the more easy it will be to reduce them to order.

Before taking my seat, sir, I must allude to a remark which was made by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] and I must express, with great deference to his intelligence, my dissent from one position which he assumed. He contended, as I understood him, that the President had no right to order the troops into a Territory for the purpose of suppressing insurrection or rebellion. My own opinion on that point is very different. I think the power of the President in that respect cannot be questioned, though the expediency of its exercise in any particular case may be a question for investigation. In a Territory there is no government of a sovereign community, such as there is in a State, to demand the aid of the United States forces to suppress insurrection or rebellion. Is such a state of affairs, if it exists, to go on unchecked? or is it not the duty of the President, ex officio, a Territory being an appendage of the Federal Government, to use all the power he can to suppress insurrection? Has he not the power to do it, at any rate? I do not say that insurrection has existed; but I ask, if it does exist in a Territory, has not the President the power to use the troops in order to put it down? Suppose that in the District of Columbia the Mayor of this city were to head an insurrection or rebellion against the Federal Government—were to refuse its authorities the exercise of their appropriate functions—would not the President have the right to put it down without waiting for a call from the Governor of a State? If he can do it in the District of Columbia, which I presume no one will question, he can in a Territory; because a Territory is as much under Federal tutelage and government, until it becomes a sovereign State, or assumes some organic form, as the District of Columbia. Therefore, I think it is perfectly within his competency to use the Federal Army whenever it is necessary, in his opinion, within the limits of any Territory or the District of Columbia. The propriety of such a measure is the only point to be investigated; the right, I think, is undoubted.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1858.

NEW SERIES.....No. 32.

I was very sorry, Mr. President, to hear the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. IVERSON] allude to what might have occurred in Kansas in certain contingencies. I shall pass over all questions relative to Kansas, for the reason that I am not informed in relation to everything connected with it; and I do not feel that I am competent to shed any light on that subject, or even to express an enlightened opinion of my own. I was sorry to hear the honorable Senator from Georgia allude to what might have occurred, if certain events had not taken place; and he said it might have led to a general agitation throughout the country that would have resulted in the disunion of these States. I heard this with pain; because he seemed to entertain no regrets in anticipation of such an event. Sir, I have never heard disunion suggested, I have never heard allusion made to it, without inflicting the deepest wound on my heart, and casting a cloud over my hopes of the future. I was born and reared in that school which looked upon the Union as the palladium of liberty upon which was built the proud superstructure of our Government; too holy to be touched by unhallowed hands—never to be approached but with reverence and respect. I came into active being in early manhood, having received as a pupil that doctrine. I have maintained it inviolate through life; I have contributed, by my life and example, all the evidence that any man could give in favor of the Union; I will never secede from that hallowed doctrine; I will never be a heretic to the Union and a belief in its conservative necessity. Disunion cannot be thought of with pleasure by any individual who is descended from the proud ancestral loins of the men of high intellectual powers, whose rich and generous blood flowed in the achievements that led to the Union. I was struck the other day with a speech by an enlightened Indian, who met me, and taking me apart, said, in a whisper, "General, will you tell me what all this talk means about disunion? I hear it all around about the streets." He asked me, tremblingly, what it meant? He thought there was a rottenness in Denmark. What will disunion profit us? It will give us ruin in exchange for happiness; it will give us slavery in place of freedom; it will give us infamy in place of glory. Destruction will be the consequence of disunion. But, sir, when disunion comes, the strife is not to begin on your borders; but the first blood that flows will be the blood of traitors; and it will be shed here, or in the other Hall, where it may originate. Sir, we ought to beware how we talk; for I tell you that a man who has bled for the Union, for freedom, and for nationality, will always be satisfied with the Constitution of the country, and will be ready to vindicate it with his life. I have never heard the word "disunion" with pleasure; I never shall hear it with delight. Wild as the vagaries may be in relation to it, there is a soberness among the people, who have no motive but love of country, and a desire to see the nation happy, independent, and prosperous. Go to your mountain-tops; go to your valleys; go to your dales; go to the gorges of the mountains; speak to the people of the Union; and they will tell you it is worth preserving. Go to speculators and agitators, and they may tell you it is not worth preserving. I say it is. The man knows little of the value justly attaching to it, if he has ever periled his life in defense of the liberties of his country, that would not freely peril existence again to protect and secure this Union to posterity.

Mr. WILSON. I send to the Chair a proposition which I propose to move as a substitute for the bill now under consideration. I move that it be printed, and that the subject be postponed until to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the substitute which he sends to the Chair be printed, and that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until half past twelve o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to have the substitute read, as it will probably not be printed in time for us to see it to-morrow morning.

The Secretary read the proposed substitute. The motion is to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and insert the following:

That the President, for the purpose of enforcing the laws of the United States, of maintaining peace with the Indian tribes, and of protecting the citizens on the routes of emigration in the Territory of Utah, and to be employed only in said Territory, be, and he is hereby, authorized to call for and accept the services of any number of volunteers, not exceeding in all five thousand, officers and men, who may offer their services as infantry, to serve for twelve months, unless they be sooner discharged, after they shall have arrived at the place of rendezvous, or been mustered into the service of the United States; and that the sum of $— be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into effect.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That said volunteers, when mustered into the service, shall be armed and equipped at the expense of the United States, and, until discharged therefrom, be subject to the rules and articles of war; and shall be organized in the same manner, and shall receive the same pay and allowances, as the infantry arm of the Army of the United States.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the volunteers so offering their services shall be accepted by the President in companies, battalions, or regiments, and that each company shall consist of the same number of officers and men as now prescribed by law for the infantry arm of the Army. The captain and lieutenants of the said companies shall be elected by the company, and commissioned by the President of the United States, and the President shall apportion the staff and field officers among the States and Territories from which the volunteers shall tender their services, as he may deem proper.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the volunteers who may be received into the service of the United States by virtue of this act, and who shall be wounded or otherwise disabled in the service, shall be entitled to all the benefits which may be conferred upon the persons wounded or disabled in the service of the United States.

ADMISSION OF MINNESOTA.

Mr. GWIN. I now move that the special order be taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the business now before the Senate.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill for the admission of Minnesota into the Union.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The special order, being the Pacific railroad bill, is before the Senate; but the Senator may move to postpone it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am a friend of the Pacific railroad in any proper manner, and think well of the bill which the Senator from California has reported; but I think that the question of allowing two Senators who are here in attendance to take their seats is one that ought to take precedence of all others. They are deeply interested in the Pacific railroad, and I think the proposition for their admission ought to take precedence. I move, therefore, to postpone all prior orders, and proceed to the consideration of the Minnesota bill.

Mr. GWIN. I am in favor of the proposition to admit Minnesota as a State, and shall vote for it. I have no objection to it at all; but it strikes me that the Pacific railroad bill having been set apart as the special order for this day, it is due to the friends of that measure that it should come up for consideration. As to the Senators who may take their seats from Minnesota, I have an abiding conviction that they will not be admitted before this bill passes. After the Minnesota bill passes here it must go to the other House, and may be debated there for a long time. The benefit to arise from the passage of the bill admitting Minnesota as a State may be delayed until after this bill passes. I must insist on the consideration of the Pacific railroad bill.

Mr. GREEN. I do not see that the bill for the admission of Minnesota would expedite that measure at all by being now taken up, and displacing the bill for the construction of the Pacific railroad. There are considerations that must necessarily be brought to bear when the Minnesota bill is taken up. It affects the representation in the other House, and it depends on questions of fact not yet decided—the returns of the census from that Territory. They are not yet all received; and to take up the bill thus prematurely, I think would prejudice the measure itself. I do not expect to see any formidable opposition made to the admission of Minnesota; but I do see a good reason why the consideration of it should not be hurriedly thrust upon us. As we have a special order, as there are good reasons why the Minnesota bill should not now be considered, I hope the special order will be sustained, and that the other bill will not be brought up to its prejudice.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. It would seem to me that the first object should be to complete this body by the admission of all those who are entitled to seats in it; and I really think that considerations of respect for the State and for the gentlemen who are in attendance here, and have been for ten days or a fortnight, enjoin it on us as a primary duty to take into consideration the bill to admit the State of Minnesota, and to admit them to their seats. If this is a great question which is made the special order—the construction of a railroad to California—they have a right to a judgment; they have a right to a decision on that very question; and the more important it is, the more important is the privilege and right to them to decide with us on it. Courtesy and every consideration of respect for the State and the gentlemen here in attendance to represent her, seem to mark out this measure as one entitled to particular precedence and particular favor, and I hope it will take precedence of all other matters.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope the honorable Senator from California, as chairman of the select committee on the Pacific railroad, will not insist on taking up that bill now. It is necessary for me, though I have a very deep solicitude for the success of that measure, to vote against giving it priority over the Minnesota bill. I entirely agree with the remarks of the honorable Senator from Kentucky. It seems to me that a State which has been invited into the Union, which has organized itself, and which has come here in compliance with that invitation, presents an appeal of a privileged case, and that it is due to the magnitude of that subject, and to the interests of the community who are to be brought in as a State, that they should be brought in at the earliest day consistent with a compliance with all the necessary forms for their admission.

I will say also to my honorable friends on the other side of the House, that we are doing very well with the Pacific railroad bill. We did very well the other day, and made a decided step forward in favor of it when we defeated the bill for increasing the regular Army of the United States by the addition of five regiments; for there are but two systems of governing the Territories of the United States: one is peaceful, and for that purpose the Pacific railroad is the engine; and the other is by a standing army. I think that in reaching the solution of that problem, in rejecting a bill for the permanent increase of the Army, we made an advance decidedly in favor of the Pacific railroad. My impression is, that if the honorable Senator from California will now waive this question of precedence, and let the State of Minnesota come in, as soon as she comes in he will find that he has an increase in both Houses of Congress in favor of the measure; and I am sorry to say that I am not satisfied that there is strength enough to carry the bill until we bring in one, two, or three more States—at least one.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I concur very fully with the Senator from New York in the propriety of the admission of a new State when she comes here in proper form; but I stand before the Senate in a peculiar attitude with reference to this matter. I think the honorable chairman of the Committee on Territories will do me the justice to say that I attended all the meetings appointed for the purpose of examining the Minnesota constitution. I attended two meetings of the committee at some inconvenience, as well as some trouble to myself, growing out of the state of my health. I had not, however, the pleasure of being present on the last occasion, when, as I understand, the report was submitted for the final action of the committee. For ten days past I have been confined to my room, and the day on which the committee agreed finally to adopt the report, I was confined to my bed. The honorable chairman did me the honor to send to me the report as well as the bill, with the request that I would read it, or listen to his clerk's reading it, stating, at the same time, that the report had been concurred in by a majority of the committee, and, if I am not mistaken, that all the committee were willing that the report should be made. Being unwilling to thwart the object of the Senate, or the country, in the admission of a State which, as far as I have examined I am frank to say showed that she was entitled to admission, I sent a verbal message to the chairman, that he might make the report, so far as I was concerned, and that I would concur in it or not, as I should think proper on examination. This is the first day I have been able to leave my room. I have seen neither the bill nor the report, and I am utterly unprepared and unwilling, without looking into the bill and report, to go into the examination of the subject.

I do not design by this to delay the admission of the State; but at the same time, when a State is to be admitted into the Confederacy, it seems to me that every member of that branch of the Government legitimately charged with this matter should have an opportunity to look into the report as well as into the bill itself. I have not been here before since last Thursday week, nor have I seen the printed report or bill. As soon as I am in possession of the bill and the report, I will see whether they accord with what we agreed on at a previous meeting of the committee; and if so, to waive all objection and admit Minnesota at the earliest day; but I am anxious to inform myself whether the facts are presented in accordance with the preliminary statement agreed on by the committee. As soon as I learn that fact, I shall be willing to forego all objection and agree to the taking up of the bill. I do not, however, feel authorized at this time to go into an investigation of it.

Mr. GWIN. Under the circumstances, I hope the honorable Senator from Illinois will not press his motion, as one of the Committee on Territories wishes to postpone it. I wish to say to him, and to the Senator from New York, that I have not the slightest disposition to have any collision in point of precedence between these two bills, for I am in favor of both of them; but the subject before the Senate having been made the special order some weeks ago, and being now ready for consideration, I ask the Senate to proceed with it. I hope there will be no collision between these two measures, but that the chairman of the Committee on Territories will feel justified by the remarks of the Senator from Alabama in postponing his motion.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I should be glad to consult the wishes of my friend from California, but this is not the first time I have been compelled from a sense of duty to urge the admission of a State prior to action on the Pacific railroad. I had to do so in 1850, when California was admitted into the Union. I felt it my duty then, to the two Senators from California, who were waiting to take their seats, to insist on giving priority to the question of admitting that State. I feel it to be my duty to do the same thing now. I am certain that he will hasten his Pacific railroad bill, by not antagonizing with this measure, because he knows that those of us who are now pressing the bill for the admission of the State of Minnesota to a vote, are the warm advocates of the bill which he has at heart, and he certainly cannot wish to press it against us. I ask for the yeas and nays on my motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GREEN. I only wish to remark that another of our colleagues of the Committee on Territories, the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. SEBASTIAN,] is sick, and has sent me word that he desired to be present when the Minnesota bill shall be considered. There is a clause in the bill to which we did not assent. The proper regulation and determination of the representation of that State depends on facts which we have not in our possession; and it would be premature, and, as I think, unwise, to press the consideration of it now. If we wait until these facts come—and they are expected every day—the committee can mature this measure, so that there will not be a difficulty in the Senate, and the State will slide into the Union without raising a ripple upon the stream. As a mere matter of policy, therefore, and as a matter of courtesy to the absent gentleman who feels so deeply interested in it, I hope the bill will not be pressed to displace and disjoint the order of business with reference to the Pacific railroad bill.

Mr. JONES. I wish to ask the Senator from Illinois, who reported this bill, upon what conditions he was authorized by the committee to report it to the Senate.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will answer that question. At the meeting before the last, the committee agreed upon the bill and what should be the propositions embraced in the report, and I was instructed to draw the report. Having agreed on that, we adjourned to another meeting when the report was to be read to the committee. We met on that occasion, the Senator from Alabama being absent then, although he had been with us punctually at all the previous meetings. He was sick, or he would have been with us at the reading of the report. The report was then read and the committee unanimously agreed that the report did conform to the propositions which had been agreed to at the previous meeting, (the Senator from Missouri dissenting from the propositions on one point,) and that the bill was in conformity with the agreement.

As the Senator from Alabama was not present, but sent a message that he felt an interest in the matter, and desired to see the report before it was made, I was instructed by the committee to report, subject to the approval of the Senator from Alabama. He was the only absent member, I think. I sent the report to the Senator from Alabama, with a note explaining the action of the committee, by the clerk of the committee. He came back, bringing the verbal message which has been stated by the Senator from Alabama, that he was ill, and did not deem it necessary to read the report; in fact, that he was unwilling to delay the action of the committee, if the majority had agreed to it; but, reserving his own opinion and right to dissent on any point, he would interpose no objection to the report being made. Having received that message from him, I thought, as I had seen each other member of the committee—I do not think I am mistaken, but possibly I may be—the occasion had happened on which the report was to be made; and it was made. If there was an objection to it, I should have been glad if it had been made by any member of the committee when the report was presented. It has been made, printed, and been on our tables for nearly a week. I have been anxious to call it up before, but some questions antagonized with it. There was some delay in printing, and the Senate adjourned over from Thursday to Monday, so that I could not get an opportunity of trying the question until now. I trust that we may be permitted to get a vote on it. The Senator from Arkansas, I have no doubt, will be here when we come to the final vote.

In regard to the information which is expected, I can only say that the census has been received from all the counties in the Territory except seven.

The enabling act provided that the State should have the representation in the House of Representatives to which she would be entitled by the census according to the apportionment of 1850. The bill reported now provides the same thing, that the number of her Representatives in the other House shall be what she may be entitled to by the census according to the apportionment of 1850, leaving the House of Representatives to determine the question just as it did under the census of 1850. The presumption is, that in a few days, or by the time the bill will get through both Houses, the census of the other seven counties will be here; but if not, it leaves that question to the House of Representatives. They are to have one member, and as many more as that census, when complete, shall show them to be entitled to. Hence, to vote on this bill will need no additional fact. However, I will not occupy time, in the hope of getting the question.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, there was a time when the admission of a new State into the Union excited little other sensation in either House, or in the country, than the earnest desire to welcome a new State into the Confederacy. I trust that time has not yet gone by. But we all know that events have occurred, and other events are at hand, that may perhaps enlighten the American mind on this question of the admission of new States.

The State of Minnesota has just passed from the chrysalis form, and has been but a very few days before the Senate. I think the report of the committee, of which the honorable Senator from Illinois is chairman, was presented here within the last week, or ten days, at the outside. I have read it, but I confess I took it up out of its order in the press of business upon me, and that portion of public business which has been more especially confided to me, in order to do so. I do not know that, when the question comes before the Senate according to a regular, and, as it would seem to me, an appropriate course, objection will be made to the admission of the State. I did observe, what I regret to say I have more than once observed in the quarter of country where that State, or that Territory, to speak more properly, is found, very great irregularities occurring and passed over in the mode of erecting the State. I do not mean to say that I shall find any objection to the admission of the State on them, but they exist and are set forth in the report of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Territories.

But, sir, why this apparently undue haste to bring this question now before the Senate? The honorable Senator from Illinois has said that those who have been elected Senators from Minnesota are waiting, and it is desirable to give them their seats. As a matter of courtesy to those honorable gentlemen I should be disposed to go as far as my sense of duty to the whole country would admit; but a question of courtesy, however we may entertain it elsewhere, can have no place on this floor if it is at all in collision with what honorable Senators may consider matters involving the great public interests of the whole country.

Now, Mr. President, we know very well, although not officially informed, that we shall have presented here, certainly in the course of this week, possibly in the course of the next day or two, an application from another State for admission into this Union. I do not know where the honorable Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the committee, will stand upon the question of the admission of that State. If the State presents itself in the manner in which it is said it will be done, I do know where the great array of honorable Senators on this side of the Chamber will stand, or at least I think I know. I am not prepared to take up, at present, the consideration of these questions separately. I do not know that I may not be prepared to do so on further consideration and further conference; but it may be considered when we have had further time to take a more extended view of all the circumstances, and the probable exigencies that may surround the question of the admission of new States at this session, it may be found desirable that they should not be taken up separately. I do not know that it will occur, but, for one, I am indisposed to take up one of those measures until the other is matured, at least.

Sir, I do not profess to be informed of the circumstances under which the State of Kansas is to apply for admission.

A SENATOR. Territory.

Mr. MASON. And now the Territory of Minnesota, for they are both Territories, applies for admission. I do not know the circumstances under which the Territory of Kansas is to apply for admission as a State; and I apprehend that no honorable Senator knows them; but we do know that the sources of information which have been open to the Senate and the country upon every question attending the passage of Kansas from a territorial state to that of an independent political community have been of a character to carry with them distrust and doubt. We know, however, that the constitution of that State is now in Washington. We have reason to believe that, within a very short time, it will be sent to the Senate, and we may presume—we cannot take it for granted—that when it is sent to the Senate, it will be accompanied by authentic information touching every matter connected with it; but it is not done yet. I trust when that question comes up, that it may not be attended by the opposition, or the extent of opposition, that is anticipated to the application of that State for admission; but if it is, it certainly interests me and those whom I have the honor to represent on this floor greatly, that not one single step shall be taken by this body in reference to the admission of new States until every question connected with the Territory of Kansas has been matured, and we shall be enabled to see exactly where that question stands and how it is to be received.

These are my present impressions. I do not mean to commit myself; because, as I have said, I am uninformed, and must be so until we have an official and authentic communication. I do not know but that when the time comes, I may as cheerfully vote to admit the one State separately as to admit the other separately; but I want to see the way around me. I want to see where we are to stand. When the Territory of Kansas presents herself here and asks to be admitted as a State, there may be circumstances—I trust that there may not be—why it should be found a matter necessary to the southern States to determine where they stand in this Union, that the two questions should be taken together and not separately.

Now, sir, I am not aware of any necessity for undue haste. As to the honorable gentlemen who are here to represent Minnesota when admitted, however interesting it might be to me as a gentleman to receive them here, certainly it interests me not at all in connection with the public matters which I apprehend will be found necessarily connected with it. I hope, therefore, that no unusual haste will be exhibited by the Senate to take up this bill.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I am in favor, and the people I represent are in favor, of any just and practicable measure for the construction of a railway to the Pacific ocean; but I feel under the necessity of voting for the motion made by the Senator from Illinois, to postpone that measure for the consideration of the question of admitting Minnesota in the Union. We passed, at the last session, an act authorizing the people of that Territory to frame a constitution and be admitted into the Union as a State. They have complied with that act. There were irregularities, but all parties agreed on a constitution, and that constitution was submitted to the people and received thirty thousand votes, while there were only about five hundred against it. We have the voice of the people of Minnesota, approaching unanimity, in favor of this measure; and I think that all irregularities of form ought to yield to the substance.

Sir, I hope the Senate and the country will notice the position taken by the Senator from Virginia. He is opposed to going into the consideration of this measure now, because he supposes that Senators on this side of the Chamber may oppose the admission of Kansas under the Leecompton swindle. He does not want now to act upon the question of the admission of a State under a constitution authorized by Congress, because he wants to see what we intend to do on this side of the Chamber when the proposition comes here for the admission of Kansas into the Union. I say to the Senator now, I say to his friends here and elsewhere, that he may understand that we will oppose the consummation of that Leecompton constitution by all the means in our power under the rules of this body; and I take it that it will be so under the rules of the other House.

I see no necessity, the country sees no necessity, why a Territory that has framed a State constitution, in accordance with an enabling act—a constitution that has received the sanction of nearly the whole people of the Territory—a constitution under which a Legislature was elected, that has been in session nearly two months, and has been engaged during that time in passing laws; I say the country sees no necessity why that Territory—hardly a Territory, but not yet a State—shall be kept out of the Union, to wait for an examination of all the facts connected with the Territory of Kansas. There is no connection whatever between them. There is no such connection as can justify any man in the Senate, or in the country, in defeating the admission of Minnesota into the Union to wait for an investigation of the affairs connected with the Territory of Kansas.

Now, sir, there is a need of immediate action in favor of the admission of Minnesota into the Union. There is a Legislature chosen under this constitution, which has been in session nearly two months. They have been passing laws. Perhaps the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PUGH] would say this is rebellion; but they have been passing laws, and those laws have been signed, not by the Governor elect under the constitution, but by the Secretary under the territorial law. Here you have a State Legislature passing great and important measures concerning the interests of the people of that new State, and the laws signed by a territorial acting Governor. These laws are taking effect in that Territory; and I say here today what I know to be true, that the State Legislature and the people of Minnesota are embarrassed by this question being kept in its present position. It affects them in their local legislation and in their local interests. I think the time has come when we should act upon this measure disconnected from any and all other questions; and I shall give my vote for the motion made by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, if I could see the necessity for immediate action on the bill brought forward by the Senator from Illinois to admit Minnesota into the Union, I should be disposed to vote for taking it up now; but there is a difficulty in my mind to which I have had my attention drawn, which is one reason why I am unwilling to act on that bill now.

The great object, I presume, of the admission of Minnesota at an early day as a State into the Union, is that those gentlemen who have been elected by the Legislature of that inchoate State as Senators in the Congress of the United States and by the people as Representatives to the other House, may take their seats on the floors of the respective bodies. I have a very clear opinion myself that under the terms of the Federal Constitution no such election could entitle a Senator elected before the admission of the State, to a seat on this floor. It will be personally unpleasant to me to make the objection; because, for one of the gentlemen elected as a Senator from Minnesota, I have the highest personal regard and esteem—I allude to the gentleman who was formerly a member of this body. The other I am personally unacquainted with. It would be personally painful to me to make the objection; but I am one of those who believe that adherence to the provisions of the Constitution, even when there may be no great apparent difficulty arising out of transcending its provisions, is of great importance because the precedent at a subsequent day may be urged when it becomes of much higher importance, and so obliterate the provisions of the Constitution. On its reading, I cannot doubt.

But, as I know that admissions have been made, I believe sub silentio, without question made, under similar circumstances, I should have paused to make the objection did I not find that it was made in the early history of the country. In the year 1796, General Washington communicated, on the 8th of April, I think, to the Congress of the United States, the fact that the Territory of Tennessee had formed itself into a State, and transmitted the papers to Congress for their action on its admission into the Union as a State. The subject was under discussion from the 8th of April until the 1st of June, the day on which Congress adjourned; and on that day the State was admitted into the Union. Pending that discussion the credentials, or what purported to be the credentials, of Mr. Cocke and another gentleman whose name I have forgotten, two Senators elected by the Legislature of Tennessee, were presented. The credentials were perfect in their form. They might well have been used as a model for all subsequent credentials, and would, probably, have removed many of the questions that have arisen in this body if they had been adhered to as such. The credentials, in their form, were a certificate by the Governor, under the seal of the State, that those gentlemen had been elected members of the Senate of the United States, as was authenticated by the resolutions of election, signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the Speaker of the Senate of the State of Tennessee, and the signatures were attached and the resolutions given. There could be no objection whatever on the face of the credentials. Unfortunately, the debates of that day are not to be found; and we do not know the reasons which governed the Senate. We can only find the votes.

This paper being read, after two or three motions of postponement, the Senate ultimately passed a resolution authorizing these Senators elected, before the admission of the State, to take seats on the floor of the Senate as spectators. As I have stated, the State was admitted on the morning of the 1st of June. At the evening session, after the approval of the bill by the President, and the admission of the State, a resolution was offered to admit the Senators elect from Tennessee, and swear them in as members of the body, Tennessee being then a State of the Union; but the resolution was rejected by the Senate.

I have then the earliest precedent which appeared in the history of our country, in which the Senate decided, on a contest made, that the election of Senators by an inchoate State, before admission, could not be recognized as made by valid authority under the Constitution of the United States, which provides that Senators shall be elected by the Legislatures of the States, of course necessarily meaning the States of the Union.

I do not propose to go further into this question now than to mention in connection with it, that if the great object be, as I suppose it must be, the admission to the floor of the Senate of the gentlemen who have been elected to the Senate from the State of Minnesota, in the event of the admission of the State I shall hold it to be my duty to ask the reference of the question, before they are sworn in—as the matter is one that you must notice on the face of the credentials presented—that they were elected antecedent to the admission of the State into the Union, and to have it decided by a vote of the Senate. I believe it wiser to adhere to the Constitution. I have a very clear conviction that the Constitution renders such an election invalid, and I am supported by the first case which occurred in the history of the proceedings of the Senate. I am not aware that a contested question has ever arisen since as to admission under the same circumstances, though I am aware that Senators have been admitted where no objection has been interposed, when they have presented themselves under circumstances of the same character.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have generally found, in my experience of the Senate, difficulties enough attending questions that were presented, without inviting the body to the consideration of other questions that might be involved in other issues and other matters which were to come up at another time. I had proposed to act on this supposition in my action upon this floor. But, sir, the remarks that have been thrown out by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MASON] seem to my mind to require a very brief and passing notice. The manner of the Senator from Virginia indicated that they were not opinions hastily formed, that they were not the result of heated blood that had been stirred up in an angry and excited debate, but they appeared to be the deliberate convictions of his understanding and the announcement of his settled purpose. In that sense they seem to demand more weight than they would have in a different view of the subject. If I understand the Senator, his position is that he will not consider the application of any State for admission into the Union until the Kansas controversy shall be settled. That was the amount of what he said. I do not give his very phraseology, and it is to that announcement that I ask the attention of the Senate, and I hope to call to it the attention of the country.

The Senator from Virginia objects to considering the application of any State, no matter how regular may have been her proceeding, no matter how literally she may have pursued every requirement of the Constitution and every provision of the enabling act, no matter how unexceptionable may have been her whole history in her territorial state and in the manner in which she proposes to emerge from the condition of a territorial to that of a sovereign State—I should have said a State, for I hope we are not to have any more sovereign States in this Union—no matter how unexceptionable it has been, here is a block thrown in the way over which Minnesota and every other State must pass before she can gain admission into this Union.

Now, sir, the eloquent Senator from Texas [Mr. Houston] said something, and the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PUGH,] the other day, said something, which I did not hear, but have read since in the papers, lecturing us for speaking lightly on the danger of collision, and of danger to the Union. Well, sir, I am always willing to be lectured, glad when anybody undertakes it, because it satisfies me, at least, that if there is not anybody here that knows more than I do, there is somebody who thinks he does. [Laughter.] But let me say that there never has been a sentiment avowed on this floor, which looks so directly, so seriously to a conflict, and one that may end in a dissolution and disruption of this Union, as the avowal which has been made by the Senator from Virginia, and in which I understood him to intimate the great array upon the other side of the Chamber would act with him; and that is to make the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution the touchstone by which fidelity is to be tried, and without which acceptance no other State can ever come into this Union. Sir, I am not here to speak for any party, nor for anybody, but myself and the State which I in part represent; but I am free to say, and I am bound to declare, that so far as my action has anything to do with the voice of the Government, and the proceedings of this body, if that is the condition, it will be a long while before your numerical number of States will exceed thirty-one. I deem it to be contrary to the whole genius of our Government, to the principles of our Constitution, and that bond by which the States are bound together, for any one State, or any set of States, to say that in a certain case, which I think a majority of the people of this Union believe not to be so characterized as to entitle the Territory to come into the Union, her admission shall be made the sine qua non without which no other State ever shall come into the Union.

I disclaim now and forever the idea of threatening anybody or of speaking lightly of the Union, or of the dissolution of the Union, and I am willing to sit at the feet of anybody who chooses to lecture me, because I am used to being lectured; but I have thought sometimes that some of these lectures would do very well if applied to somebody else. [Laughter.] There is an eloquent and able Senator who sits near me—I allude to the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN]—and I remember that at the close of a very eloquent and able speech which he made on this floor not long ago, abounding with the richest figures of rhetoric and the choicest ornaments of oratory, he closed with this significant figure: that if certain things did not turn out in a certain way, the South would throw the sword into the scale, and settle the weight that way. I remember that, but I do not recollect that any lecture was ever delivered to the honorable Senator for it from that time to this, and I do not mean to lecture him now. I think it was a beautiful figure; but whether it was appropriate to the subject or not, I do not know. I remember one significant fact that all these lectures come upon those of us who sit upon this side of the Chamber, upon the minority, and a very small minority it is. It seems to me that if gentlemen want to throw out censure in a place where it will have an effect, a good effect, they should sometimes take some of the gentlemen on the other side. I thought the honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. IVENSON,] the other day presented as fair a case for a good wholesome homily as I had ever seen in the Senate, but nobody thought of administering it to him. When my friend from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER,] however, fired, I suppose, with the magnetism which the Senator from Georgia threw out, got up and undertook to respond to him in the same style, perhaps not so eloquently, and presented simply a counter opinion to the one which had been announced by the Senator from Georgia, he had to take a lecture; but the Senator from Georgia went scathless.

I do not wish to lecture anybody; but I must say that I look upon the avowal of the Senator from Virginia, made coolly and deliberately as it was, as being something, if it is to be backed up by the great array which the honorable Senator intimates, of very serious import. I do not know how we shall be able to meet this crisis. I do not know but that you can carry your Lecompton constitution through this body. I rather think you can; that is my decided opinion. I do not know but that you will carry it through the House of Representatives. I think you would be more likely to do it if you had raised the five regiments; for without meaning any disrespect to the members of that House, I must say there is a sort of weight, that the great amount of patronage which the appointment of so many officers would create, would have a kind of insensible influence on the atmosphere. [Laughter.] There is a great amount of pressure pervading the atmosphere, when one of these bills, which has such a large amount of patronage in it, is passed, that has an effect, and I have no doubt an insensible effect sometimes, even upon the men that ought not to be affected by it.

But, sir, I had hoped, and I yet hope, that this question presents, and will present, considerations that will address themselves to patriotic minds, independent of the party associations which they sustain, independent of the localities and the communities which they represent. I believe the Kansas question will present to the minds of such men, coming from such quarters, considerations that will have weight enough to influence their judgment, independent and irrespective of the considerations which have been alluded to as necessarily connected with it. I am the more strengthened in this belief, in this hope, and in this conviction, when I remember the history of Kansas, and when I remember the history of the men whom you have sent there to act as Governors of that Territory—

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I trust I shall be pardoned for raising the question whether discussions in regard to Kansas are in order on a motion to take up a bill for the admission of Minnesota? I know that we have all been wandering a little further and further, and we are going into the vortex of general politics to the exclusion and defeat of the very object we have in view. The object is to decide whether we shall take up the Minnesota bill or not. When we do take it up, the question will be open for debate; but really I hope we shall not open on this question a debate to which I can see no speedy termination.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not feel himself authorized to determine the relevancy of the remarks of Senators.

Mr. HALE. I am obliged to the Senator from Illinois for giving me another illustration of what I just remarked, that the lecture always comes here. Why did he not give it to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I trust it will always be as well deserved as it is now.

Mr. HALE. Why does not the Senator begin the censure at the head of the class? Why does he come down so far, when all have offended? But, sir, I think I was out of order, and I think the Senator from Virginia was too. I give up.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from New Hampshire did not undertake to report what I said, but undertook to report what he considered the amount of what I said—the substance of it. In what I said I was speaking for myself alone. I have had no conference with friends around me. I did not, so far as my own action was concerned, say that I wanted to see all the difficulties surrounding the Kansas question settled before I could vote to admit a new State anywhere else under any circumstances. I refrained from saying that. The time has not yet come to say it; I trust it never may come. What I did say was, that this bill for the admission of Minnesota had been reported within the last week or ten days; that in looking into it I saw that very great irregularities had attended the construction or erection of this State; that I was not prepared to object to them; it may be that they were subsequently cured; but that we knew there was another State, one also recently erected from a Territory, or claiming to be so, that would apply within the next day or two for admission, and we knew, from the history of the country, that there was probably a great amount of objection which would be raised by Senators sitting on the other side, to the admission of that State; and that, for one, I wanted to see the whole ground, to understand what we were about. I said that when two States are applying coterminously for admission, there might become, not a political necessity only, but a political propriety, in justice to the great public that we all represent here, in connecting their fortunes. I did not know, and did not declare, that even in my judgment that might become necessary; but I said I wanted to take a survey of the whole ground before I committed myself to the admission of one State, when there was another at the door, and that it might be necessary to connect them. With all the respect which I bear to the honorable Senator, I must declare that I did not say that, for one, I would not again vote to admit a State from any quarter, until the Kansas difficulties were settled, meaning by the Kansas difficulties—at least what I mean by them is, objections made to the admission of that Territory as a State. I again say to the honorable Senator, the time has not yet come to say that; I trust it never may come.

Mr. BROWN. I appreciate, sir, the suggestion made by the Senator from Illinois, that in discussing a question relating to the order of business, we had better not wander so far off as to discuss everything; and in the remarks which I shall submit on this occasion, I shall not allude to Kansas further than is necessary to illustrate the views I have in reference to the point before us, which is, whether this subject ought to be considered now, or whether it had better be postponed to a subsequent day.

At the last session, Congress passed what was termed an enabling act for Minnesota; such an act as the Senator from Illinois has assured us was, in his judgment, absolutely necessary to enable a Territory to form a constitution preparatory to coming into the Union as a State. He notified us in his opening argument on the Kansas question, that a Territory could do nothing which it was not authorized to do by the enabling act. If that be true and there have been in Minnesota those irregularities which gentlemen on all hands admit to have existed, I submit whether the enabling act amounts to anything. If it be necessary to pass an enabling act, there must exist a necessity for obeying the act after it is passed; and that seems, in the case of Minnesota, not to have been done. What is the necessity for an enabling act if the Territorial Legislature and the people of the Territory do not regard the act after it is passed? As I understand the case before us, there is no pretense that the enabling act has been obeyed by the authorities in Minnesota.

But, says the Senator from Massachusetts, these defects were cured by the subsequent action of the people. I say again, if there was a necessity for passing the enabling act, and nothing could be done till it was passed, then I want to know how it is that the people of a Territory can cure defects which must have been fatal in themselves, except upon the ground which we take in reference to Kansas, that the power emanates from the people, that no enabling act is necessary, that when the people have acted they give vitality to the constitution, and whether it is made in obedience to an enabling act or not, is of no consequence; and because of these arguments we desire to see these two States brought in together. I want to know whether my honorable friend from Illinois means to take the ground that an enabling act is necessary, and when the act has been disregarded, vote for the admission of Minnesota, and then vote to exclude Kansas because in that case there has been no enabling act. When he does that, I wish him to do it altogether, so that the two things may stand in such juxtaposition that the whole country may see what he has done.

I raise no question in reference to the enabling act, or that the people have disregarded it. I think the act was unnecessary. If I had known the full tendency of it, I should have opposed it on other grounds than those on which I placed my opposition last year. I think, when the proper time comes, I shall be able to demonstrate that no such act is necessary. The Senator from Illinois, however, takes a different ground. He says the act is necessary. Then, I say, admitting his premises, there is a necessity for obeying the act. What! an enabling act totally disregarded and defects cured afterwards by a popular vote, and admit the State; and in the next breath tell us that Kansas cannot come in because there is no enabling act for her! If there be such power in the people of Minnesota, that they may not only make a constitution without an enabling act, but in violation and total disregard to it, I shall want to know, at the proper time, why the same rule does not apply to Kansas?

But the Senator from Massachusetts tells us, as an argument why we ought to act at once on this subject, that the Legislature has gone on, and that the Governor chosen under this constitution not yet acted on by Congress, has been signing laws, and that a Secretary, whose existence under the constitution has not been recognized, has been countersigning them. I should like to inquire of the Senator if these laws are put in force there. Are the laws thus signed by a Governor unknown to Congress, and unknown to the President in a Territory, enforced in Minnesota?

Mr. WILSON. I cannot tell whether those laws are enforced or not. I have heard of laws, some dozen or twenty, I think, passed, not by the Territorial Legislature, but by the Legislature elected under the constitution, and signed by the Secretary of the Territory as acting Governor.

Mr. DOUGLAS. He is acting Governor in the absence of the Governor of the Territory. They are signed by him as acting Governor.

Mr. BROWN. I did not precisely understand it. I supposed the Governor elected under the new constitution had signed the laws.

Mr. DOUGLAS. No, sir; but the Secretary of the Territory, as acting Governor.

Mr. BROWN. I did not know but that you were getting back to the days of Topeka, and that some such man as Governor Robinson was signing laws there. All I desire to add is in reference to a remark uttered by the Senator from New Hampshire. If Kansas is to be excluded, under the circumstances mentioned by the Senator from Virginia, he expressed the hope that the number of States never would exceed thirty-one. Am I mistaken?

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWN. Will the Senator repeat what he did say?

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir. I said, that if the Senator from Virginia was correct in announcing that that was to be a test, that the admission of Kansas, under all the objections which exist to her, was to be made the price of the admission of any State from any quarter, it would be a great while before our numerical number of States would exceed thirty-one. That is what I said, exactly.

Mr. BROWN. That varies it a little, but I think not a great deal. I can say, however, to the Senator from New Hampshire, that, if one rule is to be applied to Kansas, she ask no admission as a slave State, and she is to be excluded on that rule, and then, when the same rule applies to Minnesota, she is admitted notwithstanding the rule, the number of States never will exceed thirty-one. If you admit Minnesota and exclude Kansas, standing on the same principle, the spirit of our revolutionary fathers is utterly extinct if the Government can last for one short twelvemonth. I am sure you will not do it; I entertain no serious apprehension that you are about to do it; but I do not understand this impatience, this exceeding anxiety to force Minnesota into the Union. When we know that Kansas will be asking for admission, as the Senator from Virginia has already announced, certainly this week, and possibly to-morrow, why this exceeding haste to put Minnesota ahead? Do Republican Senators hope to have two more Senators on this floor to aid them in the exclusion of Kansas? Is that what they are driving at? If it be, I trust there is a firmness and decision on this side of the House that will resist to the bitter end the consummation of any such design. I know nothing of the views of the two honorable gentlemen asking admission on this floor as Senators from Minnesota. I know not upon which side of this question they will vote. I know them to be honorable men, as all of us know them to be. But when I find such exceeding anxiety on the other side of the Chamber to bring them in, I expect that gentlemen look for some aid and comfort from that quarter. They would hardly manifest such exceeding zeal in getting in two additional Senators, if they believed they would vote against them, when they came in, on the vital question of the session. I do not know that they will vote against us; I do not state that they will; because, on that question, I know nothing; but I would rather try this question before the old Senate, without the addition of any new material. Whether we can carry it is another proposition. What will result to the country if we fail, I pretend not to say. I hope I may not be misunderstood on that point. What I say is, that if you admit Minnesota, and Kansas applies substantially on the same grounds, you must not exclude her. If Kansas be excluded on account of irregularities in the formation of her constitution, then let Minnesota be excluded for the same reason, and there will be peace all over the country. Nobody in my section will complain, for an instant, that you apply the same rule to the one that you apply to the other. Our point is, that you shall not apply one rule for the admission of a free State, and then exclude a State asking admission as a slave State on the same principle.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Mr. President, I did not intend, nor did I expect, to say another word on the subject; but allusions are made to this side of the Chamber. Perhaps they are not always intended to include me; but I am included in the language which gentlemen use. I am on this side of the Chamber. I sit where I sat twenty years ago, and I stand where I stood twenty years ago, so far as principles are concerned.

Mr. BROWN. Allow me to interrupt my honorable friend from Kentucky?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Certainly.

Mr. BROWN. I suppose the remark of the Senator may by possibility be meant for me. I am not unaware of the fact that my friends from Alabama, [Mr. FITZPATRICK,] South Carolina, [Mr. EVANS,] and Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] in common with the honorable Senator from Kentucky, all southern Senators, sit on the other side of the Chamber; but when I speak of the other side, I mean to be understood as speaking of the Republican members of the Senate, and nobody else.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I did not take it in any sense personal or offensive. I sit where I sat; and I endeavor to act as I always have done, so as to do what I think is right. When I suggested some time ago, in a very few remarks, the propriety that called on us to act on this measure, I did not know that there was any opposition to it whatever; and though I have heard the remarks of many gentlemen, I do not yet perceive that they have any objection to the proceedings that have taken place in Minnesota. All has been regular; to my understanding substantially so. The committee have so reported, and have recommended the admission of the State on the ordinary terms. I regarded it somewhat in this stage of the business as a mere formal proceeding on the part of the Senate; and I thought it due to the State itself, who now, by regular course of law, has arrived at its present condition, and is entitled by law to admission here if she presents a republican constitution, and all the conditions have been complied with on her part, and that we were unjustly delaying the admission of her representatives on this floor. I thought it due to ourselves and to the Constitution of the United States; I thought it due to the State of Minnesota and to the gentlemen who are her Senators, for such they virtually are, who are in attendance from that State, that this formality, as I consider it, should be gone through with without delay. I yet regard it as such.

I have heard my honorable friend from Virginia; I have heard the honorable gentleman from Mississippi, and others; and what do their objections amount to? Have they made an objection to the course by which the constitution of Minnesota was formed, or by which it is authenticated? I have heard none. It has been intimated that perhaps there were some irregularities; but gentlemen do not state that those irregularities would control their judgment on the subject; and yet we are to delay it. Why, sir, if there are questions to be settled, they are entitled to a speedy settlement; and let us proceed at once to the business.

Gentlemen suggest that Minnesota is not to be admitted until Kansas is prepared. In the name of God, when will that be? She has been preparing now many years for admission here. She has been the subject of long controversies here. Why shall we delay the admission of Minnesota because of the controversies that exist in relation to Kansas? I can see no reason. Are we not to proceed in the case of Minnesota, which involves no question, which involves no objection, until we can settle a disputable question in respect to another State that asks for admission? Why are we to throw into the bottomless sea of troubles that is around Kansas, this question of the admission of Minnesota? If that is to be the case, we shall not now proceed to the consideration of this subject, and no gentleman can tell me when we shall be brought to consider it.

Is it just to the State of Minnesota? Is it just that she, who has approached us in an unquestionable shape—in obedience to law—in conformity to the Constitution, and has presented to you a State constitution sanctioned by a convention, and sanctioned by an almost unanimous vote of the people, shall be rejected or stopped at our door, compelled to wait until somebody else is prepared for admission? I see no justice in it; I see no argument in it; and yet such considerations as these are supposed by gentlemen that I would, under ordinary circumstances, say are much more competent to judge than I am, to justify them in withholding themselves from acting on this subject, until another doubtful and questionable event, in their apprehension, is decided upon.

With all these arguments and views, and in almost every argument and controversy that I now witness on this floor, are mingled, to give them strength and point, either prognostics of the overthrow of this Government, or threats against its existence. This is the common strengthening means now thrown into every argument here. While we prize the Union, while we would, I am sure, and the very gentlemen who use this language would do all they could to preserve and perpetuate the Constitution and the Union, there is not a day that we are not doomed to listen here, over and over again, to threats of its overthrow; predictions made, little prophecies thrown out, that to-day, or to-morrow, or at some day near at hand, this Government is to be no more. Sir, this is the most unfortunate and ominous sign that exists in the whole country, in my judgment. If such language can be familiarly used, and thrown into every argument as a make-weight—as a dust in the balance—if these threats can be made here against the existence of the Union, and if they can have any effect upon the people of this country, then, indeed, sir, we may well apprehend that it cannot last long. I hope it will last forever; and if nobody threatened it until I did, it would last forever. [Applause in the galleries.] Yes, sir, and it will last much longer than gentlemen here, by continual repetition and reflection, and meditation, believe to be so near at hand; and it would last much longer, perhaps, but for these meditations. They prize it so highly that the remotest danger affects them; and they forthwith begin to prophecy that its end is near at hand; or they are provoked at something which is done which they think is adverse to the interests of the Republic and the Union, and then they threaten; but all this is promoting the very purpose and the very end against which I know, in their heart, they are opposed, and with their hands would oppose.

We should do well, I think, to throw out of all our ordinary course of argument these threats and these prophecies. I believe the Union is to live, not because I wish it, or you wish it, sir, but it is to live for ages; I believe it is enshrined in the hearts of the people, and they will be its sustainers and maintainers even if we should be recreant to the part we are to act, and desire its overthrow. It is not in our power—thank God it is not in the power of the Senate, or of the Congress of the United States to overthrow this Government; and I rejoice in it. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. MASON. I trust the order of the Senate will be preserved. This is not the first occasion since I have been here, by many, when the order of the Senate has been disregarded by those present. I hope the order of the Senate will be preserved.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Mr. President, I did not intend to have said this much, and this, perhaps fortunate, interruption, brings me to a speedier conclusion than I should otherwise have done. I do not think, in all soberness and earnestness, that we can, in justice to the State of Minnesota, refuse to consider her claims to admission here. How her members will vote on this side or that side of any question, can not be anticipated. We have permitted her to exercise by anticipation the rights of a sovereign State. We have permitted her to make a constitution for a State government. She has put on the armor of a State government in your presence and by your permission. She is entitled to all its privileges, and she is exercising them. Though not yet within the limits of your Constitution, she is by your authority in a state of preparation for it, and has already, by your authority, anticipated her sovereignty, and performed acts which a sovereign State alone could do. She has made a constitution such as befits a sovereign State. She has elected representatives, such as a sovereign State is entitled to have on this floor. She has done all this, not in the tumultuous, disorderly manner in which we have frequently allowed it to be done, but in regular conformity with, and in obedience to, law. She is here in an unquestionable form. I say in an unquestionable form, if the report of the committee be relied upon, and I will rely upon it. Why should she be held back? Shall she be held back to be used by gentlemen on the one side or the other, as a mere argument, a mere matter of constraint to carry or prevent some other measure? I trust not. I do not think that is just. I feel that I can do justice now in reference to Minnesota, and I feel that I can do equal and unswayed justice in the case of Kansas, when that shall come up. It is not necessary as to me that one should be made to operate on the other. Nothing but reason, nothing but justice should operate on the decision in either case. Let us, then, act on this. It is not a mere matter of courtesy to be sure—it is far, far above it. It is an act of justice to this State; it is an act of justice to ourselves, and to the Union of these States, that Minnesota should come in, and that without unnecessary delay. There has been a week's delay since the report was made. There is no reason why it should be postponed—no reason at all adequate which has been alleged by any gentleman who has spoken against the present consideration of the subject.

I have heard no objection to the constitution; I have heard of no irregularity pointed out in the making of the constitution. There was some little controversy among the members of the convention who formed it, who separated into different bodies; but they came together at last, and agreed on one instrument that was submitted to the people, and adopted by the almost unanimous vote of the people. The sovereign hand of the people has ratified and sealed the instrument made by their delegates in convention. What more does any one want? Nothing more, according to any form of proceeding with respect to any other State that has ever been admitted.

As to the objection of my honorable friend from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] that these Senators perhaps have only a very questionable right to their seats, inasmuch as they have been elected by a Legislature before the admission of the State into the Union, that, I think, is settled by the constant practice of the Senate. Practice and precedent, even if there was a little error in it, have established that doctrine. We cannot go behind all the precedents, and say now, that these gentlemen are not entitled to their seats because they were elected before the admission of the State into the Union. That might have been a question once; but it was never one, I think, of much moment or difficulty.

The people of Minnesota, as I said before, are exercising the anticipated rights of a sovereign, and, while in a transition state, they are of necessity permitted to exercise and perform acts which none but a sovereign could perform without your consent. You have given your consent that they shall become a State. They are exercising, by a little anticipation, the right of a sovereign State in electing Senators, after they have exercised the same right in establishing and presenting to the people a constitutional form of government. It is a Legislature within that ample sense of the Constitution of the United States; that beneficial construction of it which is necessary to its useful operation. It comes within its reasonable and proper construction.

That, however, is not the question now before us. Admit the State, and then when the Senators present themselves, it will be time enough to consider whether their credentials and their election have been of that character to entitle them to a seat. I hope we shall proceed with this bill and finish it before anything else is done. I think it is the greatest exigency that we now have. The body is not complete. Two of the judges that ought to decide upon all questions are excluded, and it is said are to be excluded till another question is settled. I am opposed to all that sort of action by this body. I want direct action on every subject that comes before us, according to its character, and according to its exigency. This is one of the exigencies, in my opinion.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BROWN] seems to be under the impression that I am going to apply one rule to Minnesota and another to Kansas. I desire to relieve him from any apprehension of that kind so far as I am concerned. He is entirely mistaken in assuming that I regard an enabling act, as it is called, as essential. I have in explanation of that point said, in reply to the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. GREEN,] the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIGLER,] and several other Senators, that I deemed the want of an enabling act an irregularity which might be waived or not according as the proceedings were fair and just or not. I do not regard an enabling act as at all essential; because if there is no enabling act, and if Congress, therefore, has not given its assent to the formation of a constitution, yet if the people proceed and make a constitution, and when it comes here we believe it embodies the will of the people fairly expressed, that they have the requisite population, that the boundaries are fair and proper, we may waive the omission of an enabling act and receive them into the Union. I have voted several times since I have been a member of the two Houses of Congress for the admission of States under such circumstances, and hence I do not regard an enabling act as at all essential. It may be waived. The essential point is that the constitution must be the act of the people embodying their will.

I have not regarded submission to the people as an essential principle. It is a fair way of ascertaining the popular will, when that will is disputed. It is a means of ascertaining an end; but if there is no dispute that the constitution presented is the will of the people, it is no more essential to have a vote of submission, than it is in this body on the passage of a bill that the yeas and nays shall be recorded each time. If you put the question and one Senator says "ay," and nobody says "no," you declare it carried; the will of the body on the point is not questioned; but if I rise in my place, or any other Senator does, and demands a count, or a sufficient number demand the yeas and nays, they are taken, in order to ascertain the essential point, whether it is the will of the body that the act in question shall become a law. So with regard to the question in Kansas and Minnesota. Satisfy me that the constitution adopted by the people of Minnesota is their will, and I am prepared to take it. Satisfy me that the constitution adopted, or said to be adopted, by the people of Kansas, is their will, and I am prepared to take it. I will not apply one rule to Minnesota and another to Kansas. I will never apply one rule to a free State and another to a slaveholding State. I hold each of the States equal in this Confederacy, and apply the same rule to one as to the other.

I have deemed this explanation necessary, in order to correct the erroneous impression into which the Senator from Mississippi had fallen. It is an explanation which I have, in substance, had occasion to make on two or three previous occasions.

Now, sir, in regard to the admission of Minnesota, I apprehend that there are no such irregularities as enter into the essence of the question. I shall be prepared to show, beyond all doubt, when the question comes up, that the constitution here presented is the act of the people of Minnesota; that it embodies their will; that the enabling act has been substantially complied with; that the boundaries are those prescribed by Congress in the enabling act; that the population is more than sufficient for one Representative in Congress; and that there are none of the conditions omitted upon which she was to be admitted into the Union. I am prepared, therefore, to vote for the admission of Minnesota on her own state of facts, and then I will deal with Kansas on her own state of facts, without reference to Minnesota. As I stated before, show me a constitution from Kansas that is the act of her people, embodying their will, and you will not find me voting against it, either because of the absence of an enabling act, or because of the absence of a formal vote of submission, or because it is a slaveholding State, or for any other cause; she having the proper boundaries and the requisite population.

If I know myself, it is my fixed purpose to deal with each of these questions separately, each upon its own state of fact and upon its own merits. When Oregon comes—and I understand that her constitution is here—I shall take up her case, and deal on the same principles with her, without inquiring whether her Senators will vote this way or that way on the Army bill, this way or that way on the Pacific railroad bill, this way or that way on Kansas; without inquiring whether they are Republicans or Democrats, and without inquiring whether her constitution recognizes, tolerates, or prohibits slavery. If she comes, she will come without an enabling act; yet, if her constitution is the act of her people, the embodiment of their will, and the evidence is satisfactory on that point, she having the requisite population and the proper boundaries, she will receive my vote for admission. If there is any insuperable objection on either of these points, she will not receive it; but I will not prejudge it until the facts are before us.

Mr. GREEN. It is unpleasant to me to be represented in a class of objectors to which I do not belong; and I regret that the honorable Senator from Kentucky, in singing his song of praise to the Union, used general terms, which might be construed as including me as uttering threats against the integrity of the Union. I did no such thing. I stated my propositions with as much clearness as my understanding of the English language will permit; and I expect to carry nothing by threat or denunciation.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say that I certainly made no personal allusion to the honorable Senator.

Mr. GREEN. Certainly not.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. My remarks were general.

Mr. GREEN. And that is what I think casts the imputation.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I do not know that they apply at all to the honorable Senator.

Mr. GREEN. It was because of the generality of the expression that I object to the remark. I want explanations made. If others deem it their duty to speak in deprecating terms of the existence of the Union, let them do it, and be responsible for it. For myself, I speak of this Union as of the mother who has cherished me from youth.

I opposed the taking up of the Minnesota bill, for reasons that I stated, and which have not been met or corrected. Gentlemen have gone off, as I think, into other things, irrelevant, immaterial, and unnecessary to the proper consideration of the Minnesota bill. The Senator from Kentucky is mistaken in one thing, however. When he says the action in Minnesota has all been in pursuance of the enabling act passed by Congress, he greatly mistakes the facts returned before us. The law of Congress said they might have seventy-eight delegates, and they had one hundred and eight. The law of Congress said those delegates should meet together in convention. They never so met. They split it into two parties, one meeting in one place, and another at another. The law of Congress said that the State, when she presented herself, should be admitted with one Representative, and as many others as the returns of the census should prove her to be entitled to under the apportionment of 1850. That has not yet taken place.

My first objection to the present consideration of the bill is, that the pledge we made to Minnesota that she should be admitted with a representation according to the population she might have under the ratio of 1850, cannot now be determined; it is not returned. No Senator here present can say what her representation ought to be. The pledge, the promise, the guarantee, cannot be carried out, because you have not the facts; the census returns have not come in. I desire delay, so that we may be prepared to do justice to that Territory, and to execute the pledge which we made in the passage of the Minnesota enabling act, as it has been latterly called; and this was the ground of my opposition—not because I wanted to threaten the Union; and here let me say, this Union cannot be sustained by singing songs to its praise. If we find the car of the Republic sunk in the mire, and get down on our knees and sing praises to it, and call on the gods to aid us, and put not our own shoulders to the wheel, it will never be extricated from the difficulty. We must go to work, and when difficulties beset us we must meet them and ward them off, and protect it, in imitation of our fathers who have gone before us. This is the only method of preserving this glorious Union.

Minnesota has not complied with the enabling act. I present that, not as an objection to her admission when the facts are brought before us, which will enable us to act definitely as statesmen in the premises. There is not one Senator present who can say how many Representatives she shall have—not one.

I never authorized the report that has been made. The honorable Senator from Illinois, I suppose, felt himself authorized to make it; but I believe a majority of the committee to-day dissent from him in opinion. He was authorized to consult the absent members of the committee, and if they agreed to it, to make the report. That assent was given in the manner which he has explained. It was because the Senator from Alabama had not the physical ability to make the requisite examination, and permitted the report to be made under the promise that he should still have an opportunity to examine it. Now, when that honorable Senator says he has not been able, from physical debility, to make the examination, and is not prepared this day to vote for or against the bill, and when the report was made under the sanction which the Senator from Illinois was justified in assuming, surely to press the bill under such circumstances is doing injustice to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Allow me to ask the Senator from Missouri if every member of the committee was not present when we agreed on all the propositions in the report, and what the form of the bill should be, and that the facts should be set out in the report?

Mr. GREEN. I will answer, as soon as you are through, by a brief narrative.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I ask that question because my understanding of the facts is that every member of the committee was present, and they all agreed that a bill should be reported. They differed on the second section, as to how many members were to be allowed. I understood each member, except the Senator from Missouri, to instruct me to put in that second section, he dissenting alone, according to my understanding, out of seven members; six one way, and one the other. Then we adjourned to another meeting, when I was to read the report. When the report was read, perhaps two members were absent, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. FITZPATRICK]; each person present agreed that the report was as it was instructed to be drawn, the Senator from Missouri still reserving his objection as to the question of the census; but every other member agreed that the report had been drawn as it was agreed at the previous meeting it should be, when the vote stood six to one. That is the fact.

Mr. GREEN. I dislike any question of fact or differences of opinion existing in regard to facts, to be raised in the Senate at any time. I shall give what did occur in as few words as possible, and about which I suppose there will be no difference of opinion. When the committee was in session, it was agreed that a report should be drawn in a certain manner. It was also agreed by a majority that a bill should be prepared in a certain manner; and a subsequent meeting was to have the submission of the bill and the report of facts made to them. At this subsequent meeting there were but four members present—the honorable Senator from Illinois, the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. SEBASTIAN,] and myself. The Senator from Arkansas and myself agreed that our opposition to the bill could not be overcome without a report of facts from the Secretary of the Interior showing the census. We did not concur in the bill, but we all agreed that the honorable Senator from Illinois had drawn his report in accordance with the facts, as we understood them. We objected to the reporting of a bill, because we did not believe it was justice, or in conformity with the enabling act authorizing the people of Minnesota to form their constitution and State government. It however was agreed that the Senator should submit it to the absent members of the committee, and that, if they concurred in the bill thus framed, it might be reported. Whether they did or not is for them to say, and not for me. One of them has spoken, and explained the circumstances under which he permitted it to be reported. While I refer to that with no view of censuring the Senator from Illinois, I state it as a reason why this matter should not be pressed with unnecessary haste on the consideration of that Senator who, from sickness, has been unable to turn his attention to it up to the present period of time, and because another Senator on the same committee, the Senator from Arkansas, coinciding with me, is now sick, and has sent me word this day that he is not able to come to the Senate.

Here is a grave question as to the representation, as to the proportion of influence which this inchoate State is to exercise in the councils of the nation, to your detriment, to my detriment, to the lessening of the equality of the States now in the Union; and when a great question like that is to be considered, surely those specially charged with its investigation ought to have the small privilege, when they are kept away by sickness, of having it deferred until they can have an opportunity to be present.

I will state that the returns are not complete, and I was unwilling to report any bill until they were complete, or until the opportunity to complete them was closed, and we resorted to other evidence to ascertain what the population of Minnesota was. I am not willing to trust the representation to which Minnesota may be entitled, to the other wing of this Capitol. I hold it to be the duty of Congress to say, when they admit Minnesota, what the number of her Representatives shall be; whether one, two, or three. The honorable Senator from Illinois is mistaken when he says he reported this bill in accordance with the bill of 1850, leaving it to the House of Representatives to determine how many members she should have. That was not the bill of 1850. The bill of 1850 that fixed the apportionment, required the Secretary of the Interior to determine the number of members each State should have.

Mr. DOUGLAS. My meaning was this: leaving it a matter of addition of figures, as it was under the act of 1850, instead of specifying the number in the law.

Mr. GREEN. Very well. I am not willing to do even that. New States may be admitted; and each State shall have at least one Representative. These are provisions of the Constitution; and Congress, at the time of the admission, must say how many Representatives each shall have. Each State must have two Senators, as fixed by the Constitution. The number of Representatives is to be fixed by the act of admission, according to the ratio, and that ratio depending on the previous ratio established for the Representatives of the old States. Look at the advantage which will be given to Minnesota if you admit them now, and let them go on taking the census for twelve months to come. Is that the way, or to what period will you fix it? At what point of time will you limit it? Every State in this Republic had her ratio fixed according to the population of 1850. Since that time the honorable Senator's State has increased more than half a million, without a single additional Representative, without any voice in the councils of the nation? Since that time, my State has increased more than three hundred thousand without any additional Representative, without any additional voice in the councils of the nation. Now, when we propose to admit Minnesota, we must fix the period of time. It must come up to the time of admission, and we must fix the degree of influence which she is to exert on the councils of the nation at that time, and not leave the door open for an unlimited space of time. If they are to go on, the population may increase fourfold before they close the census; and they may bring in five, or eight, or ten Representatives at the other end of the Capitol. It is not right. It is not right for us to close the census before we admit the State, and give them a fair opportunity to bring them in. As there remain, I think, but seven counties, as we have reason to believe that those returns will come in within a very short period of time, and as we can then discharge our constitutional duty, and as we cannot discharge that constitutional duty in the absence of this information, I have asked for this postponement. I have objected to the displacement of the great bill for the construction of the Pacific railroad, and I am sorry to find the great advocate of that road acquiescing in the taking up of this bill. Though the eastern end dodges Missouri, and though the western end terminates where it cannot benefit us a cent; though we are cut off as exiles and orphans in this Government, still I had hoped to bring it up for consideration, and not to see its peculiar friend and advocate disposed to let this bill take its place and be pushed forward with so much facility. I hope this bill will not be taken up.

Mr. GWIN. Does the Senator allude to me?

Mr. GREEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GWIN. He is mightily mistaken. I am not going to give it up.

Mr. GREEN. I hope not.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. When I had the honor of addressing the Senate this morning—

Mr. BROWN. I ask my friend from Alabama to yield to allow me to make an explanation to my friend from Illinois. In a few remarks submitted by me in the earlier part of the debate, I assumed that the Senator from Illinois had taken the ground that an enabling act was necessary to a Territory in the formation of a State constitution. I based that declaration on his opening speech in the debate, in which I thought I was not mistaken; and upon recurring to the speech I find that I was right. I do not know that the Senator expressed himself in the precise language in which his maturer judgment would require him to express an opinion; but in that speech beyond all question he did take the ground that an enabling act was necessary. That speech is the one upon which I based my remark, and I was not aware that he had qualified it in such broad terms as he states to-day that he has done in the debates which followed. I have in my hand a copy of that speech. Said the Senator:

"A Territorial Legislature possesses whatever power its organic act gives it, and no more. The organic act of Arkansas provided that the legislative powers should be vested in the Territorial Legislature, the same as the organic act of Kansas provides that the legislative power and authority shall be vested in the Legislature. But what is the extent of that legislative power? It is to legislate for that Territory under the organic act, and in obedience to it. It does not include any power to subvert the organic act under which it was brought into existence. It has the power to protect it, the power to execute it, the power to carry it into effect; but it has no power to subvert, none to destroy; and hence that power can only be obtained by applying to Congress, the same authority which created the Territory itself."

Now, sir, according to the Senator, when the Territorial Legislature provides for forming a constitution, that is an act of subversion. It is a subversion of the organic act, because it proposes the substitution of altogether a different form of government; and I understood the Senator to say distinctly in that speech that that could not be done (for that was the point in controversy) without applying directly to Congress for the power to do it; in other words, that when the Territorial government was to give way and a State government to be substituted, that could be done by the authority of Congress and in no other manner. Upon another page of the same speech, the Senator, after speaking of Arkansas again, used this language:

"If you apply these principles to the Kansas convention, you find that it had no power to do any act as a convention forming a government; you find that the act calling it was null and void from the beginning; you find that the Legislature could confer no power whatever on the convention."

Why? Because it had not been authorized by Congress; there was no enabling act. The act of the Legislature calling a convention, said the Senator, was absolutely null and void from the beginning. It could be null and void but for one reason, and that was, that Congress had not authorized it. A Territorial Legislature can do nothing, said the Senator, which the organic act does not authorize it to do; and if it undertakes to substitute one form of government for another, it must come to the source of its power, to Congress. If I have been led into an error from not exactly keeping up with the debates in the Senate, or not reading or listening to all the speeches of the honorable Senator, I hope I shall be excused. I based my remarks on the reading of this speech, which has unquestionably been more extensively read than any other speech delivered at this session, by the Senator or anybody else. I am glad he makes the correction. I am glad he comes forward, and says in terms which are not to be mistaken—and it is to that point, and to vindicate myself, that I rose now—that an enabling act is not necessary.

I return my thanks for that declaration. We have the Senator's authority, and it is a potential authority in the country, that no enabling act is necessary. He goes further, and tells us that the act of submission is not essential. Not only does he say now, and I thank him for saying so, I repeat again, in terms so plain that the whole country will understand, that an enabling act was not necessary—but he says that a submission of the constitution to the people was not necessary. That gets us clear of two troublesome propositions in the discussion of the Kansas question. Let us hear no more of this argument, then, anywhere. If the great chieftain gives up the question, I take it for granted that the subalterns will do it of course, and that hereafter we shall hear no more that Kansas does not present herself properly because there was no enabling act; and we shall hear no more complaint of Kansas that she did not submit her constitution to the people.

The Senator tells us to-day that neither the one nor the other was necessary. All we have to inquire now is, as to whether the constitution she is about to present is the work of her people. What the people desire is to be expressed through the ballot-box. The will of the people, what they desire, is to be ascertained through the ballot-box; and, as I now understand the question, if we shall be enabled to show that the people of Kansas, expressing their will through the ballot-box, under the forms of law, have organized this constitution, then we have nothing beyond that to establish. Two points, I want it noted, are now out of the question—no enabling act is necessary, and no submission of the constitution to the people is necessary. All you are to learn is, whether it is the will of the people.

Then the point which I submit to the Senator for his reflection is simply this: has the will of Kansas been ascertained in the mode and manner prescribed by the laws of the land? Has the ballot-box been thrown open? Have the people been allowed to vote freely? If they have, then I claim that they stand on as good a footing before us to-day as does Minnesota. I ignore the proposition, if it shall be made from any quarter, that you shall compel them to vote whether they will or not. I am glad to see the issue narrowing down; I am glad that we are to have no question except the simple one, is this the work of the people of Kansas? We are not to be embarrassed with vague ideas about enabling acts, or about propositions to submit constitutions to the people. All that is out of the way from this time on. All we have to inquire is, as I said before, has this constitution been made by the people of Kansas, and have we ascertained that fact under the forms of the laws of Kansas? I think, when the proper time comes, we shall be enabled to show that, in the mode pointed out by the law, the fact has been ascertained that the people of Kansas do sustain the constitution.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I regret to be under the necessity of troubling the Senate any more on this question; but inasmuch as my speech has been read for the purpose of giving to it a construction which I never intended it to bear, and which I do not think it does fairly and justly bear, I feel it to be my duty to put that matter right, in order that no misapprehension shall result. I did not blame the Senator from Missouri when he put that construction on it, although it surprised me at the time; and I do not blame the Senator from Mississippi now for putting the same construction on it—he having stated that he did not hear my previous disclaimer of that construction. Still, I must say that that speech, in my opinion, does not bear the construction which they have placed upon it; and, as evidence that I did not intend it to bear that construction, the first moment any member of this body attributed it to me, I disclaimed it emphatically, and restated my proposition as I have done to-day.

Now, sir, when I spoke of the act of the Legislature calling a convention being void unless assented to by Congress, I intended to declare that the only power which the Territorial Legislature possessed was that which the organic law conferred, the right to pass all laws consistent with the Constitution, and the organic act for the protection of that people under and in obedience to the territorial government; but the organic act did not give to the Legislature the power to subvert the government under which it existed. It had the power to execute it, to carry out the objects of that government, but not to subvert it. An attempt to subvert it and put another government in operation upon its ruins, would be an act of rebellion. I say now, that if the Territorial Legislature calls a convention, and that convention attempts to put a government in operation in subversion of the territorial government established by Congress, it is an act of gross rebellion. Why? The territorial government established by Congress cannot be overthrown except by the consent of Congress.

Mr. BELL. I hope the honorable Senator from Illinois will give way for an adjournment. I see that we are going into a long controversy.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am not going to occupy much time, but I desire to put myself right.

Mr. BELL. There will be a reply to the honorable Senator.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But I must put myself right on this point, because it is essential to my position. I maintain that the Territorial Legislature cannot subvert the government established by Congress, without the consent of Congress. That consent may be given in advance, or may be given subsequently. It is regular to give it in advance. It is irregular to take the steps for forming a State constitution without having the consent in advance; but that irregularity has been overlooked in several instances in the history of the Government, as I have shown. It was overlooked in the cases of Arkansas, Florida, and California. In several instances this irregularity has been waived and been cured by the subsequent assent of Congress, by the acts of admission into the Union.

Then, sir, what authority has a convention called by a Legislature of a Territory without the consent of Congress? They have the authority to frame a paper called a constitution and send it here as a petition, which Congress may accept or reject as they please. It is to frame and send here an application for admission having the force of a petition, and not the force of a constitution. Having merely this weight, we may accept it or we may reject it as we see proper. I so stated in my opening speech. I have stated the same thing in every speech I have made since. I repeat now that the constitution framed by the convention in Kansas was a paper having the authority of a petition which Congress may accept or may reject. Ought we to accept it? If it is the will of that people, if they have the requisite population, and if the boundaries are proper, we ought to accept it. If it is not the will of the people of Kansas, you have no right to force that constitution down their throats against their will. That is the point I made. I cited in my argument the absence of an enabling act to show that the convention, not having had the sanction of Congress, was not authorized to institute government. It was authorized to frame a petition in the shape of a constitution, and ask for admission into the Union, but it was not authorized to institute government. The moment you recognize the right of the people of a Territory to institute a government in subversion of the government placed there by Congress, without the consent of Congress, you authorize rebellion. Hence, I say, the proceedings of that convention are null and void unless Congress shall hereafter give them vitality, by receiving Kansas into the Union under the constitution framed by it.

Now, in regard to the doctrine of submission, I said in my opening speech, and I have repeated it since, and, in order that no man shall have an excuse for misapprehending it hereafter, I repeat now, the only essential point is that the constitution must be the act of the people, embodying their opinions. In any case where it is disputed, the fairest, the best mode of ascertaining the popular will is by submission to the people by a fair vote. I agree with the President, as I have stated heretofore, that the fairest and best mode is by a submission to a popular vote, and inasmuch as that is the best rule, it ought to be the general rule; and I am willing to join the President of the United States in making it the general rule; but submission is not a principle. The popular will is the principle; the popular sanction is the principle; that it shall be the act of the people is the principle. Submission to a vote is a means of ascertaining that will. It is a fair means; and for that reason I have advocated it as a means of ascertaining the fact upon which fact your right to admit them must rest. I therefore receive the congratulations of the Senator from Mississippi that the Kansas issue is reduced to that one point. If he had deemed my first remarks worthy of being listened to—no, I will not say that, because that would not be just to our personal relations; but if he had happened to be in his seat, and his public duties had not taken him elsewhere, when I made these previous enunciations, he would not have been under any misapprehension in regard to my opinions.

I repeat that I think it wise and it ought to be the general rule in all cases, that no Territory should take any steps to form a State government till it has had the consent of Congress to do it by what is commonly called an enabling act. I hold more, as a general rule, Congress ought not to give that consent till the Territory has population enough for one member of Congress, according to the existing ratio. I go further, and agree with the President, that inasmuch as it is essential that the constitution shall be the embodiment of the popular will, it would be wise to adhere to the general rule, that in all cases the constitution shall be submitted to the people for their ratification or rejection. While I regard these as wise rules, general rules, rules which should not be departed from, unless in case of stern necessity, I come back to the real point, the only point that I intended to make as a cardinal point on the Kansas question, and that is, that the constitution must be the act of the people of Kansas, embodying their will.

The Senator from Mississippi has congratulated himself and the country, more in the manner and tone of his remarks than anything else, that hereafter it is an admitted fact that an enabling act is not necessary, and hence the people of a Territory can proceed to make a constitution in their own way, without application to Congress. Sir, I am amazed to hear a southern man enunciate that doctrine; I should be amazed to hear a northern man enunciate it. I hold that the people of no Territory ought to proceed to form a constitution and State government till they have applied to Congress for permission to change from a territorial to a State government, and they should never proceed without that consent of Congress unless there has been long, protracted, and vexatious delay after they have population enough for a member of Congress.

I do not agree with Senators whom I have heard express the opinion, during the debate on the Kansas question, that the Kansas-Nebraska bill was an enabling act. It was not, in my opinion, an enabling act. It authorized the people of Kansas to exercise all powers under the organic law, but none to destroy or subvert it. But, if it was an enabling act, when did it become so? From the day of its passage? If so, did it authorize the first Legislature, with five hundred people, to form a constitution and demand admission then? Did it authorize Kansas with two hundred people to call a convention, and demand admission then? If so, you are derelict in not admitting Utah, with the same powers, the Kansas act being copied from the compromise act of 1850, when they called a convention and made a constitution preparatory to admission two years ago. No, sir; the Kansas-Nebraska act did not authorize the people of Kansas to demand admission, until they had applied to Congress and obtained our assent to form a constitution. I deny that Nebraska to-day, with her fifteen thousand people, has a right to call a convention, form a constitution, and demand admission into this Union, without first having obtained our assent. We have a right to insist that the boundaries shall be proper; we have a right to insist that there is sufficient population; we have a right to insist that the time has come when they are a settled, homogeneous people, entitled to admission into the Union. Congress is to decide that question. I repeat, it is more regular to decide it first, before the application, than afterwards. I repeat, that a Territory ought not to take the steps to make a constitution, until she has applied to Congress and obtained that permission. I repeat, that if she does take the step and make the constitution without our permission, it is merely a petition to Congress, which we may accept or reject at pleasure, as we rejected the application from New Mexico several years ago.

I agree, that if we conclude to waive the irregularity and accept it, that cures the evil, and it may become a State in the Union without an enabling act, or without submission to the people; but I say you never ought to admit them without submission to the people, if there be any serious doubt as to whether their constitution is the embodiment of the popular will. If there is no doubt about it, you may waive the vote, just as you waive a vote in the Senate on the passage of a bill, when it passes by common consent; but if there is doubt, the President of the United States has told you, in his message, the proper mode of removing the doubt is to refer it to the people for a fair vote for or against the constitution.

Mr. President, I am sorry to have been put on the defensive in these discussions, and to have occupied time, but I felt it due to myself to say thus much. I have repeated these explanations two or three times. I hope I shall not be under the necessity of repeating them any further.

Mr. CLAY. I move that the Senate adjourn.
Mr. FITZPATRICK. I trust my colleague will indulge me in a few words. I have not much to say.

Mr. CLAY. Will you renew the motion?
Mr. FITZPATRICK. Yes, sir.
Mr. CLAY. I believe my colleague is entitled to the floor if he designs to go on.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I shall detain the Senate but a few minutes, as I have been alluded to.

Mr. GWIN. I rise to a question of order. I should like to know what the question before the Senate is. Is it not the report of the select committee on the Pacific railroad?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is the motion to postpone the special order with a view to take up the bill for the admission of Minnesota.

Mr. GWIN. This discussion seems to me to be entirely out of order. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator from Alabama, but really I think the discussion is all out of order and has been. We are going into the merits of a question which the Senate has not yet concluded to take up. I hope the question will be decided whether it is in order to go into a discussion of the Kansas bill on a motion to take up one bill and set aside another.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair knows of no authority that he possesses to limit debate.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I am aware that the question is on the motion to postpone the special order for the purpose of taking up the bill to admit Minnesota into the Union. At the suggestion of many Senators, I give way to my colleague.

Mr. CLAY. I believe it is the general wish that we should adjourn. It is evident that we cannot get through this discussion this evening. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, February 1, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. S. P. HILL, D. D.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

CONTUMACIOUS WITNESS.

Mr. STANTON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Whereas, J. D. Williamson, of the city of New York, was, on the 27th day of January, A. D. 1858, duly summoned to appear and testify before a committee of this House appointed to investigate certain charges growing out of the alleged expenditure of money by Lawrence, Stone & Co., of Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, to influence the passage of the tariff of 1857, and has failed and refused to appear before said committee pursuant to said summons: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Speaker issue his warrant directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms, commanding him to take into his custody the body of said J. D. Williamson, wherever to be found, and to have the same forthwith before the bar of this House, to answer for contempt of the authority of the House.

Mr. PHELPS. I desire to inquire if that is the report of the select committee.

Mr. STANTON. Certainly.

Mr. PHELPS. Then I hope the gentleman will demand the previous question and let us pass the resolution.

Mr. STANTON. I ask first that the papers which I send to the Clerk's desk may be read.

The Clerk read the papers as follows:

By authority of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States of America:

To A. J. GLOSSBRENNER, Sergeant-at-Arms:

You are hereby commanded to summon Captain J. D. Williamson (of the firm of Williamson, O'Reilly & Co., Trinity Buildings, New York,) to be and appear before the select committee of the House of Representatives of the United States, appointed to investigate the charges preferred against members and officers of the last Congress, growing out of the disbursement of any sum of money by Lawrence, Stone & Co., of Boston, or other persons, to bring with him any papers in his possession connected with or referring to the expenditure of money to procure the passage of the law modifying the tariff, forthwith in their chamber at the Capitol in the city of Washington, then and there to testify touching the matter of inquiry committed to said committee; and he is not to depart without the leave of said committee. JAMES L. ORR, Speaker.

Attest: J. C. ALLEN, Clerk.

Indorsed as follows:

WASHINGTON, January 26, 1858.

I hereby depote J. W. Jones for me and in my stead to execute the within order of the Speaker.

A. J. GLOSSBRENNER,

Sergeant-at-Arms House of Representatives, United States.

I hereby certify that I served a copy of the within summons upon J. D. Williamson, at the city of New York, on the 27th day of January, 1858, by delivering said copy to him personally, and I know the person served to be the person named in said summons. J. W. JONES.

The following letter was also read:

MY DEAR SIR: I must respectfully decline attending before the committee of the House of Representatives, at Washington, in relation to the affairs of Lawrence, Stone & Co., according to a copy of a summons I received from you in our office on the 27th instant, for reasons which my attorney advises me is sufficient to prevent me from leaving the city of New York.

Respectfully, yours, J. D. WILLIAMSON.
A. J. GLOSSBRENNER, Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives of the United States.

Mr. STANTON. I will simply state that this resolution follows strictly the precedent set in the case of Colonel Chester in the last Congress, and is abundantly sustained by authorities. I ask the previous question on its passage.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and, under the operation thereof, the resolution was agreed to.

THE NATIONAL ARMORIES.

Mr. FAULKNER. I now ask for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the consideration of House bill (No. 63) to supply an omission in the enrollment of a certain act therein named, which was postponed, to this day.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. Speaker, I should scarcely have deemed it necessary to say a word in explanation of this bill, but for the remark made by the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] the other day, that I need not expect this bill to pass without discussion. I shall, therefore, submit a brief explanation of the object of the bill.

In accordance with the settled policy of the Government, extending back as far as 1794, the Secretary of War, at the commencement of the last session of Congress, recommended the usual annual appropriation for the support of the national armories. The sum recommended was $360,000. It was a sum which, by the invariable usage of this Government, has been divided equally between the two national armories—the one situated at Springfield, in the North, and the other at Harper's Ferry, in the South. The Committee of Ways and Means reported this appropriation. It passed through the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union without any objection. It received the unanimous approval of the Senate and of the House of Representatives; and it was lost in transcribing the item from the engrossed to the enrolled bill.

The object, therefore, of this bill is simply to correct that omission of the Clerk; to do that which Congress intended to do, and which, I may say, Congress had, in fact, done, but for the inadvertence and omission of a ministerial agent of this House. The first week of the present session, a special communication was transmitted to this body from the Secretary of War, in which he calls the attention of Congress to that clerical omission, and urged the importance of immediate action to supply that omission. That communication was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It was considered by that Committee, and this bill is the result of the action of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Now, with this brief statement of the facts of this case, I should be justified in demanding the immediate passage of this law; and even, under ordinary circumstances, in calling the previous question. But I promised my colleagues on the Committee on Military Affairs that I would afford them an opportunity of making any objection which they might think proper to the passage of this bill. Therefore I will not call the previous question until they shall have had the opportunity of making any objections that may occur to them against the passage of this bill.

I will make one additional explanation before I take my seat. It has been asked, and will, no doubt, be asked again, what has become of the national armories since the 1st of July, 1857, the expiration of the last fiscal year? How have they been sustained?—by what authority, and under what law? I will answer these inquiries.

Shortly after the adjournment of last Congress, and as soon as this omission was discovered, the attention of the President of the United States was called to that state of facts. It was represented to him, and represented to him truly, that unless some arrangement, in strict conformity to law, could be devised by which the omission could be corrected, the manufacture of arms at those armories must cease after the first day of July following; these national establishments must be suspended, and corps of the most skillful and enterprising mechanics, selected with a great deal of care from various portions of the country, must be scattered, with the probability that many of them would never return. The President was fully advised of what was the will of Congress, as indicated in the proceedings which I have before recited. And the only question with him was, whether there existed, under his control and in conformity to law, any remedy for this state of things. He had a consultation with the Attorney General, and that distinguished law officer of the Government, by a written opinion filed in his Department, advised, that under the provisions and language of the act of 1808, it was competent for the President to direct that the appropriation of $200,000 for arming and equipping the militia of the States might be used for the purposes of the national armories.

I have a copy of that opinion in my possession. I have examined it, and I concur fully in the conclusion of the Attorney General. For, in truth, the act of 1808, making the standing appropriation of $200,000 for the arming and equipping of the militia of the States is, in fact, a power vested in the ordnance department, by which it may be applied either to the manufacture of arms or to supplying, by purchase, those arms to the militia. Acting on this opinion of the Attorney General, the President of the United States directed a temporary use of that fund—a temporary loan of it, I may say—to the national armories. So that, since the 1st of July, 1857, that fund has been thus temporarily applied to this purpose, in the expectation that Congress would, at the very earliest moment, correct this error made in the closing hour of the last session of Congress. If this law now passes, that fund will be replaced to its proper head of appropriation for arming and equipping the militia; and the legislation of this body will stand precisely as it would have stood if this error had not been committed by the enrolling clerk.

Now, if Congress had, by any act, indicated a purpose to discontinue the appropriations to the national armories, this course of proceeding would never have been resorted to. But in the face of the fact that Congress has indicated its clear purpose to make an appropriation; in face of the fact that the policy of sustaining these national workshops was cherished by the legislative branch of the Government with perfect unanimity, it became the absolute duty of the President to adopt some means, and especially if those means were in conformity to law, to apply the appropriate remedy.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I desire to inquire what is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is upon the engrossment of House bill No. 63.

Mr. FAULKNER. It may be asked whether the application of this fund does not to that extent diminish the necessity of the entire appropriation provided for in this bill. I state upon my examination of the question, as well as upon the information furnished by the Secretary of War, that the application of that fund does not diminish the necessity. I say, sir, that the only effect would be to diminish or withdraw from the States that fund, which under the policy of the act of 1808, has been applied annually in arming and equipping the militia of the States. That would be the effect of cutting down this appropriation.

Mr. Speaker, this is no party question and no sectional question. The fund appropriated by this bill is equally expended in the North and in the South; and the benefits derived from the appropriation are equally participated in by every portion of the United States. I am authorized by those intrusted by law with the management of these national armories to say, that no part of this appropriation can properly be dispensed with, and that if the appropriation be delayed longer it will work serious injury to the public service.

Mr. STANTON. I agree with the gentleman from Virginia, that this is certainly not a party or sectional question. It is merely a question of economy and necessity. But, sir, I think the gentleman from Virginia stated, when this bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, that it was with the distinct, express understanding that it was first with the view of facilitating its passage at as early a period as possible; and further, with the distinct understanding that the House was to be governed by information subsequently to be obtained from the War Department, in its policy in passing this bill.

Now, sir, I have received no information which has satisfied me that the whole amount of this appropriation ought to be granted. The state of the case, as I understand it, is briefly this: Congress annually appropriates to meet the expenses for the current fiscal year, $180,000 for the use of each of these national armories; and it also appropriates for this fiscal year $200,000 for the manufacture or purchase of arms and military equipments for the militia. These appropriations are for expenses to be distributed throughout the entire fiscal year. Two hundred thousand dollars is deemed necessary to be expended in furnishing arms to the militia of the States; and $360,000 is considered to be necessary to be expended through the entire fiscal year for the purpose of manufacturing arms at the national armories.

Now, sir, for the purpose of keeping the national armories in motion, the entire fund for arming and equipping the militia of the States has been transferred, and the arms for distribution among the States have been provided in another way. I do not understand that there is any necessity for replacing this $200,000 for the distribution of arms to the militia of the States. I understand that the arms for distribution have been already manufactured. It is not claimed at all that the entire $360,000 can be expended during the current fiscal year; nor can the $200,000 originally appropriated to supply arms for the militia, be expended in the residue of the fiscal year. The appropriations were originally made for the fiscal year, commencing July 1, 1857. Seven months of that fiscal year are already gone; the armories only need money enough to keep them in motion five months, to the end of the current year.

With this brief statement, sir, I desire to move an amendment. I desire to keep the national armories in operation, and that they shall not suffer from the failure of this appropriation. But, sir, I do not suppose the public service requires the restoration of this $200,000, for the manufacture of arms for the militia at all; nor do I suppose the entire $360,000 can be expended by the national armories in the five months remaining of this present fiscal year. I therefore move to strike out "$360,000" and insert "$180,000," giving to the armories for five months, what was contemplated by the last Congress to supply them for six months.

Mr. CHAFFEE. The gentleman from Ohio declares that his object is not to embarrass the national armories. Now, sir, the statement he has made has nothing to do with the passage of this bill. The bill is simply to supply an omission upon the part of the enrolling clerk at the last session, by which the appropriation intended for the use of the national armories could not be made available.

Now, sir, I have this morning received a letter from the superintendent of the national armory at Springfield, in which he informs me that the mechanics and manufacturers there have not been paid since November last. I appeal to gentlemen, therefore, if they do not desire to embarrass the armories, as a simple act of justice, that they shall pass this bill, and remedy the defect in enrolling the act of the last Congress. And, sir, I hope there will be nothing stricken out of the bill. These armories have been going on for the last six months without having received anything, and this appropriation cannot be longer delayed without injury to the service of the country.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that this bill ought not to pass. It is a bill, as the gentleman from Virginia has observed, which presents no party question. It is a bill, however, which does present a question of the powers of administration, and of the proper control of this House over the execution of the law. You have a law upon your statute-book which plainly lays down the manner in which sums of money appropriated by Congress shall be transferred from one point of service to supply another point of service, in the same department. As, for instance, transfers from the national armories to supply the militia, and vice versa; whenever such a transfer is made, the law requires that it shall be done upon the application of the head of a Department to the President of the United States, and that the President of the United States shall, upon his responsibility, make the transfer, and that the disposition made of the public money so appropriated by Congress shall, by a special message of the President of the United States, be accounted for to Congress within the first week of the next session.

The President of the United States, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] says, was fully advised of this operation which had been performed with this appropriation. I should like to have some further evidence of that fact; for if so, it was the duty of the President of the United States to have complied with that law, and to have advised us of the disposition of that public money within the first week of this session. But up to this time the President of the United States has been entirely silent upon this subject. Sir, this transfer is not put upon the ground of a diversion from one branch of the public service to another in the same Department, and I venture to say that, the President of the United States has never made an official determination upon the subject at all. This thing, sir, has been managed between Colonel Craig, the head of the ordnance bureau, and the Attorney General. So far from its being a diversion from one branch of the public service to another, Colonel Craig applied to the Attorney General to know how he could do this thing, and the Attorney General replies, in a letter which I have before me, that there was no necessity to direct the appropriation from one branch of the public service to another; that there is an appropriation of $200,000 for providing arms and equipments for the whole body of the militia, either by purchase or manufacture by or on account of the United States, and that this sum of $200,000 may certainly be used in the manufacture of arms at the national armories until it be exhausted.

This ordnance bureau, then, goes on and manufactures arms, under the opinion of the Attorney General, at the national armories; and now he wants to get the whole appropriation of $360,000; for what? That, forsooth, he may retransfer to the head of the "militia" the $200,000 he has drawn from that appropriation and disbursed in another quarter. Sir, if he gets the $200,000 back, he cannot legally retransfer it; and, instead of your having $360,000, which was the original appropriation, you will have $560,000 to put into these armories. If you intend to override the law; if you intend to allow the head of the ordnance bureau, or the head of any other bureau of the Government, when the Congress of the United States has made an appropriation for a particular purpose, to use that appropriation in any branch of the public service they choose, and then come here and ask you to reappropriate it, in order that they may retransfer and adjust the balance to suit their own caprices, and their views of public advantage, we might as well resolve ourselves into an auditing committee for the various bureaus of this Government.

I am opposed to it, because it has been the policy of the Congress of the United States to hold these Executive Departments, in the disposition of the public money, to an observance of the objects of the appropriations which the representatives of the people in Congress have determined upon. If you let go of this proper responsibility upon your part, and leave it to the Executive Departments upon their part, you let go the lines of legislation which are, by the States, intrusted to your hands, and you need not complain if losses occur, or if this Congress resolves itself into a mere executive department to audit the accounts of the heads of bureaus.

The gentleman from Virginia says he wants this $200,000 in order to reimburse the appropriation which was intended for the distribution of arms and military equipments among the States. How is it to be legally resupplied? If we vote this $360,000, how is it to be done? Colonel Craig has applied $200,000 designed for that purpose, as he might well have done under the opinion of the Attorney General, to keep the national armories at work. In other words, he has applied that sum to the manufacture of arms instead of to their distribution. They come now, however, and ask for $360,000 to be given for these armories, which is all we intended to give them last year. If they get it, Colonel Craig cannot retransfer the money without a violation of law. If you make the appropriation, then, the armories, having spent $200,000, will have still $360,000 to spend. That, sir, is the whole case. Therefore I object to the passage of this bill. I do not object to the passage of this bill as proposed to be amended by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON,] because that will give the armories at Springfield and Harper's Ferry $180,000 instead of $360,000—that is, $180,000 in addition to the $200,000 which they already have, and will leave a deficit of $200,000 in the appropriation for the supply of arms and military equipments to the States, which deficit you may resupply. If you choose to make an appropriation, make it in the right way. Put the $200,000 back, not to the armory, but to the militia fund for the distribution of arms among the several States. There is no use to argue a proposition so plain as this.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is this $200,000 for the distribution of arms for the use of the militia a separate and distinct appropriation from the appropriation of $360,000 for the national armories?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Yes, sir. The appropriation of $360,000 was for the purpose of carrying on the manufacture of arms at the armories; and then, under a distinct head, $200,000 was appropriated to distribute or manufacture arms for the militia. The language of the statute was "for the purchase or manufacture." Well, the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in enrolling the bill, left out the appropriation of $360,000. Congress adjourned. There was nothing with which to carry on the work at those armories. The $360,000 appropriation was missing. There was no law for it. The head of the ordnance department called upon the Attorney General to know whether he could transfer the militia appropriation to the armory appropriation. The Attorney General replied to him that he could not transfer an appropriation from one branch of the expenditures of the department to another, except in certain cases, and that it must be done upon the responsibility of the President—the law providing for the report of the President to Congress as to the manner in which the appropriation had been expended. He said, however, that there was no necessity for making the transfer, in order to prevent the armories from being stopped by the accidental omission of the appropriation, for that there was an appropriation of $200,000 for providing arms and equipments for the whole body of the militia, either by purchase or manufacture, and he might take the $200,000 and go on and manufacture arms at the armories; he would thus be applying the appropriation as he was allowed by law to apply it. Well, sir, the money has been so applied; and now they come here and ask us to give to the armories $360,000 after there has been already expended on the armories $200,000; and it does not require much arithmetic to show that that will be an appropriation of $560,000 to the armories, while you cut off the militia entirely. Ah, but (says the gentleman from Virginia) it was intended only as a temporary loan, and we intend to give it back to the militia. Then, sir, if that be so, let us make the appropriation according to law, and let us teach the head of the ordnance bureau, the Secretary of War, and everybody else who is in the Executive Departments, that they have no authority to retransfer appropriations. If there has been a substantial diversion of the fund that we have already appropriated, let us make the appropriation of $200,000 ourselves, under the proper head, and stop this confusion in the Executive Departments, which begets looseness in the management of the accounts of the Government, and let us teach our executive officers that when Congress makes an appropriation they may not use it at their own will and pleasure.

Mr. CURTIS. The gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Virginia have both fairly explained the question now before the House. In the Army appropriation bill of the last Congress there was an appropriation of $200,000 to supply the militia with arms; but the appropriation for the manufacture of arms at the armories was omitted, and the omission has been supplied by a transfer from the appropriation for furnishing arms to the militia to the head of manufacturing arms. I concur with the gentleman from Kentucky that there was no propriety in that transfer in the manner in which it has been done.

Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE. I would inquire of the gentleman if there was any law for it?

Mr. CURTIS. There is a law for it; but that law, as the gentleman from Kentucky has shown, has not been complied with. The officers of the Government have not carried out the law technically, and the President has not reported. It is true, that the Attorney General has decided that no such transfer was necessary. I do not concur with the Attorney General, nor does the gentleman from Kentucky. I think the Attorney General was mistaken in supposing that the manufacture of arms and the furnishing of arms were so assimilated that an appropriation, made for the one object, could be applied to the other. If such was the intention of Congress, why have separate appropriations always been made—one for the manufacture and one for the supply of arms?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The gentleman is mistaken in my view of the law. The law provides for the furnishing of arms and equipments to the whole body of the militia, either by purchase or manufacture, by and on account of the United States. I do not hold that the opinion of the Attorney General is wrong. On the contrary, I think that it is right. But, as the ordnance bureau has applied the $200,000 for providing arms for the militia to the manufacture of arms at the armories, and has exhausted that appropriation for the relief of the armories, if we now appropriate $360,000 in addition to that, we shall have appropriated $560,000 to the armories.

Mr. CURTIS. I understand the gentleman's position; but I deny that the distribution of arms among the militia could be legitimately and properly applied to the manufacture of arms, because it has always been the custom to separate those different items; and although the words "manufacture or purchase" are used, it was not intended that the appropriation of $200,000 for furnishing the militia should go to the manufacture of arms at the armories; because, if so, why make a distinction in the appropriations? But why should we trouble ourselves about the matter? The ordnance department report distinctly that the purpose is to retransfer the $200,000 immediately after this appropriation is made, for the purpose of manufacturing arms. The $200,000, we have the assurance of the Department, will be devoted to the furnishing of arms to the militia. The bill is now before us. It has been delayed until this period of the session, and it is time that it was passed. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CHAFFEE] has shown that the money is now needed to pay the men employed in the armories.

There is no harm to grow out of the passage of this bill; but justice will be done by it, because the transfer will be made immediately on the books of the department back to the supply fund, and then the accounts will be right. While I object to the original movement in the department, I concur in the propriety of this mode of correcting it. No harm or injustice can grow out of it. The funds will be properly arranged in the department. Therefore, I am in favor of the bill, and hope it will pass, because it is time it should be passed. The object of the misapplication was a good one. It was to prevent the throwing out of employment of a vast number of hands engaged in those armories. The object was, therefore, a good one, and the officers were acting right, under that opinion of the Attorney General. This bill is only to supply this error of the last Congress, and I hope it will be now passed by the House.

Mr. STANTON. I understood the gentleman from Iowa to intimate that he disapproved of the manner in which this fund has been transferred. If so, then I would inquire of him whether he does not regard it as being the duty of this House, if that fund is to be replaced, to make an appropriation in name, as an appropriation for the distribution of arms to the militia, and that the appropriation in this bill be limited to the amount necessary to keep the armories for the rest of the year? I submit that we are surrendering the prerogative of Congress, if we permit this illegal transfer.

Mr. CURTIS. The opinion of the Attorney General is, of course, worthy of more consideration by this House than is my opinion. He says it is right. I still am of the opinion that he may be wrong; but I submit that, if the officers of the Government have erred, we should visit the consequences of the error upon the officers themselves, and not on the persons engaged in those armories. They should not be left with their wages unpaid. If the transfer of the fund has been improperly made, we can do nothing more than we now do by our voices—express our disapproval of that act and of the course pursued by the Department. By the passage of this bill, justice will be rendered to those individuals who are now deprived of their pay; they will receive their wages; and the fund, so temporarily misapplied, will be restored to its proper object. If there has been any error, it has occurred in the Department, and our expression of opinion should be sufficient to prevent its repetition.

Mr. HUGHES called for the previous question, and demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, and CRAIG, of North Carolina, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 78, noes 51.

So the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, which was on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. FAULKNER. Have I a right, having reported the bill, to speak to it now?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman is entitled to his hour.

Mr. FAULKNER. I propose to occupy for a short time the attention of the House, in replying to some of the objections which have been urged against the passage of this bill. I desire, in the first place, to correct what might have left an improper impression upon the part of the House.

Mr. STANTON. I rise to a question of order. The previous question has been seconded; and as the bill has never been discussed in Committee of the Whole, and I do not understand it to be the privilege of the chairman of the standing committee in the House to occupy the time of the House for an hour in closing the debate. I understand that he is entitled to that privilege only when the bill has been considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman from Virginia is entitled to his hour to close the debate upon the bill. The gentleman from Virginia has not availed himself of the privilege of closing debate in committee; and the Chair is of opinion, that the debate having been ordered to be closed, the gentleman reporting the bill is entitled to an hour to close debate.

Mr. STANTON. I ask the Chair to have the rule read.

The first clause of the 34th rule was read, as follows:

"No member shall occupy more than one hour in debate on any question in the House or in committee; but a member reporting the measure under consideration from a committee, may open and close the debate."

Mr. STANTON. I withdraw my question of order.

Mr. FAULKNER. I shall not occupy the time of the House for more than a few minutes in reply to the objections which have been urged against this bill. And I will first notice the remark which fell from the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON,] which might leave the impression upon the mind of members, that all the information necessary to throw light upon this subject was not before the House. It is true, sir, that this information was not before the Committee on Military Affairs when they first acted on the subject. But, sir, the special report of the head of the ordnance department, sent in at a subsequent day, was read to the committee, and will be laid before the House before I have concluded my remarks. It proceeds to state that this entire sum is necessary to carry on the national armories. The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] in the comments which he has made upon this bill, has manifestly fallen into an error; and he has confounded this proceeding with the system of transfers originally authorized by the act of 1809, but which has since been repealed by Congress.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I beg the gentleman's pardon, I have fallen into no such error.

Mr. FAULKNER. The gentleman spoke of the President making a report during the first week of a Congress.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. If the gentleman will indulge me, I will correct him. I will show that I have not fallen into an error. There has been no transfer; but this has been a legal appropriation. According to the opinion of the Attorney General, the $200,000 which has been used in your national armories for the manufacture of arms was a legal appropriation; and therefore you do not want this $360,000 to supply the arms which are annually distributed to the States. And I submit, further, that if you propose to make this appropriation for the purpose of giving it that direction, there is no power to transfer it, as they propose.

Mr. FAULKNER. The gentleman then concedes that this was not a transfer?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. FAULKNER. Under the act of 1809, a transfer of an appropriation to another object than that for which it was originally intended was the final and absolute disposition of the fund. It was a system then commenced, but which was leading to the most dangerous consequences. It has since been repealed; and is not now allowed in any Department of the Government at all, except in a few specified cases. It is conceded that the action of the ordnance bureau, under these circumstances, in making this application of this fund, was legal. It was done under the authority of the Attorney General. If I understand the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] he does not himself question the legality of the act by which this fund was appropriated for the manufacture of arms.

Now, sir, in reference to this act of 1808, by which the ordnance department is authorized to use $200,000 per annum to arm and equip the militia of the States, it will be seen by that law, that it has power to apply that fund either to the purchase of arms and equipments or to their manufacture. But the mistake which gentlemen have manifestly fallen into on this subject, consists in the idea that these arms and military equipments are to be manufactured at the national armories. Why, sir, I will state, that but a small portion of the distribution of arms and equipments which takes place under authority of that law, consists of rifles or muskets. Under the law, the Government is to furnish such arms or equipments as the States themselves may demand. Some of them call for cannon, some for swords, some for powder, and some percussion caps—but all comes out of that $200,000, appropriated for arming and equipping the militia of the States.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question: I understand the object this bill has in view is to appropriate a sum of money sufficient to replace another appropriation which has been transferred from its regular head of appropriation. Now, I desire to ask the gentleman the condition of the fund which was so transferred by the War Department or its officers. Is there not now an unexpended surplus remaining under that head of appropriation, so that if this bill should not pass there would be no injury done to the cause for which it was originally appropriated. I know, or at least it is my opinion, that heretofore it has been true that under the head of appropriation from which this money was taken there has usually been a large surplus unexpended, which goes over from year to year.

Mr. FAULKNER. I am aware of no such unexpended balance.

Mr. HOUSTON. Have you looked to it?

Mr. FAULKNER. I have not; but I am assured by the head of the War Department, and by the ordnance department, that they have temporarily applied as much of the militia fund as could be spared for that purpose. What was the condition in which this matter was presented before? Here was a regular appropriation by Congress of $360,000 for the national armories, sanctioned by both branches of Congress, and defeated alone by the misfeasance or malfeasance of one of the officers of this House. What was the duty of the President of the United States under the circumstances? Was he to permit these national establishments, rendered necessary by your policy for the last sixty years, to be abandoned, the manufacture of arms to be suspended, and a corps of mechanics of the most skillful and enterprising character, which has been obtained from every part of the United States, to be disbanded, never, perhaps, to return again? There was no course left to him but to see if there was not some arrangement, reconcilable to law, by which a fund could be applied temporarily until Congress could properly repair the wrong.

On an examination of that question, what was ascertained? That the act of 1808 could be so construed, and in fact that the very object of that act was, an appropriation, to a certain extent, to the national armories; because the proper department had by that act the power to supply the militia of the United States either by purchase or manufacture. It was found by the Attorney General, that this fund could be temporarily so applied during the recess of Congress. The legality of this act is not doubted. The necessity that compelled its exercise is not questioned. Then what is the difficulty that gentlemen conjure up in regard to it? They tell us if we are permitted now to have $360,000, it will make the sum of $560,000 applied to the manufacture of arms. I say it will have no such effect whatever, unless you propose to withdraw that appropriation, which for the last fifty years has been sanctioned by the policy of this Government, of applying $200,000 for the arming and equipping of the militia of the States. It is but a temporary loan, so to speak, under the authority of law, from one branch of the public service to another, to be replaced so soon as this appropriation is passed.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. FAULKNER. Certainly.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Does the gentleman from Virginia say to the House that if this money is appropriated now to these armories, that the head of the ordnance bureau will have the right to repay the loan of which he speaks?

Mr. FAULKNER. I have not the slightest question about it—not only that he has the power to do so, but that it will, in fact, immediately be so applied. There still exists the obligation of this Department to supply the militia of the States with arms and military equipments, which obligation cannot otherwise be fulfilled.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. It is exactly at that point that the whole pressure comes. My position is that he not only has no such authority, but that an attempt by him to do it would be a violation of law.

Mr. FAULKNER. There I differ with the gentleman from Kentucky. I see no difficulty upon the subject. Here is a fund which the gentleman himself concedes may be legally applied for the purpose to which it has been applied.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I certainly say that the ordnance bureau might have applied it to the manufacture of arms legally, and that if he did apply it legally, nobody has a right to complain. But, then, there is no necessity for the loan. If it was not a loan, it was a legal appropriation of a sum given by Congress, and when reappropriated it cannot be retransferred. I call the attention of the gentleman to what Colonel Craig says in this letter:

"The national armories were supplied from the 1st of July, 1857, to January 1st, 1858, from the fund for arming and equipping the militia."

That it was a proper investment of the militia fund, the gentleman and I agree. But, I ask the gentleman whether he is willing to say to the House that if we do appropriate the $200,000, it is to be spent between this time and the 30th of June next in distributing arms to the militia? because the effect of that will be that we will have given to that fund $400,000, and not $200,000; or we will give to the armories $560,000, and not $360,000.

Mr. FAULKNER. I say, upon the authority of the head of the ordnance department, that it will be replaced to the extent that fund has been temporarily used for the manufacture of arms; and no doubt it will be applied, between this time and the 1st of July next, to carry out the policy of the law, in distributing arms and military equipments among the States. That is the inevitable result which must follow the requirement of law. Here stands the obligation on the part of the ordnance department to apply $200,000 to the distribution of arms and equipments to the States. The gentleman says he concedes that, under the law of 1808, the head of the ordnance department has the power to apply this fund temporarily as it has been applied. But how does he get over the obligation of distributing $200,000 among the States, in the form of arms and military equipments? That obligation must be complied with. It is not superseded by the temporary use of this fund for the manufacture of arms. That is a right vested in the States, and which they have the right to call upon this Government, under the act of 1808, to perform in furnishing them their quota of arms and military equipments. You cannot fulfill that obligation only by replacing this fund, and applying it to furnishing the States with arms and military equipments.

What would be the effect, supposing the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio should prevail? Would it affect the national armories? No; its effect would be to withdraw the power from the Secretary of War to distribute arms and military equipments among the States. He only made a temporary use of that fund, taking it for granted that Congress, at its first session, would enable him to comply with the law of 1808, for distributing arms and military equipments among the States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, an impression may prevail that this whole sum of $200,000 has been applied to the manufacture of arms since the 1st of July, 1857. I learn from the ordnance department that not more than $100,000 has been applied for that purpose. They speak, it is true, of this fund as a fund of $200,000; but they do not say that the whole amount has been applied.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Then if it has not been applied, it remains in their hands.

Mr. FAULKNER. They have no right to touch it, except under an emergency. During the recess of Congress, when your national workshops would have been broken up if the Department had not resorted to this arrangement, they were justified, under the opinion of the Attorney General, in doing it. But now when you have the power to correct the wrong, when you can apply the remedy, it would not be proper for them to be using the fund longer in that way.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The difference between the gentleman and myself is this: I say, with the Attorney General, they were authorized by law to do what they did. I say, as against the gentleman, that they were not authorized by any emergency at all; they had a legal right to do it; and no emergency without law could have justified it.

Mr. FAULKNER. It is true the emergency could not of itself have justified it; but the militia appropriation was susceptible of a construction by which it might be applied to the manufacture of arms. Inasmuch, however, as the universal usage of the country has been to gratify the States by giving them a description of military equipments not made at the national armories, it would be impossible for the ordnance department to carry out the policy of the country in the distribution of such arms and military equipments as they desired, unless they applied that fund to other purposes than the manufacture of arms at the national armories.

Mr. PHELPS. I desire to ascertain if I understand the question correctly. If I understand it the $200,000 of permanent appropriation by the act of 1808 has been applied in part for the manufacture of arms for the purpose of supplying the militia of the country. If I understand the gentleman from Kentucky, he claims that that was a misapplication of that permanent appropriation.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. No, sir, I do not. On the contrary, I say that it might very well be done under the law. I merely want to correct the gentleman from Missouri. He seems to be under the impression that I think that this was a misapplication of the fund. Not so. I have said, certainly for the third time, that under the opinion of the Attorney General, it was a proper application of the fund. But I say that if the fund of $200,000 has been exhausted in manufacturing arms for the militia, then they do not want the $360,000; and if we supply the $200,000 that has been spent, we ought not to supply it to the fund that the gentleman from Virginia wants to carry it to, but to the fund from which it has been taken.

Mr. PHELPS. I suppose that only a portion of the $200,000 has been applied to the manufacture of arms.

Mr. FAULKNER. Only a portion.

Mr. PHELPS. How much?

Mr. FAULKNER. About one hundred thousand dollars, as I learn.

Mr. PHELPS. Only about one hundred thousand dollars. Well, sir, the Executive had clearly a right to direct arms to be manufactured at the national armories for distribution to the militia. Whether those armories can expend $360,000, in addition to the $100,000 which they have already expended, is a matter about which I am not advised; but I presume that the Committee on Military Affairs would not have recommended this appropriation to supply the omission in the Army appropriation of last session, unless they had been satisfied that the amount could be economically expended in the manufacture of arms at these armories. Certain it is, that the committee of which I was a member at the last Congress did recommend the House to appropriate $360,000, and it went through all the forms of legislation except being enrolled and signed by the President. The Committee of Ways and Means of the last Congress thought that the amount was necessary.

Mr. STANTON. If the gentleman from Virginia will permit me, I desire to correct a misapprehension. The report of the Committee on Military Affairs is no expression of opinion about the wants of the armories in regard to this appropriation. They express no opinion upon the subject. The members of the committee expressly reserved the right to make up their opinions from information subsequently to be obtained.

Mr. PHELPS. What did the committee consider—the bill?

Mr. SEWARD. I object to this transferring the floor.

Mr. FAULKNER. The conclusion of the gentleman from Missouri is correct. The Committee on Military Affairs agreed to report the bill, but the right was reserved to each member of the committee to modify his opinion or action upon information which might be subsequently given to him, and to urge any objections to the bill before the House. But as a military question there was no difference of opinion; and the committee did give its assent to it, subject to the qualifications before stated.

Mr. STANTON. I desire to ask the gentleman a question, in order that we may understand each other. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Military Committee, in reporting this bill, expressed the opinion that more than $360,000 could be profitably expended at the armories during the fiscal year?

Mr. FAULKNER. I do not know that it did. Every gentleman was at liberty, as I remarked, upon full information derivable from the ordnance department, but not then before the committee, to modify his opinion and course in the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kentucky could not be more opposed than I am to the exercise, by the Executive Departments of this Government, of anything like an improper discretion in the matter of appropriations. I concur in the wisdom of that policy recently adopted, by which the right of transfer authorized under the law of 1809 has been in a great measure repealed; but no such principle is involved in this proceeding—none whatever. It is conceded that here was a fund that the ordnance department could, with propriety, resort to temporarily during the recess of Congress for the support of the national armories. It has been so applied. It was so applied with the distinct understanding that the fund was to be replaced for the benefit of the militia of the States as soon as this bill should pass. Where is the wrong? Where is the harm done? Where is the invasion of any prerogative of Congress? I can see none. I ask, in conclusion, that the letter from the head of the ordnance bureau be read to the House.

The letter was read, as follows:

ORDNANCE OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, January 16, 1858.

SIR: In answer to the interrogatories in the Hon. C. J. FAULKNER's letter of this date, referred to this office, I have the honor, in compliance with your directions, to report:

1. The national armories were supplied from July 1, 1857, to January 1, 1858, from the fund for arming and equipping the militia.

2. The use of that fund was only a temporary expedient to avoid the evil consequences of the clerical error of omitting to copy the item appropriating for the national armories, in the enrolled bill; which error it was not doubted that Congress would correct at its next session. Such use of the militia fund, although not contrary to law, is a diversion of it from more appropriate purposes, and the amount so used should be returned to be applied to such purposes. The necessity for the usual appropriation for one year's service is not diminished, because so much of the militia fund as has been temporarily used should be refunded, and the residue will not be more than sufficient to carry on operations at the armories for the rest of the fiscal year.

3. The full sum of $360,000 for the national armories is now required, and no portion of it can be dispensed with, and the policy of the Government be carried out in respect to the operations of the armories, and the arming and equipping of the militia of the several States and Territories.

The letter of the Hon. C. J. FAULKNER is returned herewith.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. K. CRAIG, Colonel of Ordnance.

Hon. JOHN B. FLOYD, Secretary of War.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Virginia to the point to which I called it a few moments ago. It seems to me that he himself will agree that there is a part of this appropriation which can be dispensed with. When I asked him the question a few moments since, I was of the opinion that any balance that might remain unexpended at the end of each fiscal year, of the appropriation for arming and equipping the militia of the States, would be retained to be used in another year. I am not quite certain, on reflection, whether I am right in that; yet I think I am. Still I may be mistaken. But there is this point in the case: I find, on looking at the receipts and expenditures under that head of arming and equipping the militia, that for the year 1855 the Government expended but $180,000, and for the year 1856 but $150,000; so that it seems to me, on the spur of the occasion, from the information we have, that the Government has never expended the entire $200,000, and that it is unnecessary for us to reappropriate money for the purpose of refunding the amount of $100,000 borrowed from that fund. So that, according to the gentleman's own argument, if I am right in the information—and I think I am—the appropriation in his bill can be reduced at least $100,000; and my own opinion is, that it can be reduced much further.

Mr. FAULKNER. In reply to the gentleman from Alabama, I can say that I have never, in connection with this bill, looked into or deemed it necessary to look into the fact of whether there may have been any unexpended balances to the credit of the appropriation for arming and equipping the militia. All that we could do, and all that we could be expected to do, was to borrow temporarily from that fund an amount sufficient to keep up these armories during the recess of Congress. If there are unexpended balances to the credit of the fund for arming and equipping the militia, let the Committee of Ways and Means look to that in their next appropriation. It is a matter that has no just connection with the appropriation for the national armories. The gentleman will hardly contend that there are any unexpended balances of the appropriations for the national armories. That is the only question that we have to do with on this occasion. We have nothing to do now with the fund for arming and equipping the militia, except so far as to exhibit the fact, that a temporary loan, so to speak, was made from that fund during the recess of Congress for the manufacture of arms.

Mr. CURTIS. If there be a surplus, that will go to the reduction of the next appropriation.

Mr. FAULKNER. It would be well for the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] to call the attention of the Committee of Ways and Means to those balances when they are reporting their next appropriation for arming and equipping the militia. It has nothing to do with the bill now before Congress. This bill is to supply an omission in the Army appropriation bill of the item for the manufacture of arms. There is no unexpended balance to the credit of that fund. And why does the gentleman from Alabama seek to perplex and mystify this bill by talking about unexpended balances of the fund for arming and equipping the militia with which we have nothing to do, and which has no connection whatever with this bill?

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman is very much mistaken. If I have mystified the question, it is my misfortune. But if the fund for arming and equipping the militia does not need the return of this money, I should like to know why we should make an appropriation for it while we are borrowing money so extensively? If the fund for arming and equipping the militia is ample, and we have a right to infer that it is from the condition of the receipts and expenditures to which I have referred, it seems to me that there is no use in reappropriating money for this purpose.

Mr. FAULKNER. I see no force in the reasoning of the gentleman from Alabama. We are here on behalf of the armories, asking only our own. We are asking simply for that appropriation which Congress sanctioned, and which was defeated by the negligence of a clerk of your body. If we have borrowed from the militia fund during the recess of Congress, it was only a temporary loan. It is no less our obligation to refund what we have borrowed, even though there be the balances before stated. The only duty that devolves on Congress in connection with these balances, is to reduce the next appropriation for that purpose.

The question being on Mr. STANTON's amendment,

Mr. STANTON demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. STANTON, and WRIGHT of Georgia, were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 86, noes 105.

Mr. KELSEY demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 86, nays 105; as follows:

C. Washburn, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, and John V. Wright—105.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. WINSLOW stated that his colleague, Mr. BRANCH, was detained from the House by sickness.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. FAULKNER demanded the previous question upon its passage.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered to be put; and, under the operation thereof, the bill passed.

Mr. FAULKNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

DIRECT TAXATION, ETC.

Mr. BOYCE asked unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of seven be appointed, to which it shall be referred to inquire into and report on the following subjects: a reduction of the expenditures of the Government; the navigation laws of the United States; the existing duties on imports, and the expediency of a gradual repeal of all the duties on imports, and a resort exclusively to internal taxation.

Mr. TOMPKINS objected.

Mr. BOYCE moved to suspend the rules.

The question was taken, and the rules were suspended—ayes 104, noes 51.

Mr. BOYCE moved the previous question upon the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. BOYCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider lie on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. PHELPS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the bill which the committee had under consideration on Friday last.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his motion for a moment, to enable me to offer a resolution to which there will be no objection.

Mr. PHELPS. I prefer to allow the motion to take its usual course.

Mr. SEWARD. Is it in order to move to lay that motion on the table?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. SEWARD. Then, sir, I shall not make the motion. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARREN. I appeal to the gentleman from Missouri to withdraw his motion for a moment, to allow me to offer a resolution. This is the only day on which resolutions can be offered except by unanimous consent.

Mr. PHELPS. I decline to accede to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. WARREN. Then I hope the House will vote down the motion. I demand the yeas and nays. I do it with a view to get an opportunity to offer my resolution.

The yeas and nays were refused.

Mr. SEWARD. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The motion of Mr. PHELPS was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the printing deficiency bill, the pending question being on a point of order raised by Mr. GROW.

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. WARREN. I demand tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SEWARD. Well, sir, I give notice that I shall renew the motion every little while.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is, that pending an amendment to an original bill, and an amendment to the amendment, it is in order to go back to the original bill, and perfect any portion of that bill which is proposed to be stricken out before the question is taken upon striking out. The Chair overrules the point of order. The Chair understands that no appeal is taken.

Mr. GROW. There was an appeal taken on Friday upon the same point, and the decision of the Chair was sustained. I therefore do not take an appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The question then is upon the amendment to the amendment, offered by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. CRAWFORD.]

Mr. PHELPS. I desire to have the amendment read.

The amendment offered by Mr. BURNETT to the original bill was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "Congresses" in the seventh line to the end of the bill, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

The sum of $420,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment of Mr. CRAWFORD to the amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the tenth line, and insert the following:

To pay for paper, $104,000.

To pay for the printing ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives during the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, $47,619 94.

To pay for the binding, lithographing, and engraving, ordered by the Senate during the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, $164,569 64.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Public Printer is hereby instructed and required not to print any further "reports of the results of the United States naval astronomical expedition to the southern hemisphere," nor "of the explorations and surveys to ascertain the most practicable route for a railroad from the Mississippi river to the Pacific ocean," nor "of the United States commission to survey a boundary line between the United States and the Republic of Mexico," other than such reports of each as may be now written and in his hands for publication.

Mr. NICHOLS. Is the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia open to amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. NICHOLS. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers were ordered on Friday on the amendment to the amendment.

Messrs. SMITH of Tennessee, and DEAN were appointed tellers.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 72.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon Mr. BURNETT's amendment.

Mr. WARREN. As there is no probability that a vote will be had upon this amendment, and as this is the day set apart by the rules for the introduction of bills and resolutions from the different States, I move that the committee rise, in order that we may have an opportunity of presenting bills and resolutions.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SANDIDGE. Is it in order now to offer an amendment to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. SANDIDGE. Then, sir, I offer the following as an amendment to the amendment:

Provided, That no portion of the moneys hereby appropriated shall be drawn from the Treasury to pay for any work or printing ordered by the Thirty-Third or Thirty-Fourth Congresses, where specific contracts have not already been entered into, under authority of law; and that the execution of all laws or resolutions of either or both Houses of the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, ordering the publication of any book of explorations, observations, or surveys, shall be suspended, where the manuscript copy is not in the hands of the proper officer, and a legal contract made for the publication.

Mr. Chairman, I take it for granted that this House does not, by its action, intend to set aside any contracts that may have been entered into in compliance with laws heretofore passed. I intended, sir, to have offered this proviso to the original bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. I hope this committee will vote down the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, and then, no matter what amount of money may be appropriated by this bill, under the proviso which I have just offered, if sanctioned by the House, not one dollar can be drawn from the Treasury unless it is done in accordance with laws previously enacted by Congress, and carried out by the officers of this House and of the Government.

Presuming that the House will, in good faith, appropriate a sufficient amount of money to pay all contracts legally entered into, I have merely offered this proviso to stop at that point all orders given by the House for the further publication of any books of explorations or surveys. I think, sir, that will meet the views of every gentleman here; and I hope the committee will vote down the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, and adopt the proviso which I offer.

Mr. BURNETT. I hope the House will not vote down my amendment; and why? For the simple reason that the amendment covers every dollar, as we learn from one at least of the members of the Committee of Ways and Means, which this Government owes for printing, engraving, and lithographing.

Mr. SEWARD. I insist on the enforcement of the rule which requires the gentleman to confine his remarks to opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BURNETT. I will do so, sir. The amendment which has just been voted down by the House contained the amount of $316,189 and some cents. We learn from the Committee of Ways and Means, or at least from a member of that committee, that that includes every dollar which is due and owing by the Government as a deficiency for work which has already been done by the parties with whom we have made contracts. Now, I differ with the gentleman who offered that amendment, in this: My calculation, making the amount $420,000, is based on the fact that a portion of the additional work has been already commenced. My amendment provides for that, and the $420,000 covers it.

Now, I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. SANDIDGE;] and why? Because it is, in my judgment, a proviso which is unnecessary, and which ought not to be added to this deficiency bill. But if the committee will vote for my amendment, the $420,000 will pay for all the work already done and for that which has been commenced, and thus we shall cover the whole amount due, and stop this thing.

The gentleman from Louisiana remarks that this House is not prepared to set aside any contract that has been made. Nor am I, sir; but you may take every resolution which has been adopted by the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, ordering the publication of these books, and you will not find one solitary resolution that ever contemplated, or by any sort of construction can be made to authorize, the publication of anything but what was written and prepared at the time.

Mr. SANDIDGE. Allow me to ask a question.

Mr. BURNETT. I have only five minutes and cannot be interrupted. Not only is the fact as I have stated it; but I state this as a correct position, that all certificates issued by the Superintendent of Public Printing, based upon work done by the Public Printer, which has been prepared by the authors of the various publications since the resolutions authorizing those publications passed the House, are in direct conflict with the law upon the subject, wholly unauthorized, and that this Congress is not bound to pay them.

Mr. QUITMAN. I should like to make an inquiry.

Mr. BURNETT. I will yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. QUITMAN. The inquiry that I desire to make is, whether without the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDIDGE] the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BURNETT] will stop the execution of these unfinished works?

Mr. BURNETT. I hold that the Superintendent of Public Printing is bound, by the law of 1852, to enter on the books of his office the manuscript furnished; and that, when it appears that the manuscript was furnished subsequent to the date of the resolution passed by Congress, he has it published at his own risk, and the printer who does the work does it at his own risk; and Congress is not compelled to pay for it. If this is done, let us refuse to appropriate money to pay it; and in this way we will reach the evil.

The question was taken on Mr. SANDIDGE's amendment; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BURNETT] by increasing the appropriation $100,000. I do so for the purpose of making a few remarks, because I see here that some gentlemen are very much mistaken in regard to the obligations of the Government growing out of the various resolutions that have been heretofore passed on the subject of public printing. It will be conceded by every member of the House that when any officer of this Government has made a contract under these resolutions, which contract would be in the line of his duty, although he may have committed fraud—

Mr. SEWARD. I insist on the gentleman confining his remarks to the amendment.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I intend to do so, because I contend that the appropriation is too small. Every contract that has been entered into by an officer of the Government, this Government is legally bound to pay. If the Superintendent of Public Printing has made contracts for engraving, for lithographing, for plates, or for anything else in the line of his duty, under the orders of this House, we are bound to observe them, and we can no more refuse payment under them than we can refuse payment of our honest private debts.

Moreover, suppose we do refuse payment; suppose we say that there has been fraud in the office of the Superintendent of Public Printing; suppose we say that Congress ordered too many of these works, and refuse to pay the money contracted to be paid by the officers of the Government; what is the consequence? Every man whose contract is not carried out by us will come before us for the next ten years, and we will have to make appropriations to pay damages to those men, to which they would be justly entitled. Why not, then, appropriate a sufficient amount of money in this bill to pay for all the expenses incurred under the orders of this House, although an officer of the Government may have exceeded his authority or his duty? We are bound to do it, and cannot refuse doing it.

But gentlemen say there was no manuscript copy of these volumes furnished to the House of Representatives. Why these very gentlemen have been receiving these volumes from time to time, until they have run up to three, four, five, six, and even eight volumes, and not one word has ever been said about it, till the meeting of Congress, when the clamor was raised in reference to the public printing. I am glad to see that that clamor was raised which called the attention of the House to this subject. I voted against these resolutions for the publication of these books; but I would as soon repudiate my honest debts as repudiate any contract made by an officer of the Government in the execution of the careless orders made by this House. I am opposed to this extravagant mode of ordering printing by this House. I am not in favor of making Congress a book concern. I am not in favor of ordering these men to write histories of the country, and to illustrate them with lizards and crows, and all those engravings. But as we have ordered the work to be done, as the obligations have been contracted, under which we are bound to pay, let us pass the bill, and let these accounts undergo the scrutiny of the Treasury Department. When they pay them, my word for it they will pay no more than is justly due under the contracts made. Then I will join hands with any gentleman here to put a stop to all this useless printing. But let us pay for that heretofore ordered by the House, for it is the cheapest way of getting rid of the consequences of our own folly.

Mr. GROW. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, for this reason: We have heard the same appeal made to us on all deficiency bills—that our executive officers have promised to pay; and that, therefore, Congress must appropriate the money. Now, so long as you permit the executive officers of the Government to exceed the appropriations of Congress, you deprive Congress of the control over the appropriations of money given to it by the Constitution. Your executive officer involves the Government in any amount of expenditures, and then calls on Congress to appropriate money to carry out his own act. I agree with the gentleman from Tennessee, that these evils of public printing have their initiative here, in resolutions to print large numbers of books to be sent as reading matter throughout the country—a policy which I am utterly opposed to; for what reason is there why Government should furnish reading matter to the people of the country any more than that it should furnish clothing to them? That, sir, is not in the line of its legitimate business.

But while I would not increase the approprition fixed in the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BURNETT,] I would say that you will never put a stop to executive officers exceeding the appropriations of Congress, so long as you pass deficiency bills. Here is a deficiency of over three quarters of a million of dollars that has accrued through a series of years. All the works for which this appropriation is asked, were, with the exception of one, ordered by the Thirty-Third Congress, so that this debt which we are now asked to pay, has been accumulating for years.

Now, whether the Government is legally responsible under the resolutions ordering these books, I will not stop to inquire. I take it for granted that Congress did not intend to publish a series of volumes, untold in number, when the order for their publication was made.

Mr. LETCHER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to put an inquiry to him?

Mr. GROW. I have but five minutes to myself, but as the gentlemen is always kind, I will yield to him.

Mr. LETCHER. If Congress did not mean to pay for this work, why did Congress sit here and permit it to be executed?

Mr. GROW. That is a pertinent question, and comes back to the responsibility of Congress. Executive officers in every part of the Government come to Congress every year for deficiencies in their several Departments. Congress orders a first volume of a work to be printed, and resolutions are passed that executive officers shall have power to see that the manuscript is prepared and sent to the printer. And, in most cases, after publishing the first volume, the last volume of the series is the next to be printed; and why? In order to compel Congress to complete the intermediate volumes, and thus to force us to expend money against our will. The publication of the sixth volume is followed by the publication of the second, third, fourth, and fifth. This is an abuse of the power granted by Congress; and as long as we allow our executive officers to go on in this way, so long will we have to continue to vote these deficiencies. Therefore, I have come to the conclusion to vote for no deficiency bill unless it is shown to me to be absolutely necessary, and that the money was expended for some reason not known to Congress at the time it made the appropriation. It is a usual thing to estimate for less than the amount wanted, because it is known that the proposition can be better got through for a small amount, and then funds are diverted from their proper objects to pay for these purposes. This evil will continue if Congress keeps paying these deficiency bills. It is time that this abuse was corrected. It is time that the power conferred by the Constitution on the money-appropriation branch of the Government was restored to the hands to which it properly belongs, and that we should put a stop to the practice of executive officers applying money and contracting obligations, and then coming to us and asking us to ratify their action.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. NICHOLS. I propose to increase the amount of the appropriation of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BURNETT] $1,000. I have offered this amendment merely for the purpose of correcting some erroneous impressions which seem to rest on the mind of the gentleman from Kentucky. As I understood him the other day, he stated to this House that the printing of the Thirty-Fourth Congress greatly exceeded in amount that of the Thirty-Third Congress. Now, sir, I have been to some considerable amount of trouble to make a computation upon this subject, and I find that the gentleman was $920,000 wrong in his estimate.

I understood him, also, to say that the amount included in the return of the Superintendent of the Public Printing for dry-pressing was totally unauthorized by law. Now, sir, I refer him to the Statutes at Large, Thirty-Third Congress, second session, page 645, and he will find that it is specifically provided for by law. And, sir, I have no doubt that the declaration of the gentleman in reference to what he states as the erroneous statements of the Superintendent of the Public Printing, if scrutinized closely, will show just as little foundation for the charge as in relation to dry-pressing.

I say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr.

GROW,] that I want this bill to have a fair show round the board. I am willing to take my responsibility in connection with it, and I want other gentlemen to stand up to theirs. Sir, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, himself, and other gentlemen upon this side of the House, have made furious speeches in opposition to this bill, and yet they will sit here quietly in their seats, without interposing one word of objection, and allow resolutions to pass authorizing the authors of these books to write in them whatever they choose; to get up these books not only during the sessions of Congress, but during the vacation. You pass these resolutions, you suffer them to go through the House, and then complain of the men who have charge of these works for doing, in good faith, precisely what you have authorized them to do. But, sir, I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky, when he asks how many men upon this side of the House will vote to pay the debts of the Government, I cannot answer for all, but for one I will say that I will vote every cent that this Government is responsible for.

Mr. RITCHIE. I ask the gentleman from Ohio whether, in his opinion, these expenditures have been legitimately incurred, in consequence of resolutions passed by this House? If they have been, I will vote for the bill to pay for them; and so great confidence have I in the gentleman's means of information and judgment, that I will trust his judgment in the matter.

Mr. NICHOLS. I will answer the gentleman's question as I understand it. I believe that every dollar provided for in this bill, except, perhaps, the amount to print Emory's report, is based upon the action of this House and of the Senate. The work has been commenced in good faith, and I think the House should comply with its obligations in good faith. In reference, however, to Emory's report, I think, if you will look to the resolution authorizing its printing, you will find that there is nothing authorizing an appendix; and I think that the printing of that appendix should not be commenced until authority upon the part of the House had been given.

Mr. SINGLETON. I desire, with the gentleman's permission, to ask him a question. I find there is an estimate made for printing ten thousand copies of the second volume of Emory's report. I wish to know whether he has not in his possession a resolution which he has been instructed by the Committee on Printing to offer, for dispensing with five thousand of the ten thousand copies of the second volume of the report of Emory's boundary survey?

Mr. NICHOLS. Such is the fact. But now let me say to the gentleman from Virginia, who is a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. LETCHER,] that his argument the other day in reference to that work was based upon a state of things which does not now exist. The proper measures have already been taken to suppress many of the illustrations and extraneous matter prepared for that work. And, sir, as the gentleman from Mississippi has remarked, I have a resolution in my possession, which I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to offer, cutting down the number of copies of the second volume of Emory's report from ten thousand to five thousand, which, in the opinion of Major Emory, is sufficient. I believe that one thousand is all that is required.

Mr. BURNETT. I suppose it is not the intention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NICHOLS] to do me injustice. The statement which I made the other day in reference to the relative amount of printing ordered to be done by the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, was based upon a statement furnished me by the Clerk of the House. It was impossible, as I then stated, to go into every item going to make out this enormous expenditure. It was impossible, from the statement of the Superintendent of the Public Printing, to separate the various items. I say to the gentleman from Ohio, therefore, if there be any error in the statement made by me on that occasion, it is an error based upon the statements of your Clerk. He put down the items for the Thirty-Second Congress and for the Thirty-Third Congress; then he gives the amount paid out for the Thirty-Fourth Congress. Add to it the amount contained in the bill now under consideration, and you have the amount of $2,334,081 27. And it was in this way that I made my calculation. I do not say that these articles were not ordered under resolutions formally passed by Congress. I give you the gross amount as added up, including the amount for paper, printing, lithographing, &c. The gentleman from Ohio tells me that some of these items were for deficiencies in the Thirty-Third Congress and payment for work already done. Now, sir, I cannot understand this system of legislation; and why? Because, at the first session of the Thirty-Fourth Congress we passed a deficiency bill of $625,000, to defray these very deficiencies in the Thirty-Third Congress.

Now, sir, as to the error on the subject of dry-pressing, I have this to say: the act of 1852, passed by the Thirty-Third Congress, which fixes the price of the various items, does not include the item of dry-pressing at all. I did not go through all of the laws of the United States for the purpose of investigating every law on the subject; but I understood that that act repealed all laws inconsistent with its provisions which were passed before it. I looked at it in that view.

Now, sir, in reference to the issuance of certificates of the Public Printer, the law expressly provides that when work shall be done by the Public Printer, the Superintendent of the Public Printing shall issue his certificate, which shall be evidence of indebtedness upon the part of the Government. But, sir, I perceive that the gentleman from Ohio either misunderstands or misapplies my remark.

I lay it down that if the Thirty-Fourth Congress passes a resolution authorizing the publication of a particular work, the author of that work has not the right, under that resolution, to go on indefinitum, and furnish volume after volume; and if he does so furnish manuscript to the amount of six, seven, or eleven volumes of the Pacific railroad surveys, it is a violation of the law, and Congress is not under obligation to pay that debt.

That is my proposition, and it is one which can be maintained under the act of 1852.

The amendment was, by unanimous consent, withdrawn.

Mr. CRAGIN. I move to amend by adding the following proviso:

Provided, That the further publication of the results of the United States naval astronomical expedition to Chili be discontinued.

I have been seeking the floor mainly for the purpose of replying to some remarks made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BURNETT] the other day; but as that has been done somewhat by my colleague upon the Committee on Printing during the last Congress, [Mr. NICHOLS,] I need not direct any remarks to that subject particularly. The gentleman conveyed the idea the other day, distinctly, that the printing of the Thirty-Fourth Congress was much more expensive than that of the Thirty-Third. Now, if he had examined the Daily Globe of January 25 last, he would have found about a true statement of the fact. Under the head of "Daily News," the Globe of that day says:

"The gross amount of expense incurred for the public printing, binding, engraving, &c., of the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses has just been ascertained. The account stands as follows:

Thirty-Third Congress.....	$2,800,000
Thirty-Fourth Congress.....	1,600,000" making the printing of the Thirty-Fourth Congress $1,200,000 less than that of the Thirty-Third Congress.

Mr. BURNETT. Does your estimate include this deficiency bill?

Mr. CRAGIN. My estimate includes the cost of the printing ordered by each of those Congresses.

Mr. LETCHER. This deficiency covers not only the Thirty-Fourth, but the Thirty-Third Congress.

Mr. CRAGIN. I have also examined the reports of the Superintendent of Public Printing, which are the true sources to go to in order to ascertain the cost of the public printing. Now, Mr. Chairman, I say that these pictured books ordered to be printed by the Thirty-Third Congress—the Pacific railroad surveys, the report of the Japan expedition, and the report of the naval astronomical expedition to Chili—cost more than the whole printing ordered by the Thirty-Fourth Congress. The printing of those three reports will cost this Government upwards of $1,500,000.

Sir, I do not wish to make this matter a party question at all; but, since the gentleman from Kentucky has accused this side of the House of having voted to create this great expense, I wished to call the attention of this committee, and of the country, to the facts.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to inquire if that is not the same Congress that passed the Kansas-Nebraska bill?

Mr. CRAGIN. As soon as I can get the opportunity in the House, I have a resolution which I intend to offer, requesting the Superintendent of Public Printing to report to this House the cost of the printing ordered by the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, respectively. I want to have it from official quarters, and I tell you, that report will show that the printing ordered by the Thirty-Third Congress costs $1,000,000 more than that ordered by the Thirty-Fourth Congress.

The great error of this whole printing business is this: Congress has ordered the printing of works which they knew nothing at all about. When the resolution was introduced for printing the Pacific railroad report no member of this House supposed that it was going to run up to eleven volumes. Only two years ago, after one or two volumes had been printed, the Superintendent of Public Printing, in a communication to the chairman, at that time, of the Committee on Printing, [Mr. NICHOLS,] of which committee I was also a member, said he supposed that report would reach six volumes. Now we are told it is going to amount to eleven volumes. This is the way these enormous expenses have been created. These works, too, were allowed to be profusely illustrated. The engraving, alone, for the Japan expedition, cost $250,000.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is purely a question of good faith. If I understand the bill as reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, it is a bill to provide means for the payment of a debt incurred by prior Congresses. If that debt has been contracted by them, if that work has been ordered by them, and the contracts have been made upon the faith of Congress in the usual way, it does not become us, at this time, to say they must not be paid, or to stop to inquire whether the work ought to have been ordered at that time. The resolution is express in declaring that the sums now asked to be appropriated are for the payment of work ordered to be done by the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses. If that be so, let each gentleman, before he votes against it, ask himself whether he would listen to an imputation upon himself of being unwilling to pay for any work which he himself had ordered. It matters little whether the work has been done or not if the contract has been made in good faith, if it has been put into operation, and there has been an undertaking to do the work; and if, as I understand there are, things are in progress connected with the work, good faith requires that we should pay for it.

I believe there has been great extravagance, but I believe that, from the necessity which is felt to pay this debt, we may learn wisdom in contracting future debts. I agree with all sides about the wasteful expenditure of the public money, and the impolicy of entering into contracts which outlast the official existence of those who enter into them. But as it has been done, and preceding Congresses have given orders requiring people to enter into contracts to fulfill those orders, we must, as their successors, be willing to pay for them.

Now, sir, I cannot vote for the amendment which has just been offered, because it seems to interfere with contracts already entered into. If there is no obligation to print these books, I hope the printing may be discontinued; but if there is any obligation to do the work, and contracts have been entered into, those contracts must be fulfilled to the letter, and I, for one, will never listen to any suggestion of extravagance or waste or useless expenditure, which has its foundation only upon broken faith. I would do in reference to a public debt exactly as I would do for myself, and if I deem it an imputation upon my character to be unwilling to pay for what I had ordered, or to fulfill a contract in part executed, I should be just as unwilling to lend my vote to withhold payment from those who have made contracts with the nation under like circumstances.

I think, Mr. Chairman, the amendment ought not to be adopted. I think there is no occasion for it. If the works have been ordered, they must be paid for. If they have not been ordered, there can be no necessity for the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. BOYCE demanded tellers on the amendment to the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BILLINGHURST and PEYTON were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 66.

So the amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Whilst the committee was dividing, Mr. CRAGIN proposed to withdraw his amendment, with a view of offering it at another point in the bill; but the Chair decided that it was not in order to withdraw it whilst the committee was dividing.

Mr. GARNETT. I move to amend the amendment so as to reduce the sum to $2,000. My object in moving that amendment is to avail myself of the five-minute rule to make a few remarks on the bill. I have heard disputes on different sides of the House as to which party is responsible for the extravagance of former Congresses in this printing matter. My colleague from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] gave us a speech in favor of the bill, one of the principal arguments of which was that one gentleman had voted to print such a report, and another gentleman had voted to print such another report, and that those gentlemen were now found in opposition to the bill. For my own part, I think that we have to deal with the responsibilities of the present, and it is a matter of no sort of consequence to the House how inconsistent any gentlemen amongst us may have been in former times. It is of equally little consequence in reference to the present bill, whether the Democracy of the Thirty-Third Congress were more extravagant than the Republican majority of the Thirty-Fourth Congress. The question is whether the Thirty-Fifth Congress should sanction the extravagance of its predecessors. The question is whether we, in this period of heavy taxation and public and private financial calamity, shall go on to perpetrate additional extravagance, and cumulate the excesses of former Congresses. That is the question for us to consider, and I submit to you, sir, whether it is worthy of statesmen, and of the responsible Representatives of the people, to allow the debate to degenerate into a mere recrimination between persons and parties.

I wish, sir, that these amendments were being offered in the House instead of in committee, that we might take the yeas and nays upon them and see who is responsible. I hope, sir, that gentlemen upon the other side noticed the vote taken by tellers upon the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. CRAWFORD.] The large bulk of those who sit upon this side of the House voted for that amendment, and to my utter astonishment the gentlemen upon the other side most clamorous for economy, voted against it and defeated it. That amendment was eminently right and proper.

Who, Mr. Chairman, in this House is opposed to fulfilling contracts? We are all for that. But you must first tell us what the contracts are. The Superintendent of the Public Printing in his report, dated as late as the 5th of January last, informs us that only $316,000 of the seven or eight hundred thousand dollars appropriated in this bill is required to pay for work already done. All the rest is to pay for work which was yet unexecuted on the 5th of January. Now, before the Committee of Ways and Means can ask us to vote an amount, under the name of a deficiency, beyond the $316,000, it is their duty to tell us whether that report of the Superintendent of Public Printing is true or false. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHILIPS] has told us that it is true that only $316,000 was due on the 5th of January, but that printing has been done since, and that something is due for that. It will be time enough to provide for that when the Committee of Ways and Means have information on which they can ask for a deficiency.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] tells us that there are contracts for work yet unexecuted; for plates, engravings, lithographs, and the like. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDRIDGE] would have covered all that. I am willing to fulfill all these contracts; but will gentlemen tell me that we are bound by contract to pay for the printing if the manuscript be not even written yet? Are we bound by contract to pay for the printing of manuscript written but not yet in the printer's hands? Are we bound by contract to pay for printing where the manuscript is in the hands of the printer but where the work is not yet done? Are we bound to pay, as in the case of the second volume of the Emory report, for paper not yet bought? And yet our Superintendent's report shows that part of the appropriation asked for in this deficiency bill is for imaginary liabilities of this sort. Your printer and binder are merely your employes to execute your orders; and you might as well say that because Captain Meigs has the superintendency of the Capitol extension you are bound by the contracts which he makes, and are bound to go on and complete the work in any style of extravagance that he may have designed.

Sir, let it be known that this is the very first attempt made in the beginning of the Thirty-Fifth Congress to bring about retrenchment; and let gentlemen come up to the mark, and show who are for and who are against it. If this Congress is to go on and imitate the acts of its predecessors; if this system of public plunder is to go on from Congress to Congress, for the benefit of party editors and party favorites, give us who are against it the opportunity of placing our names on record, and of washing our hands of all such corruption.

Mr. SEWARD. I renew my objection to the character of this debate. I hope the Chair will confine gentlemen strictly to the question under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will try to do so.

Mr. LETCHER. So far as I am concerned, either in regard to this or to any other matter, my colleague [Mr. GARNETT] knows me well enough to know that I am not inclined to dodge any vote, either by yeas or nays or by any other way whatsoever. So far as this matter is concerned, I humbly conceive that the Committee of Ways and Means have done nothing more than their duty in reporting this bill; and I am prepared to vote "ay" on the yeas and nays, or in any other way in which this measure may be presented to the House. Not only so; but I am willing to assume and to bear whatever of responsibility attaches to that vote, and to go before my people on my past record in this House on the question of economy or extravagance.

Now, sir, it was my belief, when this bill was reported, and it is my belief now, after all that has been uttered on this subject in debate, that the most economical plan to dispose of this question is to pass the bill which the Committee of Ways and Means has introduced. If that bill be rejected now, or if it be reduced either one fourth, or one half, the Congress of the United States will be besieged, from this time till there be a final disposition of the question, for the balances that may be claimed by these parties on contracts, or, in the language of the House, on the agreements or arrangements that have been consummated between the parties who are to do this work and the organized agents of this House, who are the Committee and the Superintendent of Public Printing.

Now, sir, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, over the way, [Mr. GROW,] thanked his God that he was not like these other people around here; that he did not vote for any of this printing; that he had been opposed to it all the way through from its inception to the present time. I find, sir, that when—

Mr. GROW. Is it to me the gentleman refers?

Mr. LETCHER. Yes: just wait till I get to the charge.

I find on reference to the Journal of the House, that in the second session of the Thirty-Fourth Congress, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] constituted one of seventy who voted to reprint the American State Papers by Gales & Seaton. How much that was to have cost I do not know, nor does anybody else here.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman is not speaking to the amendment, but is making a speech in reference to the conduct of members of a prior Congress, and is exhibiting yeas and nays to show the conduct of members of this House.

Mr. LETCHER. I am opposed to all the amendments, and I am surprised that my friend from Georgia [Mr. SEWARD] does not see it, and does not know that I am making a common fight against them all, whether they be to reduce or increase the appropriation.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 33.

Mr. SEWARD. I am surprised that my friend from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] who has been a member of the Committee of Ways and Means for several Congresses, has not seen it to be his duty to have provisions put in these appropriation bills declaring that no more money than that appropriated should be paid for these works. If the Committee of Ways and Means had done that, we should not have had this difficulty here to-day.

Mr. LETCHER. It would be well enough for the gentleman from Georgia to pluck the beam out of his own eye before he attempts to pull the mote out of another's eye.

Now, so far as the Committee of Ways and Means is concerned, they have their legitimate business; and the performance of such an operation as the gentleman from Georgia refers to devolves just as heavily upon him as upon any of us.

Mr. SEWARD. That is true; but the gentleman is one of those who are always cutting off debate by moving the previous question, and who thus cram on the country whatever the committee want, so that other gentlemen cannot expose their extravagance.

Mr. LETCHER. As well as I recollect, I think there was an important bill for a navy-yard somewhere down South, on which my friend moved the previous question.

Mr. SEWARD. Yes, sir; but I could not get my friend to indorse it.

Mr. LETCHER. I do not doubt that; for I was opposed to a navy-yard there, and would have been very glad to defeat it; but I could not do so under the previous question.

But, all this by-play aside. If I did not believe that the good faith of Congress was bound to appropriate the amount of money presented in this bill for its consideration, I should not ask for the passage of the bill; but it is my belief that good faith requires it; that there is an obligation resting on this House which should be met, and this induces me to come forward here and sustain it by whatever influence I have, and by my vote.

Mr. GARNETT withdrew his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WHITELEY. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky by striking out "$420,000," and inserting in lieu thereof "$20,000."

My object, Mr. Chairman, in moving the amendment is this: it was stated the other day by the honorable gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS,] from the Committee of Ways and Means, in reply to the gentleman from New York; and it was stated by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BURNETT] that it was a question of plighted faith on the part of the Government; and it was said this morning by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PHILLIPS] that it was a question of good faith. Now, while I have very great respect for the Committee of Ways and Means collectively, and individually, and for their opinion as lawyers and as members of this House, I, for my own part, like to see the contract; and I now wish to ask the gentleman from Missouri this question: When the Thirty-Third or Thirty-Fourth Congress—be it which it may—ordered the printing of five or ten thousand extra copies of any report, I want to know whether Congress meant to pledge its faith to print ad infinitum? I have here the copy of a resolution adopted on the motion of Mr. McDougall, of California:

"Resolved, That five thousand extra copies of the reports of the Pacific railroad surveys, with the accompanying maps, be printed for the use of this House."

I want to know whether the Thirty-Third Congress meant to pledge itself to pay for eleven volumes of that report, or for so many more as these penny-a-liners chose to write? In other words, I want to know whether, if it is a question of plighted faith, if we are bound for eleven, are we not bound for fifty volumes of it? Now, as lawyers, as statesmen, as men who can construe the English language, I ask gentlemen, and I ask the Committee of Ways and Means, where, if your faith is plighted for eleven, is the stopping-place? If we are bound for eleven, are we not bound for fifty? And why will they not go on as long as the Government stands, or as long as these penny-a-liners continue to write; and these authors will, like James and Dickens, go on and write as the publishers continue to pay for what they write. I ask whether there is not some stopping-place? Is their plighted faith to step in at all times to prevent a stop being put to the exuberant imaginings of men who go on writing and illustrating their printed works without regard to any practical results? There must be some stopping-place.

Mr. GROW. I do not rise to make a speech, but merely to correct a statement of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER.] The gentleman is always on the alert; but without his usual care, he misstates my position in this instance, to which, however, I raise no special objection. I have never made any claim to special purity in legislation, or any exemption from the usual follies of legislation; but, sir, the gentleman brings in my vote on printing the American Archives for supplying the new members of Congress. Now, sir, I did not vote for my own set of books, but I did vote to give the new members who came after me the same set of books which were given to me. Gentlemen will recollect that these were books for the individual members, and not for distribution over the country of books embellished with engravings, the engravings of which cost four times as much as the printing. Now, sir, if the gentleman will bring in here any vote which I gave for printing these picture-books for distribution, I will acknowledge that I was mistaken in the vote which I gave. Sir, I wish to say that I claim not to be more pure in my votes than anybody else; but I desire to call attention to the mode in which this printing has been ordered, and to the enormous abuse which has grown up, both in the printing ordered by Congress and the Executive Departments.

Mr. LETCHER. Can the gentleman state any instance in which the Superintendent of Public Printing, or the Public Printer, has exceeded his orders?

Mr. GROW. I do not intend to make any charges against anybody. I have not stopped to inquire whether any officer has exceeded his orders. I merely rose to correct the gentleman from Virginia. I say that in voting for the printing for the American Archives I only exercised the same magnanimity toward the new members then as was shown to me and to those who were elected with me.

Mr. WHITELEY, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. MAYNARD. I offer the following amendment:

Provided, That hereafter no payment shall be made, or money disbursed, for engraving, lithographing, or electrotyping, except for work already done, or partially done, or contracted to be done, unless the same shall have first been specifically sanctioned, and the price stipulated by one of the appropriate committees of Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I do not feel any personal or party responsibility for this large appropriation which we are called upon now to vote. But, sir, I am very unwilling to vote for it unless it can be done with some restriction which will prevent hereafter what has, as I conceive, grown to be a gross abuse, from a system which, in the outset, perhaps was right enough. I confess that I see a very marked distinction between printing books and buying clothes for distribution. I can see a very great propriety in the Government publishing, at the public expense, some works which private enterprise would not publish, for the very reason that public enterprise could not publish them. These are works which embody valuable and important scientific labor and research from original and unexplored sources of knowledge; works from which other parties derive information second and third hand, and prepare it for publication in a popular form—like the ephemeris of the astronomers, from which the almanac-maker prepares his tables. Such work are, many of them, we know, from sources of responsibility and high reputation in the country. Works of that character I think we owe it to ourselves and our country to patronize and to distribute abroad. But, sir, while I so think, I am aware that the system is one which has grown into great abuse. We have taxed the country and sent abroad works which are of no earthly use to anybody unless it be to the men who are to print and bind them.

There is another class of works which, though not wholly useless in their original design, become so in the manner in which they are gotten up. You start out a naval or military expedition for search and research. You allow to accompany it some ambitious young men, fresh, inexperienced, who see something wonderful—in every partridge a bird of paradise, and who start at the novelty of a rabbit springing from a bush. Their portfolios are filled up with sketches accordingly. Then, sir, the result is, when their report comes to be published—they thinking they have a carte blanche to publish—you have them filled with pictures useless for the purposes of illustration, and utterly worthless as works of art; and these books when published are of very little value except as Christmas gifts for boarding-school misses.

Now, sir, my amendment is, by its provision, not to stop the publication of any work which we have directed to be printed, not to interfere with contracts entered into by the regularly authorized agents of the Government, but in future to have no work published which shall not have been first written, prepared, with the pictures, plates, charts, engravings, and all, and submitted, not to an executive officer, but to a committee of one or the other of the two Houses, or to a joint committee of the two Houses.

Mr. PHELPS. I have risen to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, merely for the purpose of stating my opinion that, under the law of 1852, and under the several resolutions which have been passed by both Houses of Congress, if they were embodied in a contract, drafted and executed by myself and any other gentleman, the contract would hold us for the payment of the money specified in this appropriation bill. Thus much I give as my opinion in regard to this matter.

But I now desire to ask the committee that they will cease speaking upon amendments they may propose, and let us vote; for I believe the mind of every gentleman in this committee is made up in regard to this matter. I trust we shall dispose of this bill to-day.

The question was taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] and it was not agreed to.

Mr. SINGLETON. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, by reducing it twenty dollars; and I do it simply with the view of making a statement to the committee, which I hope they will listen to, and upon which I hope they will act.

I asked the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS,] on Friday last, if there was contained in this estimate an appropriation to pay for the ten thousand copies of the second volume of Major Emory's report. The gentleman said at that time that there was no estimate for the payment for the second volume. I find, however, upon an examination of the report made by the Superintendent of Public Printing, under the head of "estimates of the cost of public printing yet to be executed for the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses," an estimate for the payment for the second volume of Emory's report, both for the printing, and for the paper upon which that printing is to be done. And you heard this morning, from the gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Printing for the last Congress, [Mr. NICHOLS,] that it was the opinion of Major Emory himself that it was not necessary to print ten thousand copies of that second volume; that one thousand copies would be sufficient for all practical purposes.

Mr. LETCHER. I would inquire of the gentlemen whether he is not aware of the fact that a portion of the second volume of Emory's report is already printed?

Mr. SINGLETON. But a very small part of the manuscript has been put into the hands of the Public Printer—a very small part of it; and done, doubtless, with the view on the part of the printer to get the work under way, in order that an appropriation might be made for the payment of the whole ten thousand volumes.

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman is mistaken, for the whole manuscript has been furnished to the Secretary of the Interior, and would have been printed but for his interference.

Mr. SINGLETON. I quote from the Superintendent of the Public Printing, who was called before the committee. Now, sir, the whole narrative of the whole of that work that is worth one single copper, is contained in the first volume. The second volume consists of sets of diagrams, of stars and lines, worth nothing to you or your constituents. If this Professor Emory believes that we can dispense with nine thousand copies of that second volume, I ask gentlemen, if they propose to retrench any way in this matter of printing, to make a beginning here, and by this one item of retrenchment, save $54,000 to the Government. Sir, gentlemen have made an estimate of the amount to be paid for this second volume, and are now pressing it upon the committee, though the Professor, who got up the work, declares that one thousand instead of ten thousand copies are sufficient. Let me say to gentlemen that the Senate only ordered four thousand copies—one half the amount we took. They considered that it was not necessary to have as many of the second volume as of the first. We therefore can commence at this point to curtail the public printing. As has been stated, the chairman of the Committee on Public Printing has a resolution in his hand which he proposes to offer in the House, recommending that the resolution of last Congress be rescinded; and that only one half of the number then ordered to be printed shall be printed. I ask, where is the necessity of printing the whole ten thousand copies?

Besides, there is a map accompanying the second volume. That map is to be detached from the volume and printed by itself. That map will answer no purpose but to put upon the walls of your backwood cabins, as a background for a looking-glass. You have seen them, or maps like them, scattered through your district, and you know they are thrown in the top of cupboards or thrown away in a corner with the dust and rubbish, never useful for any purpose.

Mr. WARREN. While I am opposed to the amendment offered by my friend from Mississippi, I am not induced to that opposition by reason of the matters alleged by the gentleman from Tennessee, or by my friend from Kentucky. While they talk about the rats, and the mice, and woodcocks which appear in the agricultural reports ordered to be printed by this House, and allege that as a reason for opposing the appropriation proposed, I say I must dissent from them in that behalf. I think it material to the interests of this country that those pictures should have been put in that particular report, for the reason that the people of the South and the people of the North desire to know each other, and to know all about what pertains to each other. We in the South want to see whether we have the same kind of rats, and mice, and squirrels that you have in the North. [Laughter.]

But I have a different reason for opposing it. I want to see this engraving go into these agricultural reports, and while I am opposed to this particular matter under consideration, I will say that I am prepared to vote for the printing of any amount of agricultural and mechanical reports of the Patent Office, that any gentleman upon this floor may propose, for the very reason that works of that sort interest every portion of the country, North, South, East, West. But, sir, while I say that I am in favor of printing a larger number of reports of that character than has ever been ordered by the American Congress, I stand here prepared to oppose the publication of these reports and other works heretofore ordered in large quantities.

Gentlemen talk, sir, about this Emory's report. That is a matter which, in my section of the country, we know nothing about and care nothing about. Whilst I represent a constituency that would be in favor of footing any bill for expenses already incurred for works ordered to be printed, and that have really been executed, I stand here prepared to vote against any bill incurring further liabilities for works of this character. And why? Because no large portion of the people of this country are interested in such works. But a small portion of the people of this country can by any possibility be interested in works of that character. I do not refer to Major Emory's report only. I allude to nine out of ten of the works which have been ordered by the American Congress for the last few Congresses, and I say they are upon matters in which the people of the country feel no interest at all.

Sir, while we are assailing the Public Printer, and talking about the enormous expenditures in consequence of public printing, we had better bring the matter home to ourselves, and look at the source from which this extravagance springs. It has emanated from the American Congress, and has resulted from the ordering of innumerable quantities of works that the people could not understand if you were to submit them to them; and if they could understand them, would not care a doit about. That has brought about this extravagance in the public printing.

Mr. FLORENCE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Arkansas a question.

Mr. WARREN. I cannot refuse my friend from Pennsylvania anything.

Mr. FLORENCE. I was aware of that, and hence I asked the gentleman to yield to me. I desire to ask if the gentleman excepts the Pacific railroad survey?

Mr. WARREN. I take this occasion to say that I am decidedly and unqualifiedly opposed to those Pacific railroad surveys; and why? Because there is so much surplus matter embodied in the reports that the people never can get at the gist of the thing. If you will confine the reports to the surveys made by the engineers appointed for that purpose, then, I say, disseminate that knowledge among the people. But what do you find in these reports? Descriptions of the buffaloes, the mountains, and the country generally. If they would tell us exactly where the road ought to be laid, and that it should pass directly through the center of Arkansas, as the Pacific railroad route ought to do, I would go in for publishing thousands and thousands of reports. [Laughter.] But they do not do that, sir.

Mr. SINGLETON. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment, my object being accomplished.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. My impression is that there has been sufficient debate upon this question, and I move that the committee rise, for the purpose of moving a suspension of the rules to enable me to offer a resolution to terminate all debate in Committee of the Whole upon this question.

Mr. PHELPS. I appeal to the gentleman from Maine to withdraw his motion, and let us see if we cannot dispose of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I will withdraw it for a few moments.

Mr. SEWARD. I offer the following amendment to the amendment:

Provided, That no part of the appropriations contemplated by this act shall be paid, unless the same be received and accepted by those claiming to be entitled thereto in full consideration for any and every book now printed, or to be printed; for all paper now purchased, and to be purchased; for all engraving, finished or unfinished; lithographing, finished or unfinished; or any other work done, or to be done, ordered during the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, upon the condition only so far as may be within the legal operation of some contract heretofore entered into, which shall be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Believing, sir, as I do, from the feeling manifested by the committee, that the bill reported from the Committee of Ways and Means will pass the House ultimately, the object of my amendment is to prevent any settlement being made with the money now appropriated, unless the money shall be accepted in full consideration for everything contemplated by this bill.

Now, sir, we are told that the bill passed to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the Thirty-Third Congress did not cover the entire amount necessary, and here in the Thirty-Fifth Congress we are called upon to provide for a deficiency which arose in the Thirty-Third Congress. If this seven hundred and ninety odd thousand dollars has to be paid to the employés of the Government, let it be paid and let there be an end to it. My amendment proposes to settle now and forever for books, paper, engraving, and everything else for which these parties claim from the Government by reason of contracts. I go further, sir. I do not believe that the Government is bound by these contracts, and I provide that the question shall be settled at the Treasury Department, and only where the work has been executed under contracts binding on the Government, is the money to be paid out of these appropriations.

Now, sir, I ask for a vote on that amendment. I offer it in good faith. I think it is a sound amendment. It will protect the Treasury, and I hope the committee will sustain it. I have nothing more to say.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I oppose that part of the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia which seems to acknowledge the principle that the mere ordering of a book or anything else by Congress is a contract with the Public Printer.

Mr. SEWARD. The gentleman is mistaken. My amendment recognizes no such principle.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me. I have got but five minutes, and I speak slowly.

Mr. SEWARD. Well, the gentleman is so often out of order himself that he might tolerate a little interruption from me. [A laugh.] My amendment provides that the question of contract shall be settled at the Treasury Department.

Mr. HOUSTON. This question has been argued as one of contract. The gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS,] who has the management of this bill, states that if a contract of this kind existed between himself and another individual, it could be enforced against him in a court of justice. Now what is the relation that the Public Printer sustains to the House of Representatives? He is an officer of this House, just as the Speaker is an officer of the House, and the Clerk and Doorkeeper are officers of the House. If the House shall order the printing of any amount of matter—I care not whether it be a volume or a set of volumes—the House has a right to rescind that order at any time, and pay for the work that has been done. If the House has ordered a multitude of volumes to be printed, it is competent for the House to change or rescind that order, paying the Public Printer, according to the rates established by law, for the work he has done.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as at present advised, I intend to vote against this bill, and I will tell you why. I am going to vote against it because I have honestly, but in vain, sought information upon the points presented in connection with it. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] gives us one set of facts. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. NICHOLS,] who is a member of the Committee on Printing, and who says he is familiar with the subject, tells us that quite a different set of facts exists. And then my friend from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] comes up and makes another statement of facts, in which I have confidence. My friend from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] tells us that there is not so much work unfinished as other gentlemen suppose; that this volume is commenced, and that that volume has been ordered, and that such and such plates and illustrations have been contracted for, and here we are, after a week's struggle to obtain information, in the middle of this discussion without reliable information from any source.

Mr. PHELPS. I have had read a letter from the Secretary of the Interior to show it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I know you did; and what does my friend from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] say this morning? He cites the report of the Superintendent of Public Printing, which gives a precisely different state of facts from the one the gentleman [Mr. PHELPS] gave.

Mr. SINGLETON. I cited that recommendation.

Mr. HOUSTON. Exactly. I understood the gentleman from Mississippi to say that the Committee on Printing—

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from Alabama is not confining his remarks to my amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am opposed to that part of the gentleman's amendment which refers to contracts. I say there is no such thing, and I am going on to elaborate that view of the case.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order, and thinks that the gentleman from Alabama is confining himself to the question.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I ask how are we to vote? My friend from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] says we are bound to vote for all this. My friend from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] produces a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, presenting a state of facts showing the progress of this work, and says that we are bound, at least, to go to that extent. My friend from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] comes from the Committee on Printing, which has charge of this precise matter, and reports to us a state of facts derived from the report of the Superintendent of Public Printing, entirely in conflict with the statement reported by the gentleman from Missouri, as from the Secretary of the Interior. Now, in this state of confusion, in this state of great want of information, how are we, who are outside of these committees, to vote? I should like to know to what point the mind of any gentleman can arrive with any degree of satisfaction to himself? I do not hold that when the Committee of Ways and Means report a bill the Committee on Public Printing are bound to come and show us how much of the work is done, and how much is not done. Yet they have been able to do so, and to do so satisfactorily. But I contend that the Committee of Ways and Means ought to have advised us on these precise points that we might know how to vote.

The question being on Mr. SEWARD's amendment to the amendment, Mr. GARNETT demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. READY and JOHN COCHRANE were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 78, noes 43.

So the amendment to the amendment was adopted.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think, sir, that this is a subject of a great deal of interest; but from the discussion which has been had I am satisfied, and I think the House is satisfied, that we all understand the merits of the bill; and to spend more time in discussion would be a wasteful expenditure of the public time and treasure. I move, therefore, that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

Mr. WARREN. I move to amend the motion by substituting the motion that the committee rise and report the bill back to the House, with the recommendation that it be referred back to the committee from whence it came.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not in order.

Mr. BURNETT. The amendment of the gentleman from Georgia to my amendment having been adopted, I suppose the question is on my amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the committee is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky as amended.

Mr. BURNETT. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will withdraw his motion until the vote can be taken upon my amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will withdraw it.

Mr. WARREN. Is it not in order to move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it be recommended to the committee from whence it came? It strikes me that would be the better mode of proceeding decidedly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the motion is not in order while an amendment is pending.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I shall object to this bill being reported now. I have an amendment which I think will obviate all difficulty on the subject.

Mr. LETCHER. Is it in order to offer an amendment to the amendment?

The CHAIR. The Chair thinks it would be in order to offer an amendment as an addition to the amendment already adopted.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I rise to a question of order. I understand the motion pending to be, that the committee rise; which motion is not debatable.

Mr. LETCHER. I propose to amend the amendment by adding these words:

Provided, The sum does not exceed that reported by the Committee of Ways and Means.

Now, sir, my friend from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] has undertaken to "pitch in" generally and miscellaneously to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. SEWARD. Which one of the Committee of Ways and Means was it that reported this bill?

Mr. LETCHER. The whole committee. I hope my friend from Georgia will not interrupt me again.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will not include me, when he says the bill was reported by the whole committee.

Mr. LETCHER. I except the gentleman from Georgia, certainly. Now, sir, the gentleman from Alabama told the committee that there was no contract upon the part of the House with the Public Printer. Mr. Chairman, if such be the fact; if there was nothing obligatory on the part of the House, I should like to know what induced the House, preparatory to the election of Public Printer, to adopt this resolution?

Resolved, That this House now proceed to the election of a Public Printer for the House of Representatives for the Thirty-Fifth Congress, with the proviso that the House retain the right to modify the existing law upon the subject of the public printing as it may seem proper.

Now, sir, if there was no existing obligation by which this House was bound to pay according to the law as it stood on your statute-book, what did gentlemen mean by voting for that proviso? Sir, if they believe to-day that there is no obligatory force upon the part of this House to comply with its obligation, in the election of Public Printer, they ought surely to be able to understand why it was necessary to insert a proviso of that sort in that resolution, in order to protect us in the event of the change of the law upon the subject of the public printing.

Now, sir, one word more. My friend from Alabama intends to vote against this bill because he has received no satisfactory explanation in regard to it; that the Committee of Ways and Means have one version, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NICHOLS] another, and the gentleman from Virginia another; and in this uncertainty he can come to no satisfactory conclusion as to what is right and proper. How was the Committee of Ways and Means to procure their information upon the subject? Were they not to look to the Superintendent of Public Printing? Is he not authority who is supposed to understand the obligation of Congress towards the Public Printer? Yet, sir, the gentleman says he will vote against it because the Committee of Ways and Means have not given him satisfaction.

But there is another thing to which I wish to call the attention of the committee. My friend from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] says there is no obligation upon the part of Congress to print the second part of Emory's report. If there was no obligation, why a resolution of that sort?

Mr. SINGLETON. I did not say that the House had a right to rescind its order at any time it thought proper to do so; and a resolution which is now in the hands of the chairman of the Committee on Printing is to that effect. It proposes to dispense with five thousand copies of the second volume.

Mr. LETCHER. In other words, if they have the right to rescind it, why did they adopt this proviso at the opening of the session? How can it be explained? There are a multitude of gentlemen who voted for that resolution; and upon their theory, as laid down yesterday and to-day, I ask them to come to the mark, and explain this matter.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. HOUSTON. I rise to oppose the amendment. I have a right to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Illinois is in order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I insist upon my motion.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to appeal to the gentleman from Illinois to accept an amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman's amendment is not in order.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 202) to appropriate money to supply deficiencies for the paper, printing, binding, and engraving, ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CONSTITUTION OF OREGON.

Mr. LANE, by unanimous consent, presented the official copy of the constitution of the State of Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

RESOLUTIONS OF KANSAS LEGISLATURE.

Mr. PARROTT. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce joint resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas, with a view to have them laid upon the table and printed.

[Cries of "Read!" "Read!"]

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I object to the reception of the resolutions, unless I know what they are.

Mr. PARROTT. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. COBB. What are the resolutions?

Mr. FLORENCE. Can they not be read for information?

The first resolution was read by its title, as follows:

"Preamble and joint resolution in relation to the constitution framed at Leecompton, Kansas Territory, on the 7th of November, 1857."

Mr. LETCHER. Read them. Let us know what they are?

Mr. FLORENCE. There is no objection to that.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. They have not been received; and, therefore, I say it is not in order to read them.

The SPEAKER. It is demanded that the papers shall be read, so that gentlemen may know how to vote.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I submit a question of order. They cannot be read, as they have not been received as yet.

The SPEAKER. Pending the question, "Will the House receive the resolutions?" the demand is made that they be read, so that gentlemen may know how to vote.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The appeal was laid upon the table.

[Cries of "Read!" "Read!"]

The first joint resolutions in reference to the Leecompton constitution were then read, as follows:

Preamble and Joint Resolutions in relation to the Constitution framed at Leecompton, Kansas Territory, on the 7th day of November, 1857.

Whereas, a small minority of the people, living in nineteen of the thirty-eight counties of this Territory, availing themselves of a law which enabled them to obstruct and defeat a fair expression of the popular will, did, by the odious and oppressive application of the provisions and partisan machinery of said law, procure the return of the whole number of the delegates to the constitutional convention, recently assembled at Leecompton. Whereas, by reason of the defective provisions of said law, in connection with the neglect and misconduct of the authorities charged with the execution of the same, the people living within the remaining nineteen counties of the Territory were not permitted to return delegates to said convention; were not recognized in its organization, or in any sense heard or felt in its deliberations; and whereas, it is an axiom in political ethics that the people cannot be deprived of their rights by the negligence or misconduct of public officers: and whereas, a minority, to wit, twenty-eight only of the sixty members of said convention, have attempted, by an unworthy contrivance, to impose upon the whole people of the Territory a constitution without consulting their wish, and against their will; and whereas, the members of said convention have refused to submit their action for the approval or disapproval of the voters of the Territory, and in thus acting have defied the known will of nine tenths of the voters thereof; and whereas, the action of a fragment of said convention representing, as they did, a small minority of the voters of the Territory, repudiates and crushes out the distinctive principle of the Nebraska-Kansas act, and violates and tramples under foot the right and sovereignty of the people: and whereas, from the foregoing statement of facts it clearly appears that the people have not been left "free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way;" but, on the contrary, at every stage in the anomalous proceedings recited, they have been prevented from so doing: Be it therefore Resolved by the Governor and Legislative Assembly of Kansas Territory, That the people of Kansas being opposed to said constitution, Congress has no rightful power under it to admit said Territory into the Union as a State; and we, the representatives of said people, do hereby, in their name and on their behalf, solemnly protest against such admission.

Resolved, That such action, on the part of Congress, would, in the judgment of the members of this Legislative Assembly, be an entire abandonment of the doctrine of non-intervention in the affairs of the Territory, and a substitution, in its stead, of congressional intervention in behalf of a minority engaged in a disreputable attempt to defeat the will and violate the rights of the majority.

Resolved, That the people of Kansas Territory claim the right, through a legal and fair expression of the will of a majority of her citizens, to form and adopt a constitution for themselves.

Resolved, That the Governor of this Territory be requested to forward a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the Delegate in Congress from this Territory.

G. W. DEITZLER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
C. W. BABCOCK,
President of the Council.

SECRETARY'S OFFICE, LEOCOMPTON,
KANSAS TERRITORY, January 12, 1858.

I certify the above to be a true copy of the enrolled resolutions deposited in this office.

The Clerk was then proceeding to read the concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the Territory of Kansas reaffirming the Topeka constitution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, at this stage of the proceedings, desires to call attention to the passage in the Manual in reference to the reading of papers. The Chair should have propounded the question to the House, when objection was made, whether the paper should be read?

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. If the Chair will allow me, as I got the House into this difficulty, I will get them out of it. As I have been deprived by the decision of the Chair of the parliamentary right which I had to object to the reading, and as gentlemen have accomplished the object they had in view, I withdraw all objection to the reading.

The Clerk then read the resolutions of the Kansas Legislature in relation to the Topeka constitution; which are as follows:

Concurrent Resolutions reaffirming the People's Constitution framed at Topeka on the 23d day of October, 1855.

Whereas, in the spring of 1855 the first Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Kansas was by force and violence seized upon by people foreign to our soil, and a code of laws enacted highly unjust and oppressive, and calculated to drive off or enslave the actual settlers of said Territory, and to fix upon them an institution revolting to a large majority of the bona fide citizens of the Territory; and whereas, to avoid civil war, and as the only peaceful alternative, asserting as they did, that the principle formally enunciated in an act organizing the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas would fully authorize and sustain them in their movement, the people of said Territory did proceed to call a convention to frame a State constitution, the delegates thereto were regularly and fairly elected, and on the 23d day of October, A. D. 1855, did assemble in convention at Topeka, in said Territory, and did frame a constitution, and provided for its submission to a full and fair vote of the people, for their ratification or rejection, to wit, on the 15th day of December, A. D. 1855; and whereas, at the time aforesaid, the people of said Territory were engaged in a war, resisting an armed invasion from abroad, and were disabled thereby from giving expression upon said instrument; and whereas, to wit, on the 3d day of August, A. D. 1857, said constitution was again submitted to a full and fair vote of the people for their ratification or rejection, and by them ratified by a majority of about eight thousand; Therefore,

Resolved by the Council and House of Representatives, (the House of Representatives concurring)—

1st. That the constitution framed at Topeka, in said Territory, on the 23d day of October, A. D. 1855, embodies the wishes of the people of this Territory upon the subject of a State government, and ought to be received by the Congress of the United States as the constitution of the State of Kansas.

2d. That we hereby memorialize the Congress of the United States to admit the State of Kansas into the Union under the said constitution, framed at Topeka, in said Territory, on the 23d day of October, A. D. 1855, as aforesaid; as one of the sovereign States, upon an equal footing with the other States.

3d. That the President of the Council and Speaker of the House of Representatives be respectfully requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions, with a certified copy of the said constitution, framed at Topeka on the 23d day of October, A. D. 1855, as aforesaid, to the President of the United States, and the presiding officers of each House of Congress.

Passed Council, December 14, 1857.

Passed House, December 15, 1857.

G. W. DEITZLER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
C. W. BABCOCK,
President of the Council.

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF KANSAS TERRITORY.

I certify the above to be a true copy of the enrolled resolutions deposited in this office.

[L. S.] HUGH S. WALSH, Clerk.
LECOMPTON, KANSAS TERRITORY, January 12, 1858.

The SPEAKER. The Chair now asks that the Clerk may report the paragraph from the Manual under which the ruling of the Chair was made.

The Clerk read the paragraph as follows:

"Where papers are laid before the House, or referred to a committee, every member has a right to have them once read at the table before he can be compelled to vote on them; but it is a great, though common error, to suppose that he has a right forties quoties to have acts, journals, accounts, or papers on the table read independently of the will of the House. The delay and interruption which this might be made to produce, evince the impossibility of the existence of such a right. There is, indeed, so manifest a propriety in permitting every member to have as much information as possible on every question on which he is to vote, that when he desires the reading, if it be seen that it is for information, and not for delay, the Speaker directs it to be read without putting the question, if no one objects; but if objected to, the question must be put."

The resolutions were then laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

RESTRICTION OF DEBATE.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution, not with a view of pressing it particularly upon the House to-day, but with a view of getting it before the House now, in order that they may act upon it at their earliest convenience. It will be seen, from the reading of it, that it is calculated to expedite business, and will not put any gentleman on the floor to any inconvenience at all. It is as follows:

Resolved, That from and after the passage of this resolution, all debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union shall be strictly confined to the bill or resolution directly submitted to the committee, except that Monday nights, Wednesday nights, and Friday nights, of each week be, and they are hereby, set apart for the discussion of matters arising out of the condition of the Union generally, or such other matters as gentlemen may be disposed to discuss.

Mr. BLISS. I object to that resolution.

Mr. WARREN. Objection being made, I move to suspend the rules; for I am satisfied that two thirds of the members would be willing to vote for the resolution.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman waive that motion for a few moments, to enable the Chair to lay certain papers before the House?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will waive it for that purpose.

CENSUS OF MINNESOTA.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, submitting to the House of Representatives a report from the Secretary of the Interior, under date of the 27th ultimo, with accompanying papers, in compliance with the resolution of the House of the 18th ultimo, requesting the President to communicate to the House whether the census of the Territory of Minnesota has been taken, in accordance with a provision of the fourth section of the act of Congress providing for the admission of Minnesota as a State, approved February 26, 1857; and if said census has been taken and returned to him or any department of the Government, to communicate the same to this House; and if the said census has not been so taken and returned, to state the reasons, if any exist to his knowledge, why it has not been done.

The message and the accompanying documents were referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

REVISION OF REVENUE LAWS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in reply to a resolution of the House of Representatives of March 3, 1857, relative to House bill (No. 187) for the revision and codification of the revenue laws; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

DELAWARE BREAKWATER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the War Department, being a report in answer to a resolution of 26th January, relative to the cost of completing the Delaware breakwater, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

MILITIA RETURNS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the War Department, containing an abstract of the returns of militia; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL POST OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Postmaster General, asking additional appropriations for temporary clerk hire for the Post Office Department; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS FROM COURT OF CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House certain reports from the Court of Claims. The adverse reports were referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be placed on the Calendar, and the bills to be considered as read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims, under the rule.

And then, on motion of Mr. CLINGMAN, (at half past four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 2, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. I. J. MURRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in compliance with the resolution of the Senate, a statement showing the cost of the printing, binding, and paper, ordered by Congress for each year, beginning with December, 1845, and ending with the late session; which, on motion of Mr. SEWARD, was ordered to lie on the table; and a motion by him to print it, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also laid before the Senate, a report of the Secretary of War, communicating returns of the militia of the States and Territories, with their arms and accoutrements and ammunition for the year 1857; which, on motion of Mr. WILSON, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

He also laid before the Senate reports of the Court of Claims, made in pursuance of law, adverse to the claim of Samuel C. Reid, for himself and in behalf of the owners, officers, and crew of the private-armed brig General Armstrong; the claim of Rebekah Heald; the claim of Benjamin H. Springer; the claim of John Etheridge; and the claim of the Illinois Central Railroad; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BROWN presented a petition of citizens of Washington, District of Columbia, praying for the passage of an act to incorporate the Columbia Wood Gas Company; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. STUART presented the petition of citizens of Michigan, praying that a grant of land be made for the benefit of the Michigan Agricultural College; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BIGLER presented the petition of P. S. Duval & Co., praying for indemnity for the loss of paper and plates for the second volume of the Japan expedition, which were destroyed by fire in Philadelphia, in April, 1856; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. EVANS presented the petition of Mary S. Taylor, widow of Alexander S. Taylor, a volunteer in the war of 1812, praying to be allowed bounty land; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the petition of Anna M. E. Ring, praying that a land warrant may be issued to herself and sisters in lieu of one issued to their father for services in the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. DAVIS presented a petition of Lieutenant Colonel Johnston and other cavalry officers, remonstrating against the incorporation of the dragoons and mounted riflemen with the cavalry; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

Mr. YULEE presented a presentment of the grand jury of St. John's county, Florida, in favor of the appropriation of certain lots and buildings at St. Augustine for the promotion of education in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

He also presented a communication from E. E. Blackburn, United States marshal for the northern district of Florida, in favor of an amendment of the act to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed to clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILSON. I present the memorial of E. R. Livingston, Esq., of Boston, praying to be appointed to superintend and aid in the preparation of a catalogue, with abstract and index, of the original documents and papers of the Senate of the United States, on a plan of his own originating. A work, on Mr. Livingston's plan, has just been completed of all the original legislative documents and papers of the commonwealth of Massachusetts, from the year 1774 to the close of the political year 1856. During its preparation, and on its completion it was examined by joint committees of the Legislature, not merely to test its accuracy, but also its convenience and importance for a ready access to any particular document or paper. Those committees were unanimous in their commendation of this gentleman's plan, and of its execution; and likewise of the great importance and value of the work. It has also been examined and highly commended by a number of the most distinguished reviewers in the State of Massachusetts. By this ingenious system of arrangement any desired paper can easily be found in any one of three ways—from the subject; or the order of time; or the kind of legislative action. That is to say—in a very few moments by consulting this catalogue and index, any person can easily refer to all the papers on the files relating to any particular subject, from first to last; or he may obtain a summary of the whole legislative proceedings of any session; or he can readily find, under one head, all the business of the same kind at each session. It is needless to add, that such a catalogue and index of the original papers of the Senate would be of immense utility in facilitating reference to them for all purposes—for committees and historians—and days and even weeks of research for particular papers may be saved by the aid of such a system. I move a reference of the memorial, with the recommendations accompanying it, to the Committee on the Library.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. BRIGHT, it was Ordered, That the petition of Adam Hays, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. STUART asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 112) authorizing a drawback on old railroad iron, imported, rerolled, and reexported; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

FEES OF MARSHALS.

Mr. YULEE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire what alterations are advisable to be made in the existing laws regulating the fees of marshals and other officers connected with the courts of the United States in the several States and the District of Columbia, and to report by bill or otherwise.

PRISONS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the state and condition of the prisons in the District; their sufficiency to prevent the escape of prisoners; the nature and propriety of the rules and regulations for the government and discipline of the inmates of the penitentiary; the capacity of the present building used for a penitentiary for the efficient and convenient discharge of all the duties incident to such an institution; the expediency and propriety of erecting a new building for a penitentiary, and the procuring a different site from the one now occupied; and also the expediency of conferring the appointment of warden of the penitentiary on the board of inspectors of the prison; and, generally, what improvements and alterations are necessary to render the system in this District equal to that in many of the States.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. SEWARD, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the petition of J. Hosford Smith, reported a bill (S. No. 115) for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. BRIGHT, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the petition of Randall Pegg, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Sarah Foy, widow of John Foy, deceased, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Court of Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of the heirs of Isaac and Sarah Blauvelt, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Albert G. Hopper and Nancy Baldwin, heirs of Garrett A. Hopper, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Jeremiah Pendergast, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill, (S. No. 116,) for the relief of Jeremiah Pendergast, of the District of Columbia. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of John Wentworth, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of William Allen, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill, (S. No. 117) for the relief of William Allen, of Portland, in the State of Maine. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Elijah Roath, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the petition of the heirs of Nathan Weeks, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 113) for the relief of the heirs of Lieutenant Nathan Weeks, deceased. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. YULEE, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the memorial of John Scott, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 118) for the relief of John Scott, Hill W. House, and Samuel O. House. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of William Moss, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of the legal representatives of George Mayo, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

LEGAL TENDER.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 44) to amend an act entitled "An act amendatory of existing laws relative to the half dollar, quarter dollar, dime, and half dime," approved February 21, 1852, reported it back, with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. SLIDELL. I have great deference for the opinion of the Committee on Finance, and especially for that of its distinguished chairman, and if the report of that committee were unanimous, I probably should not be disposed to press this matter any further; but I understand there is great division in the committee on that subject. I should like to have an opportunity of explaining to the Senate the provisions of the bill, and my reasons for introducing it. For that purpose, I move it be made the special order for Monday, the 15th instant, at half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. HUNTER. I have no objection to that. Mr. STUART. I hope the Senator will say one o'clock. We get into confusion by making special orders for half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. SLIDELL. My impression is, that the bill can be disposed of in half an hour; but I will say one o'clock. I move that the bill be made the special order of the day for Monday, the 15th instant, at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HUNTER. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3.) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending the 30th June, 1859, have instructed me to report it back without amendment. I give notice that I shall call it up to-morrow or the next day.

NATIONAL ARMORIES.

Mr. HUNTER. I am also instructed, by the Committee on Finance, to report back the bill (H. R. No. 63) to supply an omission in the enrollment of a certain act therein named, and I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to act on it at once. It is to correct an error of the clerk's in enrolling the Army appropriation bill of the last year. The item in relation to the armories was left out, and this bill is to supply it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. The clause of the Army appropriation act for the year ending June 30, 1858, appropriating $360,000 for the "manufacture of arms at the national armories having been omitted in the enrollment" of the act, the bill makes an appropriation of that sum for that purpose.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE AMISTAD CASE.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred so much of the message of the President of the United States as relates to the claim made by the Government of Spain in the case of the schooner Amistad, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 114) to indemnify the master and owners of the Spanish schooner Amistad and her cargo. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEWARD. In behalf of the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. Foor] and myself, as members of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I submit a minority report, in which the minority arrive at the conclusion that the claim in the Amistad case is not supported by the facts or the law so as to authorize Congress to make provision for its payment. I move that the minority report be printed with the majority report.

The motion was agreed to.

COMPENSATION OF LABORERS.

Mr. YULEE, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the memorial of William J. Walker and others, reported a joint resolution (S. No. 17) explanatory of the "joint resolution giving an increased compensation to all laborers in the employment of the executive and legislative departments of the Government in the city of Washington," approved August 18, 1856; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. YULEE. This is a bill explanatory of a joint resolution passed at the last Congress, which I ask may be put on its passage now. I will state to the Senate its purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order, which is the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. YULEE. Is the morning hour exhausted? The VICE PRESIDENT. It is for this purpose.

Mr. YULEE. I suppose by general consent we can proceed with the morning business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The special order is now before the Senate; but by unanimous consent it may be informally laid aside, or it may be postponed by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. YULEE. I move that it be postponed for the present, so that we may proceed with the consideration of this bill.

Mr. DAVIS. Let us go on with the special order.

Mr. YULEE. I withdraw the request. My purpose was not a very material one, and I will not interfere with the desire of the chairman of the Military Committee to take up his bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I fear a debate will arise on a bill if taken up at this time. I will yield to the Senator from Florida, with the understanding that the subject on which he desires action will be postponed if it creates debate.

Mr. YULEE. It is not material that it should be attended to to-day, and I will not press it.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The special order is the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill in reference to the Pacific railroad, upon which there is a motion to postpone it with a view to take up the bill to admit Minnesota into the Union.

Mr. DAVIS. I understood that the bill for the increase of the Army was the special order for to-day at half past twelve o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is true. The Chair will state, however, that the Senate adjourned on this business yesterday; and by special rule of the Senate, the unfinished business takes precedence of special orders.

Mr. DAVIS. I thought we adjourned yesterday without taking up any other subject, after having postponed the Army bill. There was a mere proposition to take a subject into consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair announced that the special order was taken up, and there was a motion to postpone it. Whether that was up or not, however, the motion to postpone it was the unfinished business on which the Senate yesterday adjourned.

Mr. CLAY. I will state to the Senate as a reason why I trust this subject will be suffered to lie over for to-day at least, that my colleague, who had the floor when the Senate adjourned upon the question of taking up the Minnesota bill, is confined to his bed to-day by sickness, and he is unable to get out. He requested me this morning to ask the favor of the Senate not to act on that proposition to-day. I state that to the Senate, and I move to postpone the subject until to-morrow.

Mr. DAVIS. It was a mere motion to take up a subject for consideration which was pending at the adjournment. If the subject had been taken up, then we should have to continue its consideration. The subject mentioned by the Chair was not before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator that the subject was taken up, and there was a motion to postpone its further consideration.

Mr. SEWARD. The question yesterday was on a motion to postpone the Pacific railroad bill until to-morrow, and upon that motion the Senate adjourned, as I understand it. To-morrow has come; and it seems to me that we fall back, then, on the special order for half past twelve o'clock, the Army bill; and if there be no objection I will move to take up the Army bill, to avoid all question about it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The special order was taken up yesterday, and there was a motion made to postpone it and take up another bill. The Chair thinks it is necessary to postpone that other bill before proceeding with the Army bill.

Mr. CLAY. I have made that motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama made a motion to postpone it.

Mr. GWIN. To postpone what question?

Mr. CLAY. The special order.

Mr. DOUGLAS. My impression is, that without any motion, the Army bill, being the unfinished business, and having been postponed until to-day, has priority as the first special order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Army bill was not the unfinished business. The motion to postpone the Pacific railroad bill was the unfinished business.

Mr. GWIN. The present subject under consideration is the Pacific railroad bill, is it not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. GWIN. I hope that bill will not be postponed.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I shall vote with the Senator from New York to take up the Army bill. I do not wish to antagonize with everything.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama moves to postpone the special order, with a view to take up the special order fixed for half past twelve o'clock, being the Army bill.

Mr. GWIN. The business before the Senate was the Pacific railroad bill, was it not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Pacific railroad bill was taken up as the special order yesterday, and the Senate adjourned on a motion to postpone it and take up the Minnesota bill. That unfinished business takes its place at the head of the special orders. The Senator from Alabama now moves to postpone that special order, with a view to take up the bill for the increase of the Army.

Mr. GWIN. This motion is to postpone the Pacific railroad bill in order to take up the Army bill. That is the question. The Pacific railroad bill was before the Senate, and there was a motion by the honorable Senator from Illinois to postpone it, in order to take up the Minnesota bill. Certainly the Pacific railroad bill is the one before the Senate. That is the decision, as I understand the Chair. The special order for yesterday, being the Pacific railroad bill, is before the Senate, together with the motion of the Senator from Illinois to postpone it, in order to take up the Minnesota bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. GWIN. Then the Pacific railroad bill is before the Senate, and the motion is to postpone it. I hope it will not be postponed. I hope the Senator from Alabama will not press that motion. If the question is pressed, I shall ask for the yeas and nays on it.

Mr. CLAY. I understood the Chair to say that the unfinished business was the question of taking up the Minnesota bill. I now understand the Chair, however, that the unfinished business is the Pacific railroad bill. I move to postpone that with a view of taking up the Army bill. We have progressed, I think, very nearly to the close of the argument on that bill. We are assured by the Committee on Military Affairs that it is important to the public interest that the bill should pass or be defeated at once. There is no pressing emergency, certainly, in respect to the Pacific railroad, for it is not the work of a day, or a year, or of many years. I trust that it will be postponed, and that we shall proceed to the consideration of the Army bill.

Mr. GWIN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have one word to say. I understood the state of facts to be this: Yesterday, when the Army bill was postponed until to-day, the Chair, without any motion, announced that the next special order was the Pacific railroad bill. I immediately interposed a motion to postpone the prior orders and take up the Minnesota bill; and I did that before the Pacific railroad bill had been taken up at all. It was simply announced that it had been reached on the Calendar, but we did not proceed to its consideration; it was not read; it was not before the Senate. We arrived at the point where it was to come next, and I interposed a motion to postpone it and take up the Minnesota bill. My impression is, that motion having gone over, that the Army bill has the same priority to-day that it had yesterday morning, and that next to it is the Pacific railroad bill. When the Pacific railroad bill is reached, I shall insist on my motion to take up the Minnesota bill against it. I do not wish to withdraw it, or to antagonize with the Army bill, because I believe that is nearly finished, and I do not wish to seem to be antagonizing with everything in the Senate.

Mr. IVERSON. I rise to ask a question of the Chair. My remembrance is—I may be mistaken, however—that the Senator from Massachusetts yesterday submitted an amendment to the Army bill, and moved to postpone it until half past twelve o'clock to-day. Is that the fact?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir. I made that motion.

Mr. IVERSON. If that is the fact, the Army bill is the special order now, and the other matters cannot come up until one o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is obliged to adhere to the opinion he expressed, that the unfinished business of yesterday takes precedence of the special orders.

Mr. IVERSON. At one o'clock; but not until that time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Army bill was the special order for half past twelve o'clock, but the unfinished business takes its place ahead of that.

Mr. GWIN. I withdraw my opposition, with the understanding that the Army bill is to be taken up and disposed of, and that then the Pacific railroad bill shall follow in its course immediately after.

Mr. DOUGLAS. There cannot be any agreement made as to what shall follow in its course. The argument is nearly finished on the Army bill; but I shall be compelled, after we have disposed of the Army bill, and come to the Pacific railroad bill, to insist on my motion to postpone it, and take up the Minnesota bill. I wish to give this notice now, so as to deal with entire frankness with the Senator from California.

Mr. GWIN. The question then will be, the Army bill being considered and passed, whether we shall take up the next special order, which is the Pacific railroad bill. Very well. I will meet the gentleman on that question. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It requires unanimous consent to withdraw the call. The Chair hears no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 79) to increase the military establishment of the United States, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. TOOMBS to strike out the first section of the bill.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, when this bill was under debate on a previous occasion, I intimated that I had some words to speak on the subject, and I will proceed to make my remarks now. I shall not detain the Senate long; and, in what I say, I shall hardly labor to convince Senators to bring them over to my own opinions, for I am, in regard to this bill, but half convinced myself. My object is to place myself right upon the record, in order that the reasons for the votes I shall give may be understood hereafter.

It would be impossible, Mr. President, to engage with any advantage in this debate; for, so far as I have observed its progress, there is no dispute on principle involved in the subject. On the one side, the bill is opposed by those who deprecate a standing army, and we have pictures drawn of the dangers of a standing army in the country; and, on the other side, the argument is only to show that this bill does not contemplate a dangerous increase of the standing Army. Now, upon principle, I suppose we are all agreed; there is no one here that is in favor of a large, dangerous, standing army—one that would menace the liberties of the country, or bring them into jeopardy. So, on the other side; I think there is no one here who supposes that the police of this great empire can be conducted without some military force, some regular troops. There is no one who is for a large standing army; there is no one who is for no regular force; there is no one in favor of a universal or general police; there is also no one who is for no Federal police; there is no one who will argue that the fortifications of the country ought to be abandoned, and suffered to go to desolation and ruin; and so there is no one who will argue that any greater force than is necessary for the present emergencies, whatever they may be, shall be raised; there is no one who is in favor of a standing army of one hundred thousand men; there is no one, so far as I know, who is against a standing army of five thousand men.

The trouble, then, arises out of collateral questions, out of a view of the exigencies to which the armed power of the country may be applied if it shall be increased; and our difficulty on this subject is to discuss and consider it fairly in the absence of a knowledge of what will be the action of the Government on some other questions. I am perfectly clear in my own mind about what I would do. I would grant this increase of force if I knew that when it was granted the army which is now in Kansas would be withdrawn from that Territory. I am reluctant to increase the armed forces of the United States, while an army is remaining in Kansas; but I cannot know, nor can any one else know, what will be the disposition of the army in Kansas. I can only make up my judgment in regard to it from the facts which are before me; and taking the condition of the Kansas question as it stands, I have made up my mind that it approaches its solution, and that whether the Administration favors a free State, or whether it continues its intervention there in favor of a slave State in Kansas, things are reaching such a crisis that the President of the United States will not dare to maintain an army in Kansas to enforce a constitution which the people of that State reject, and against which they array themselves with armed force; and that is the issue which I expect to see if such a constitution shall be forced on Kansas.

I do not expect to see the Lecompton constitution carried through Congress—a constitution to establish slavery in the Territory of Kansas without the consent of the people; a constitution framed by a convention which they never called, which they have absolutely repudiated three distinct times, and at the moment when the Territorial Legislature representing, under the sanction of Congress, the people of that Territory, have abolished slavery and are sustained, as we all know they are, by five sixths or six sevenths of the whole people. Sir, I think there has been great skill in manipulating returns from Kansas Territory; I think there has been great skill manifested at the other end of the avenue in bringing this question before Congress; but I have no fear that there is such political skill here or in the Territory, separately or combined, as will be able to force that constitution upon Kansas, nor such boldness and desperation as to attempt to maintain it by the use of the Army.

My impression, therefore, is, that the army which is in Kansas will have to be withdrawn. Then I have endeavored to frame an amendment to this bill which would compel the withdrawal of the troops in Kansas. I have been unable to frame one that would be practicable, and I have, therefore, to give that up. Suppose I shall be disappointed in this, and the army is to be retained in Kansas: what then? Well, sir, if the army is to be retained in Kansas, it has got to be paid, and it is Congress that is to grant the supplies for the Army. When I look over this Chamber and the other, and see how they are constituted, I have no fear that the Congress of the United States this year will appropriate money to maintain an army in Kansas to enforce a constitution on the people which they have rejected, and to which they will never submit.

It is only a year ago, when we were much weaker here than we are now, that we brought this Government to a dead stand upon the appropriations for an army to maintain the usurpation of the Missouri invaders in Kansas, and to enforce slavery on that people. If all had stood with the same firmness that I stood, and that I recommended to others, the Government would have stood to this day before a soldier would have been in Kansas. There I shall stand now; and it may as well be understood first as last, that those who attempt to send an army into Kansas to maintain that constitution, must look into the Senate and House of Representatives elsewhere than to me, or any upon whom my opinions may operate, for support.

This disposes of the matter in that aspect. Yesterday I was quite disposed to take the substitute offered by my honorable and esteemed friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.] That Senator proposes to raise five thousand volunteers, and that they shall be disbanded at the expiration of one year. It is attractive, as showing a preference for a volunteer force to a regular force; but on reflection I see that his proposition is embarrassed with precisely the same difficulties with my own. If we raise five thousand volunteers upon the system which he recommends, and they are to be sent to Utah and employed there exclusively, as his proposition suggests, then the Army may all be left in Kansas, or five thousand regular troops may be left in Kansas, while the volunteers are sent to fight our battles in Utah; and therefore I do not find in that proposition any relief.

My very much respected friend from the State of Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] suggests that I am impressed with too deep a sense of the importance of an increased Army in the present emergency. I will only restate what I have stated before. It does not seem to me unreasonable to suppose that this great empire, extending now from the Atlantic coast, with fortifications there on every hill, which overlooks a port, with garrisons stretched across, on two or three lines, from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean, with the Indian population gathered into compact bodies, and pressed to the point of starvation, is to be maintained so as to preserve peace on the frontiers and in our provincial or territorial settlements, without a force of seventeen thousand, or eighteen thousand, or twenty thousand men, under any circumstances. I am prepared to expect that the Army of the United States must increase with the removal of the borders of the United States in every direction; and I am prepared to see those borders continually extending—I mean the borders of settlement. I suppose the Army to be adequate to the present emergencies, except for the urgent difficulties that have arisen in the Territory of Utah; and it is with reference to this, and this alone, that I am willing to increase the armed force of the United States, and to increase it so far as may be necessary for that purpose.

When I present this as my single reason for favoring this bill, I am told by my excellent friend from Maine, that the Government does not put its proposition on this ground, and that therefore we have no official evidences of an exigency existing in the Territory of Utah which would require this increase of the Army. I must admit that he speaks with much reason; but the sources of information are open to us, as well as open to the official organs of the Government—the Executive Departments. If the Secretary of War, if the whole Cabinet, were to tell me that there is no danger of disturbance, no danger of resistance, no danger of civil war in Utah, I would not believe one word that they should tell me, because I must judge from the facts which I know. The facts which I know are simply these: that a leprous band of foreigners are concentrated in a valley in the center of this continent; that they, having been unwisely favored by the Government of the United States with the appointment of their own officers and the making of their own laws, and the administration of their own laws, and the execution of their judgments till they have come to regard themselves as independent in their isolation and to defy the Government, are now found in combination with the Indian tribes by whom they are surrounded, and that the lives and the property of emigrants passing upon the highway across which they are located, between the Atlantic and Pacific, are exposed to depredations which are committed by them with the aid of the Indians.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will suspend his remarks for a moment. It becomes the duty of the Chair to call the attention of the Senate to an older special order set for this hour.

Mr. STUART. It is very necessary to proceed with this bill, and it certainly is due to the Senator from New York that he should have an opportunity to continue his remarks now. I therefore move to postpone, until to-morrow, all prior orders for the purpose of continuing the consideration of this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SEWARD. Now, Mr. President, we are told that notwithstanding these indications of a hostile nature on the part of that people, still there may be no collision. I agree to that. I trust there will be no collision; I am prepared to go further and say that there will be no collision, that there will be no outbreak, that there will be no civil war; but it is upon one condition, and that is that an armed demonstration, which has now become necessary, and which, whether necessary or not, has been adopted by the Administration and is in the course of execution, shall be made so imposing as to command respect and to extort obedience. Therefore it is that, with a view to save life, with a view to save the public peace, and with a view to bring the Territory of Utah into submission to the authorities of the land without bloodshed, I favor the increase of force which is to be sent there, and for no other reason. I would have it continue only so long as is necessary for that purpose.

I am told that these Mormons will not fight; and I know that it is not until after a long time that any community makes up its mind to defy an imperial power like this; but, sir, these Mormons are exceptional, in the first place. They have done nothing but fight from the beginning. They are an armed and military sect, a superstitious sect, and war is an element of their progress. They fought themselves out of the State of New York, when they were but a handful of men, into Ohio. They wrangled themselves out of Ohio into Missouri. Civil war grew up around them in Missouri, and they fought their way into Illinois, and established themselves at Nauvoo, and a civil war attended their exit from Nauvoo to the Salt Lake. They are worthless for any other purpose but to fight. Their religion makes them fighting men; for it is a religion which can submit to no civil authority that is administered or exercised over them by a Christian people. It is a religion which gives license, in the name of government and God, to the indulgence of the basest propensity of human nature. I never yet have read, I never yet have heard, I never yet have seen, any superstition of this kind that did not take in, as its weapon for proselytism, the sword.

Sir, the worst that can come of all this is, that I shall have committed an error; I shall have consented that the Government of the United States shall employ an additional force of five or six thousand men for this occasion. It will be a safe error, whatever may happen. If my proposition shall be adopted, as I trust it will, it will be guarded by a stipulation that the additional force shall be disbanded as soon as order is restored in Utah. To those who may object to that, I have but a single argument to urge in favor of the proposition. If there shall be a necessity, Congress will then be able to continue the force. If, on the other hand, my apprehensions are right in regard to the disturbances in Utah, and their probable course and development, then I shall feel that, whatever responsibility may rest upon me for errors of judgment here, there will not rest on me the responsibility of having left, by my own act or default or neglect, a single citizen of the United States to suffer violence at the hands of this belligerent people for want of the necessary supplies of troops and money, to compel them to respect the authorities under which we live, and forbear from cruelty upon the citizens of the Government which has fostered and protected them.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, it is with great reluctance that I throw myself on the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments; for I had hoped not again to feel the necessity of trespassing on the patience of the Senate; but I am impelled by a sense of duty to say a word or two, after the remarks which have fallen from the Senator from New York. He will not deem me unkind, if I say that I have listened with extreme pain and disappointment and mortification to the speech which he has made—a pain equal to that with which I heard the great statesman of New England, Daniel Webster, some eight years ago, with the ripe honors of nearly three score and ten years, bring himself and his fame and his reputation, and lay them down as an offering at the footstool of the slave power, to find himself used and spurned afterwards. This is no question of detail, no matter of unimportant legislation; but it is a deep, vital, fundamental question that must divide the people of this country, and must rally the friends of free, independent, and liberal government on the one side, and the supporters of power on the other. Sir, the question of increasing the military power has been a question which has divided the friends and the opponents of free government in all times; and as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. TOOMBS] well said, the experience of forty centuries speaks to us, in characters of blood, lessons of warning upon this great question. Let me say that the Army which this bill proposes is no small, no insignificant, no unimportant force. It will, if completed according to the terms of the bill, be equal to twenty-five thousand men. Give me a President disposed to use that military force, in order to coerce the people of these States to his purposes, and with the command of the Federal Treasury, and with the means of concentration which our multiplied system of railroads and steamboats furnishes, and he can come like the lightning of heaven at any moment, with this concentrated and tremendous power, upon any State, or upon any portion of the people that he chooses.

I do not desire to go to the Departments; I do not wish to go to the Secretary of War, or to the President, or to anybody else, to tell me what he wants with this Army. Here I will do all credit to the distinguished gentleman who has charge of the bill, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. DAVIS.] He tells us it is not for Utah; it is for no pressing emergency; it is for nothing of to-day; it is not to be used to meet the dangers which now environ us, and then to be laid aside; but he wants it for a permanent increase of the standing Army of this country. The use to which this standing Army is to be put is exemplified by the use which is now made of it in the Territory of Kansas. Two thousand five hundred troops are kept there; and the honorable Senator from New York says he would not vote for an increase if he thought they would be sent there. Sir, if I may be indulged in quoting a remark of a very illustrious and a very distinguished patriot and orator of the Revolution, I would say that I have no light to guide my path except that of experience; and the experience of the past year, the experience of the present moment, tells me to what uses the Army is to be put.

Here let me say, that while that most dangerous, that most fallacious, that most monstrous doctrine which has lately been broached and practiced upon by the Executive of this country, that under the general power to see the laws faithfully executed, he has a right to call out at his will the Army and the Navy, under the name of a posse; while that doctrine is proclaimed and acted upon, it is not a time for me, however it may be for others, to strengthen the hands of a man who is disposed to use it for such purposes and on such authority. I deny here, utterly and totally and forever, that he has any such right; and I say that it is a usurpation, a dangerous, an alarming, a fatal one—one that if it is tolerated by this Government, will bury our liberties beyond the reach of resurrection. No, sir; we cannot stand it. There is not a crowned head in Europe that would desire a greater power over the standing army of his realm than to make him the guardian to see that the laws are faithfully executed, and under that grant to have power to call in the army to do it. Sir, is it a time for me; is it a time for my friends, is it a time for the distinguished Senator from New York, upon whom the eyes and the hearts of the friends of liberty have centered and clustered, when such dangerous, and fatal, and damnable doctrines are proclaimed and practiced upon by the Executive of the United States, to vote seven thousand extra men to him? No, sir; it is not for me, however it may be for others.

The honorable Senator refers to the experience of two years ago, when the Government was brought to a dead lock, and when, he says, we were not so strong as we are now. We were not then so strong on this floor as we are now; but we are not so strong now but that our strength is weakness; for we are but a third of this body, with a majority of two thirds against us; and we were stronger then in the House of Representatives than we are to-day by a very considerable number. What was the result of that dead lock? Why the President said it was his duty to see that the laws were faithfully executed, and he issued his proclamation immediately, called Congress together, and kept them until they became subservient to his purposes. That is the history of that dead lock, and I do not doubt the President would like such another, with the same result.

In the history of my political life, I have seen a time when I stood solitary and alone the representative of the views which I entertain. I have looked with joy, with gladness, with gratitude to the increasing hosts that have rallied around our banner in the free States, until the Democratic party has been stricken down in the large majority of them. I have seen these accretions made to our ranks with gratitude, but I have seen also the accretions of other men coming to our ranks, who might have relieved me from a position which I occupied with reluctance, and that was to be the representative of this party, when it was nothing but a sentiment, and political power was not even among its dreams. But, sir, when a new star is dawning; when light is beaming in upon us; when one party has been shattered so that its history may be written as among the things of the past, and when from its ruins and its wrecks we were building up a new fortress to storm the battlements of the heretofore impregnable Democracy—at such a time as this, it does fill my heart with pain and my mind with fearful apprehensions, when I see any one upon whom I have looked with the hope that he might lead great hosts to the consummation of their hopes and their wishes, halting upon a question which, in my humble apprehension, is fundamental, vital, and characterizes the whole controversy.

We must come to an issue on this subject. The history of the republics that have lived and gone down is full of warning on this subject. We are apt to boast of what we are, and of what we have done, and to look back on our history with exultation and pride. Why, sir, we are not yet one hundred years old. The Republic of Rome lived more than six hundred years, strong, conquering the world, and adding new kingdoms to her territory; but she at last fell, and her liberties perished under the insidious policy which converted her into a great military power; until, at last, the imperial crown was set up at auction, and knocked off to the highest bidder from the walls of the Prætorian camp.

I confess that upon this subject I have very deep feelings; for, if the party with whom I act, the party with whom are my hopes and my expectations, do not take ground on this subject, firm and decided ground, against the increase of the military power of this Government, they will go down, and they ought to go down, and my humble voice and my humble services shall be found rallying the people to set the seal of their condemnation on a party with great professions and high principles, but, in my humble judgment, wanting in the carrying out of those measures which their policy and principles should dictate.

If I had supposed that I should speak on this subject to-day, I should have referred to an authority, and I should have had the author by me. I was reading it not long ago, an ancient history, in which, speaking of the final destruction of the Roman Empire, the author said that whenever the people began to get turbulent, whenever there began to be danger to the agrarian law being carried, or any great measure of popular liberty indicated, it was the favorite policy of the aristocracy to get up a foreign war; "for," said the historian, "in war the State is strong and factions weak." I believe it is just exactly that policy which dictated a foreign war whenever public liberty was in danger of being vindicated in ancient Rome, that dictates this Utah war now.

Let me ask, if I must go to that, where is the evidence that the affairs in Utah are more threatening now than they were when President Pierce appointed Brigham Young Governor? Are their sentiments any more leprous, or their practices any more abominable now, than they were then? Not that I know of. I have seen no evidence that their depravity or their principles have made progress since that time, and I am utterly at a loss, if this is an army to go to Utah, to know of any reason or any fact which would justify sending an army to Utah, when there is not, so far as I am advised, any difference in the state of affairs now from what there was when they were basking in the sunshine of executive favor.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him what is the date at which President Pierce appointed Brigham Young, Governor of Utah.

Mr. HALE. He was appointed by President Fillmore.

Mr. DAVIS. You said President Pierce.

Mr. HALE. Well, he continued him.

Mr. DAVIS. Ah!

Mr. HALE. He continued him in office.

Mr. DAVIS. He did not remove him.

Mr. HALE. Well, he did not remove him, but he kept him in, just in the same way that he kept in all his Federal officers. I am obliged to the Senator from Mississippi for correcting me; because when he makes such a very slight correction as that, it shows he is watching me closely, and sees that I am very correct. [laughter,] and need only that slight correction. The state of affairs there, so far as I am advised, is no different now from what it was then.

The honorable Senator from New York—I know he will not misinterpret what I am saying—says that if he errs it will be a safe error. I should like to make a very small addition there, and let it read "unsafe," and I shall then agree with him entirely. It is an unsafe error. It is an error that I fear cannot be retrieved. For several years past we have been marching in the path of increasing our Army; and it is avowed here on this floor, that this bill provides for a permanent increase. I see no backward steps. I am like the cautious animal who, when he was reproached for not going into the sick lion's den to pay his respects to the monarch, said he would have gone in, but, as he looked around to see the tracks, he found that they were all going in and none coming out. So it is with the increases of the Army; all the measures are for increasing and none for decreasing it; they are all one way; and I feel called upon to take my stand here, and say I will not vote another man or another dollar, to increase the expenses of the Army.

The honorable Senator suggests another thing which, it seems to me, has an infirmity about it which does not often attach to suggestions or arguments that come from his lips. He says we will give them this army, and then we shall have the power over them, because we will not pay them if we are not satisfied with the uses to which they are put; or we can refuse the pay. So we can; but we can refuse the men much easier. The argument is a great deal stronger for refusing the men, than it will be for refusing the pay after you have granted the men. If we are going to exercise that wholesome control over the Executive, which in theory belongs to this body and the body at the other end of the Capitol, here is the place, and now is the time to stop.

If things were twice as threatening as the honorable Senator thinks they are in Utah, let me ask you if we have not an Army more than four times sufficient for all the emergencies? I have heard it said by those who pretend to know, and who, I think, do know, that five thousand men will be as many as you can possibly use in Utah, even if there shall be a necessity for them, which is not conceded. We have an Army now capable of being filled up to eighteen thousand men, and, I am told, practically, it is fifteen thousand at this moment. I do not know the necessity of increasing the force beyond that, when they will not want one third of that force to put down the troubles in Utah.

Nor am I disposed to make very great drafts on my confidence in behalf of the manner in which this affair has been managed thus far, from the accounts which I have read, and which purport to be official accounts of the manner in which the force, that is now on its way to Utah, has been precipitated there. Utterly regardless, if you are to believe the accounts which have come to us, of any single suggestion, not only of military foresight, but of common prudence; you have sent your men there to suffer their beasts to die, and expose them to the inclemencies of the winter where they are locked up in the mountains. I think half the animals sent out with them died from mere starvation and the effects of cold. If this was a bill to furnish the Executive with prudence and discretion, I would vote liberal appropriations; but it being a bill to increase the military force at a time when I think the friends of liberty should be jealous of increasing it; and it being at a time when, if the accounts that we read be true, there has not been such conduct displayed as should entitle them to our confidence, I shall vote against it.

For these and many other reasons I am utterly opposed to the bill. Opposed as I am to it, I should not have said a word if there was not danger, from the position which the distinguished Senator from New York occupies, and justly occupies, in the public estimation, that the words which fell from his oracular lips might be supposed to compromise or compromise feebler and humbler men who sit at his feet. But for that, I should not have ventured thus openly before the Senate and the country to dissent from what he has said; but looking upon it as I do as a very dangerous error, and one which I am ill prepared to have go out under the sanction of his name unchallenged, I have deemed it my duty in all the kindness that I entertain for him, and all the profound respect that I feel for him, thus publicly to differ from him on a question which I consider vital and fundamental to the dearest and best interests of the country.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, I certainly shall not complain of my honorable friend from New Hampshire, or regard it as any unkindness that he has presented this subject in a manner which makes an issue between him and myself, or between me and others with whom I am accustomed to act in the country. I know his generosity; I know his independence; I know his spirit; and I know his devotion to the great principles which are common to us all. So far from complaining of it, I give him my thanks with all my heart. I never yet have seen the time when I could not bear a difference with friends, as I never yet have seen the time when I cared in the least for unkind or hostile reproaches from my enemies.

But, sir, I shall not imitate the example of my honorable friend, for I think he himself will come to the conclusion that, so far as the special objects which he and I have in view are concerned, it would have been quite as well to indulge me in an explanation of the reasons why I dissented from the course which he had adopted for his government, and to let it pass without being signalized as a great difference calculated to divide great bodies of men who follow his lead, or my own, or that of some other man.

I have not one word of complaint or reproof for the honorable Senator. I must, however, say for myself that I am not influenced by the appeal which the honorable Senator makes to me in regard to the success of the party of which he speaks. Sir, I have been some twenty years, more or less, in the public service, here and in my own State. Since I have been here I think every word that I have uttered in this Chamber has been recorded in books, and will go down to history; and so of a large portion of what I uttered in other places. I think I may claim that, when ten years shall have passed over the debates of to-day, when ten years of rest shall have been allowed to me after my service here shall have been completed, there will be no man living who, with the records all open before him, will be able to tell whether I belonged to one party or another. No, sir; I know nothing, I care nothing—I never did, I never shall, for party. I should be unfit to be here if I had not learned to postpone my own advantage to that of the respective and honored friends with whom I cooperate in public life; and if I had not learned to postpone their advantage and their benefit to the greater good of my whole country. If there is a reproach that is more proverbial against me throughout this land than any other, it is, that I dare postpone the good of the whole country under a false and demoralizing Administration, to the rights and interests of mankind under the laws of eternal truth and justice. Sir, I am not to be deterred from giving an honest vote by any fear of the party with which I act going down. I have a different idea about parties going down. I have a different idea about men going down. They are not thrown down by false analogies.

The honorable Senator has referred to a great statesman, now dead, who, for a large portion of his life, led the vanguard of the army of freedom—of freedom in the Territories, of freedom in the States; and who, on the great day when the contest came to a decisive issue, surrendered that great cause here in his place, and derided the proviso of freedom, the principle of the ordinance of 1787. The Senator considers this analogous to my case, because here I think five thousand soldiers not too many, and he thinks five thousand less just enough. That is all. If the question was, whether one hundred thousand should be the standing Army, we should both be against it. If the question was whether it should be five thousand, we should both vote in favor of that number. There is no principle in this dispute. It is a question of the application of great principles.

Now, I may say for myself, in regard to this point, that having had a sense more profound, perhaps, than others have conceived, for twenty years of my life, that it belonged to somebody to restore the equilibrium of freedom, which was depressed in the scales held by this Government so as to give slavery a preponderating balance, I, with as much power and ability as I have, have devoted myself to cooperate with the honorable Senator, and all others who might engage in that great and beneficent enterprise. I knew, sir, that there would be times when I should have to stand alone. I saw him stand alone; and I think the first ally who came to his side here was myself, which meeting could not be accomplished until one great State of the Union had been revolutionized, so as to produce a combination in favor of his purposes and mine, his principles and mine. I knew that I should have to stand alone; I have stood often alone; but I have never complained of it, and I do not now. I knew that in standing alone in this cause I exposed myself to a danger which easily besets the reformer; and that danger is, that the sense of injustice, the sense of isolation, will make him sometimes unjust, unwise, partisan, and factious. The danger of every reforming party is the danger of seeking to build itself up by drawing in false, spurious, and collateral issues, having nothing whatever to do with the main question. I am sorry to say, but I must say it, that my experience has only shown that there was, in the position which I have occupied, an exposure to this great danger of being beset to cut down this measure of the Administration here; cut off the head of this appointee of the Administration there; defeat the Administration on this appropriation for a railroad; defeat the Administration upon this measure of organization; cut off the supplies of the clerks in some of the Departments; refuse to give to those who will not vote for your measures and your policy your support for measures to which they may be attached.

I determined, knowing that I was exposed to this danger, that with the grace of God I never would be found wanting in my place to assert and maintain my principles, and the measures and policy which were to carry them out; and on the other hand, that when I should retire from the Senate there should be no man living who could charge that I had ever given a vote influenced by passion or prejudice against the interests and fame and honor of my whole country. If I have not been unsuccessful, I have done this. That is just what I am doing now, and the result will be just the same when we reach the end of this matter.

I remember that an excellent friend, half a dozen years ago, solicited me to lend my aid and my name to the organization of the American party, because it was necessary to give success to the principles of freedom which otherwise would be lost without it. "Well," I said, "suppose I should, what would be gained?" "Well, then, your cause would prevail, and you yourself would be elevated to a place," much higher than I dare speak of. "But," said I, "that movement is ephemeral; it will last only to-morrow, and how is the party to be relieved from the consequences of the falseness of its position then?" "Oh," said he, "we will look for you to do that." I was to lead them in and I was to lead them out!

I have but one word more to say, and I shall not detain the Senate. I am very sorry that the faith of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire is less than my own. He apprehends continual disaster. He wants this battle continued and fought by skirmishes, and to deprive the enemy of every kind of supplies. Sir, I regard this battle as already fought; it is over. All the mistake is that the honorable Senator and others do not know it. We are fighting for a majority of free States. There are already sixteen to fifteen; and whatever the Administration may do—whatever anybody may do—before one year from this time we shall be nineteen to fifteen. If that is so, what danger are we exposed to? It is that the free States will nevertheless go for slavery. If they will, that is a matter that we are not to help in this way. I do not believe that either. I think it is simply a question whether the Administration shall surrender, and grant freedom to Kansas, under the constitution of her choice, or whether they shall break their necks in resistance to it. The result is precisely the same in either way; and I come to my conclusion, notwithstanding I am so unfortunate as to differ from my honorable friend, that it is the safest side to vote the men and the money to save the lives and property of the American people.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. HENRY, his Secretary, communicating a duly certified copy of the constitution of Kansas, framed by the convention recently assembled at Lecompton.

Mr. MASON. I ask that the message which has just been received may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is it the pleasure of the Senate now to receive the message from the President of the United States? The Chair hears no objection.

The Secretary read the message.

Mr. BIGLER. Mr. President, I do not know that the reading of this message is to lead to discussion. I certainly do not intend to initiate a discussion. I rise for the purpose of submitting the usual motion, which I hope may guard the Senate against the embarrassments which have surrounded us under similar circumstances. If this message is to be printed at all, it is important that it be printed promptly. I intend to submit a motion that the message be printed, and then a motion that the constitution be referred to the Committee on Territories. The first proposition can be disposed of, and, if discussion is to come up, let it be on the question of reference. I move that the message be printed.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I suppose one motion will cover the whole—that the message and documents be referred to the Committee on Territories, and printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to print goes to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BIGLER. I suggest that by common consent the usual number be printed, without reference.

Mr. SEWARD. Let it be printed, by common consent.

Mr. DOUGLAS. After the message is referred, I have a paper to present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rule is imperative; but by the unanimous consent of the Senate, the printing may be ordered without a reference to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am unwilling that this paper shall pass from the consideration of the Senate without any further notice. I look on it as a perverted and incorrect history, from the beginning to the end, of the difficulties in Kansas. It is repeated again, I know, for we have had this history detailed here in this same light a number of times before. Assuming the positions this paper does, as I understand from hearing it read by the Secretary, I am unwilling that it shall be ordered to be printed and be referred, and pass from the consideration of the Senate at this time, without putting in my disclaimer, at least, against the monstrous doctrines avowed, and the monstrous perversions of fact that are embodied in it. Even from this imperfect hearing of it I am able to perceive that it is inconsistent with itself. Why, sir, it is recommended, if I understand the document, that Kansas be admitted into the Union under what is called the Lecompton constitution, upon the ground that even if that constitution be in violation of the will of the people of Kansas, the Legislature which convenes under the constitution may provide at once for its change; and yet the author of that declaration tells you that the act of a Legislature, convened in pursuance of law, which ordered an election to be taken upon this very constitution, before it went into effect, to determine whether the people of Kansas would have it or not, is a nullity. What, sir! The legitimate Legislature of Kansas has no authority to prevent a constitution from going into force, and has authority, the day after it is in force, to provide for declaring it a nullity! Upon what principles can such doctrines be maintained? If this constitution, when adopted, is not binding on the people of Kansas until it can be changed, in pursuance of its own provisions, will any man tell me how it is binding on the people of Kansas before it is adopted? Was there anything sacred in the Territorial Legislature which called the Lecompton convention, that made its acts irrevocable? Where did it get the authority to enact a law which should be irrevocable, and beyond the power of a subsequent Legislature?

But, sir, I have been induced to call attention to this document chiefly on account of the detail of facts which it pretends to give. It sets out and argues that, to preserve our institutions, we must submit to the law; that the whole difficulties in Kansas have arisen out of a disposition to disregard the law. That is assuming the whole ground. The people of Kansas deny that they have any territorial laws. The President speaks of a usurpation on the part of the people. Why, sir, the usurpation is on the part of those who have attempted to force laws upon the people in violation of their rights. The origin of all the difficulties in Kansas since its organization as a Territory was the first usurpation—the carrying of the election of March 30, 1855, by violence, and installing in authority a set of usurpers. That this was done, any man at all acquainted with the history of Kansas affairs knows to be true. It has been proven and conclusively established by a commission which was sent by the House of Representatives to Kansas Territory to inquire into the facts.

This being so, the enactments of these usurpers do not deserve to be dignified by the name of laws. The President of the United States has brought his army to sustain this usurpation. There was no way for the people of Kansas to escape from the despotism, except by setting up a government for themselves in opposition to it. It is not in the nature of usurpers to provide the means for their own overthrow. The position of the people of Kansas is not unlike that of an individual in a case which I will imagine. Suppose, sir, your dwelling, to-night, should be surrounded by a dozen ruffians, who should enter it violently and turn you out of it, the Army of the United States and the peace officers standing by until the outrage is committed; and then, when you rally your friends to take possession of your own house, and occupy your own premises, you are met by the Army of the United States, and told, "Sir, you cannot enter the threshold of your door, except you enter it according to law;" that is, according to the law of those who have violently taken possession of your house: when would you get possession? Not till doomsday. The army comes to interfere after the outrage is committed, to uphold and sustain it; and the man who goes to take possession of his own is told that he must do it in a peaceful manner, and he must do it in accordance with the way pointed out by the ruffians who have thrown him out of doors. This is precisely the condition of the people of Kansas, and this is the kind of law which that people have justly and rightly refused to submit to.

The President alludes, in this message, to the employment of the army in Kansas. Although he talks of rebellion in Kansas, and of attempts at usurpation on the part of the people who have undertaken to set up a government of their own, in opposition to the government of the usurpers, I undertake to say that there is no usurpation in Kansas worse than that committed by the Chief Magistrate of this nation, with his army in that Territory. The army has been employed there without authority of law. It will not do for Senators to say, as has been said on this floor, that the President is charged with the execution of the laws; that it is made his duty to see that the laws be faithfully executed; and that this gives him power to use the army for that purpose. He can see that the laws are faithfully executed, only in the manner pointed out by law. He has no general, unlimited power to see that the laws be faithfully executed in any way he may deem proper. He would become the veriest military despot in the world, if, under that general grant of authority, he could use the Army and Navy at his pleasure, to enforce what he might think proper to call the laws. The President's duty is pointed out by the Constitution and by the laws of the land. If he has any authority to use an army in Kansas, he has that authority under and by virtue of law. I should like to see the statute which authorizes him to employ it as he has done.

We have but two statutes on this subject; one is the act of 1795, which authorizes the President of the United States to employ the militia to repel invasion, and also upon the call of a Legislature of the State, or of the Executive when the Legislature cannot be convened, to put down a formidable resistance to the laws, which is too powerful to be overcome in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings. Then we have the act of 1807, which authorizes the President of the United States to employ the Army and Navy in cases where he was before authorized to employ the militia; and he can only employ the Army and Navy after he has followed out the directions prescribed by the act of 1795. There has been some controversy about this power to employ the army in Kansas to enforce territorial statutes, and it is therefore that I allude to it particularly. There is not a word in any statute authorizing the President of the United States to employ the Army and Navy in the enforcement of laws until you come to the act of 1807. Now, what is that act? I will read it:

"That, in all cases of insurrection, or obstruction to the laws, either of the United States or of any individual State or Territory, where it is lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia for the purpose of suppressing such insurrection, or of causing the laws to be duly executed, it shall be lawful for him to employ, for the same purposes, such part of the land or naval forces of the United States as shall be judged necessary; having first observed all the prerequisites of the law in that respect."

This grants no additional power to the President; it merely authorizes him to use the Army and the Navy for the same purposes which he was before authorized to call forth the militia to accomplish; and he can only do that after he has observed the prerequisites of the law in that respect. Now, we refer back to the law of 1795 to ascertain the cases in which the President of the United States was authorized to employ the militia; and I will read those sections conferring the power, that we may have a clear idea of the cases. As I read them, I should like to know (and it will be no interruption to me for any gentleman to show) by which of these sections it is that the President of the United States gets the authority to use the Army, as he has done in Kansas? The first section provides—

"That whenever the United States shall be invaded, or be in imminent danger of invasion from any foreign nation or Indian tribe, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth such number of the militia of the State, or States, most convenient to the place of danger, or scene of action, as he may judge necessary to repel such invasion, and to issue his orders for that purpose, to such officer or officers of the militia, as he shall think proper."

I presume no one will contend that under that clause authority is given to employ the army in the Territory of Kansas. The second clause of the first section is this:

"And in case of an insurrection in any State, against the government thereof, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, on application of the Legislature of such State, or of the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened), to call forth such number of the militia of any other State, or States, as may be applied for, as he may judge sufficient to suppress such insurrection."

Clearly that gives no power to employ the militia of the United States to enforce any State law, unless it amount to an insurrection against the government thereof.

"That whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed, or the execution thereof obstructed, in any State, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals by this act, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia of such State, or of any other State or States, as may be necessary."

There, clearly, the power is not given to the President to call forth the militia in order to enforce the execution of any other than laws of the United States.

The third section makes it the duty of the President, before calling forth the militia, to issue a proclamation commanding the insurgents to disperse peaceably within a limited time.

I have read the only statute there is, conferring on the President of the United States authority to use the Army and Navy in the execution of laws. He is authorized by the act of 1807 to use them where he was authorized by previous acts to use the militia, and in no other instances; and he was only authorized, by previous acts, to use the militia to repel invasion, or in the enforcement of laws of the United States, or in case of an insurrection in a State "against the government thereof." Under these statutes, then, it is clear that the President of the United States might, after complying with the provisions of the act, and issuing his proclamation, and not before, have employed the army for the purpose of enforcing the laws of the United States in Kansas; but when he goes another step, and employs those troops for the purpose of enforcing the territorial laws, which are not laws of the United States, I deny his authority. He can only use the troops to enforce the State or territorial laws in a case of insurrection "against the government thereof." That is the only instance in which the President of the United States can march his armies into the States of this Union, to sustain their local governments. It is only when an insurrection exists, threatening the existence of the State government, and when he is called upon by its Legislature, or, if it cannot be convened, by its Executive; and then he must first issue his proclamation commanding the insurgents to disperse.

The Army has been used in Kansas, as is admitted, for the purpose of enforcing the territorial laws against the people; and yet the President of the United States talks about usurpation. That we may understand distinctly how his Army has been used in Kansas, I will call attention for a moment to the document communicated to this body by the President of the United States. In Governor Walker's letter to the Secretary of State, of July 15, 1857, occurs this passage; and from it we can ascertain the purpose for which the Army was sent to Kansas:

"In view of my official letter of the 2d of June, 1857, and of the conditions upon which I agreed, with great reluctance, to accept the position of Governor of this Territory, namely, that General Harney, in whom I had great confidence, and who was well known to the people of Kansas, and greatly respected by them, should be ordered from Florida, put in special command in Kansas with a large body of troops, and especially of dragoons and a battery, and retained there, subject to my directions, for military operations, if necessary, in Kansas, until the danger was over, and in the absence of which I never would have accepted this office."

He then goes on to say, that in view of these facts, he is surprised at an order which had been issued to remove the troops from Kansas. This shows the purpose for which they were sent there. Governor Walker, on accepting the office, took it on the condition that two thousand troops should go to Kansas and remain there, subject to his direction, for military operations. Now, sir, does it lie in the mouth of those who contend for law and order, to justify such a proceeding as that? There is no law, there is no statute of the United States authorizing the President to place two thousand troops at the disposal of Governor Walker for military operations in Kansas, and no man can show such a statute. In carrying out this plan I find communicated with the same documents an order from General Harney, dated July 15, 1857. General Harney, in a letter to Governor Walker, in answer to an application which had been made to him for troops, says:

"I desire to inform you that I have directed Lieutenant Colonel Cooke, of the second dragoons, to proceed with seven companies of his regiment, all the disposable force of that arm, to the vicinity of the city of Lawrence, and to report his force to yourself, as a posse comitatus to execute such orders as you may deem proper to give him in that capacity."

Here is a regiment of seven companies placed under the orders of the Governor as a posse comitatus. Why, sir, what is a posse comitatus? It is the power of the county, summoned by a civil officer to aid him in the execution of process. Who ever before heard that the Governor was the person to execute process? A Governor summoning a posse comitatus! The thing is unheard of. It is a mere pretense under which to escape the odium which would follow the employment of the Army for illegitimate purposes.

Again: Governor Walker, in his letter of the 20th July, uses this language:

"There is imminent danger, unless the territorial government is sustained by a large body of the troops of the United States, that, for all practical purposes, it will be overthrown or reduced to a condition of absolute imbecility."

It is strange that a government established upon the great principle of popular sovereignty, as we are told, should need an army to sustain it, and be in danger of falling into a condition of absolute imbecility, unless two thousand troops were placed at the disposal of the Governor to maintain it. He continues:

"I am constrained, therefore, to inform you that, with a view to sustain the authority of the United States in this Territory, it is indispensably necessary that we should have immediately stationed at Fort Leavenworth at least two thousand regular troops, and that General Harney should be retained in command."

It is not only necessary to have two thousand troops as a posse comitatus, but General Harney is to command them; and they were to be ordered from Florida on condition that Governor Walker should accept the Governorship of Kansas! Just imagine a posse comitatus of two thousand men summoned by a civil officer in Kansas from the remote State of Florida, thousands of miles distant, with General Harney to command them, armed with muskets and cannon, to aid him in the execution of civil process! The statement of the proposition shows its absurdity. The Governor further proceeds in the same letter to say:

"The only practical way to maintain the peace of the Territory, and to inaugurate a party which would support the Constitution and the Union, is to unite the free-State Democrats here (who were with us in the election of 1852) with the pro-slavery party of Kansas."

The only way to maintain the peace of the Territory is to unite the free-State men who were with them in 1852, with the pro-slavery party; and it is in the same letter that he wants two thousand troops to carry out that object. That was a part of the non-interference with the affairs of Kansas about which we have heard so much. In the same letter, (for Governor Walker seems to have been beset with the idea that there was no other way to force the people to submit to the usurpation which had been established except by an army,) he again calls attention to the necessity of troops in this language:

"Permit me, before closing this communication, to renew my statement, that such is the revolutionary condition of affairs in Kansas that the territorial government is in imminent danger of overthrow if I am not sustained by at least two thousand troops, chiefly dragoons, and two batteries. The presence of such a body of troops would probably prevent a conflict."

There, sir, you have the purpose for which this army was sent to Kansas, and kept in Kansas, as the President tells us to-day, at the sacrifice of the expedition to Utah. This Administration is responsible, not only for the despotism which has existed in Kansas, but it is responsible for the lives that shall be lost, and the property destroyed, and the suffering endured, upon the Rocky Mountains, by an insufficient force sent forth too late to reach their destination before the winter snows overtook them. The Administration is responsible for all this, and it grows out of its action in regard to Kansas. It is admitted now, in the document before you, that the reason for sending so small a force to Utah was that Governor Walker insisted on their being in Kansas. And for what? For no purpose which the law would justify.

But we see, further, the purposes for which this army was kept in Kansas by reference to another portion of this correspondence. Governor Walker, in another part of his letter of July 15, says:

"It is universally admitted here that the only real question is this: whether Kansas shall be a conservative, constitutional, Democratic, and ultimately free State, or whether it shall be a Republican and Abolition State; and that the course pursued by me is the only one which will prevent the last most calamitous result, which, in my opinion, would soon seal the fate of the Republic."

The admission of Kansas as a Republican State would be a most calamitous result, and soon seal the fate of the Republic, according to Governor Walker's opinion, who was sent out there on the avowed doctrine that it was wrong for the Federal Government to interfere in the affairs of a Territory. He says further, in another communication:

"If this can be accomplished the great object of my mission will have been attained, and Kansas come into the Union as a conservative State, without any confiscation of the slave property now within her limits."

That is, upon the condition that he could bring about a union between the free-State Democrats and the pro-slavery party, the great object of his mission would be accomplished, and Kansas would come into the Union without the confiscation of slave property. We have here, in an official letter from the Governor of Kansas Territory to the Secretary of State, an acknowledgment that the object of his mission to Kansas was to bring about that union of parties which would bring Kansas into the Union as a State, without a confiscation of slave property. Call you that non-interference? Sir, would it be possible to conceive a clearer case of interference—improper interference with the affairs of a Territory, than is exhibited in this communication from Governor Walker which I have read? In the first place, he avows that he went to that Territory for the purpose of bringing about a party result; that that was the object of his mission; and he says that that could not be brought about unless he was sustained by an army of two thousand men, headed by a particular general, with two batteries at least; and yet all this is done and carried on in the name of non-interference and of law; and the President of the United States, who sanctions and sustains it, talks about the necessity of enforcing the law! His predecessor, for whom I have no great respect, in his administration of Kansas affairs hesitated to go thus far. President Pierce, in a message sent to this body in December, 1856, in speaking of the authority of the President of the United States to use the Army, employs this language:

"The President of the United States has not power to interpose in elections, to see to their freedom, to canvass their votes, or to pass upon their legality, in the Territories any more than in the States. If he had such power, the Government might be republican in form, but it would be a monarchy in fact; and if he had undertaken to exercise it in the case of Kansas, he would have been justly subject to the charge of usurpation, and of violation of the dearest rights of the people of the United States."

What, then, shall we say of that President who has done this very thing? On the authority of President Pierce, may I not charge him with usurpation—a violation of the dearest rights of the people of the United States? Sir, I make that charge; not upon this authority, however, but upon the authority of the Constitution and the laws, and the rights of the people of Kansas, every one of which has been trampled under foot by the present Chief Magistrate, in the use of his army in Kansas.

I know that the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] the other day, undertook to qualify this language of President Pierce, and say that he only declared the President had no right to volunteer to defend the ballot-box. The word "volunteer" is not here in this connection. I have read the whole sentence; and if President Pierce was right in what he said as to the authority of the President to use the Army, what shall be said of President Buchanan, who, in a letter which he wrote to citizens of Connecticut, says:

"It is my imperative duty to employ the troops of the United States, should this become necessary, in defending the convention against violence whilst framing the constitution, and in protecting the 'bona fide inhabitants,' qualified to vote under the provisions of this instrument, in the free exercise of the right of suffrage, when it shall be submitted to them for their approbation or rejection."

Contrast this language of President Buchanan with the language of his predecessor, and you find that he assumes a position which his predecessor pronounced usurpation and a violation of the dearest rights of American citizens. I know that there are those who sustain them both—who sustained President Pierce and gave him credit for refusing to use the Army to protect the polls, and sing hosannas to President Buchanan for using it for the very same purpose. Surely both cannot have been right; unless the usurpers who had control of the ballot-boxes protected by Mr. Buchanan were entitled to greater consideration than the lawful judges who held the election which President Pierce refused to protect.

Now, sir, I think I have shown from the statutes and from the previous doctrine as laid down even by President Pierce, that there is no authority vested in the President to use the Army as Mr. Buchanan has been using it in Kansas, and that it ill becomes him to talk about the people being usurpers when the only usurpation they are guilty of is that of resisting usurpers. The people of Kansas have been forbearing; they have sought to avoid collision with the United States troops; have submitted to degradation; and many of them have been guarded in tents in Kansas for months by United States soldiers. They probably thought it policy to avoid a conflict with United States soldiers; but those troops had no right to take and hold in prison the citizens of Kansas. Those troops were as much guilty of a violation of law, and as much usurpers, as they would be if they were to march into this Capitol and drive Congress from its possession; and the people of Kansas would have been justified in resisting them equally as we would be justified in defending ourselves against their entrance into this Capitol. The gilt buttons and epaulets on a soldier no more protect him in usurpation than the citizen; and when he goes forth on an unlawful and illegal purpose, or is used as a mere instrument in the hands of one who is usurping authority, to trample on the just rights of the citizen, every one has a right to meet him and crush him if he can.

The President tells us in the message that the people of Kansas have had the slavery question submitted to them. I deny it. The very document he communicates to us proves that it is not so. That instrument declares that, whether a particular clause be voted in or voted out of the constitution, slavery shall exist in Kansas. It is a slave State to all intents and purposes, whether what was called the slavery clause was voted in or voted out. That provision applied only to the future introduction of slaves into Kansas. He tells us in one part of his message (and I call attention to the contradiction, for whenever an individual starts out to establish error, he will always fall into contradictions) that Kansas is as much a slaveholding Territory, under the Constitution of the United States, as any State in this Union is a slaveholding State. He tells us that slavery exists in Kansas under the Constitution of the United States, and that it is a slave Territory. Notwithstanding that, he tells us in another part of his message that the people had submitted to them the question whether they would have slavery or not, when he knows that the only question submitted was as to the future introduction of slavery, and that there was a clause in the constitution providing that the slaves then in existence should never be emancipated or interfered with, and it was made a slave State then and forever so far as that constitution is concerned, let the people have voted which way they would on the particular clause submitted to them for approval or rejection.

The President tells us also in the message, if I heard it correctly, that the will of the majority is supreme when asserted in a lawful manner. I believe that is very nearly the language used, and yet after enunciating that as a fundamental principle, he tells us that the will of the majority in Kansas, as expressed on the 4th of January last, when they voted down the Lecompton constitution, should be set at naught though nobody contends that it was not done in an orderly manner. How is it, if the will of the majority when expressed in a lawful manner is omnipotent, that the people of Kansas in expressing their will on the 4th of January last, are to be told that their action is a nullity and that they could take no action which would affect the proposed constitution?

Sir, this whole transaction is of a piece with what has been going on in Kansas from the beginning. The despotism and the outrages in Kansas commenced at a very early day; and the party which has upheld and sustained them has been changing its position ever since, almost from day to day. It started out with the proposition that the Missouri compromise must be repealed, not for the purpose of allowing slavery to go into Kansas—that was not the intention; but for the purpose of allowing the people to do as they pleased. This meant the people of the Territory. It was so argued and so understood all over the northern section of the Union at least. The next step, after removing the Missouri compromise, which kept slavery out of Kansas, was to deny the authority of the people of the Territory to exclude slavery. This was done at Cincinnati. The Cincinnati convention avowed itself in favor of the great principle of popular sovereignty, and declared that the people of a Territory, when they were sufficiently numerous to form a State constitution for themselves, ought to have the right to regulate their own domestic institutions in their own way; that is, when they come to form a State. Why, sir, nobody ever denied the power of the people of a State to form their institutions in their own way. There was never any controversy between parties about that.

The complaint in Kansas now is, not that the people may not form their institutions in their own way, but that they are having no opportunity to do it; that the despotism established over them in the beginning has been such as to deprive them of that right; and this is testified to by all the officials who ever went to Kansas. All the Governors, and all the Secretaries, tell you that the people of Kansas have had no fair chance to form their own institutions. They were disfranchised either by registry laws or by requiring particular qualifications for voting, or else they were cheated in the returns made. As to the Lecompton convention, we all know that half the counties of the Territory were disfranchised utterly in the choice of delegates, and in the other half the registry was very imperfect, and no one but a registered voter had authority to vote for a delegate to the convention. Yet knowing all this, the President tells us that the people of Kansas had a fair opportunity to elect delegates to this convention, and that it is their own fault if they did not avail themselves of it!

The principle of non-intervention, upon which the Kansas-Nebraska bill was passed, has been set at naught. Here you have the evidence patent and open to the country, of the Governor using his official influence, backed up by troops, to bring about a particular party result, and saying, in his official correspondence, that the admission of a Republican State into this Union would be fraught with danger to the Union itself. Sir, what is meant by a Republican State? We mean nothing more than a free State. A Republican State is a State which does not tolerate slavery. The doctrines of the Republican party, which are talked about as being inimical to the Union, are based on the Constitution, as our fathers understood and administered it. It advocates, so far as I know anything about it—and I speak but for myself—no principle inimical to any State in this Union. I am for giving to every State all the rights that the Constitution of the United States guarantees to it. I would not interfere with slavery where it exists, but I think it a very different thing to prevent the spread of slavery into free Territories.

Here I will allude, for a moment, to a remark made, I think, by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIGLER] a few days ago. He stated that it was very strange the Republican party which had been in favor of denying to the people of the Territories any rights, should now be advocates of popular sovereignty, and in favor of the submission of a constitution to the people for their adoption. Does not the Senator from Pennsylvania recognize the difference between a State and a Territory? Sir, we did contend, and do now contend, that Congress has authority over its Territories, to govern them as shall be best for the interests of the people of the Territories. Believing it to be best for the interests of the people living in a Territory not to have slavery when in a territorial condition, we think Congress has the right to keep it out; but we do not contend that Congress may interfere with slavery in a State, or with the domestic institutions of a State.

Now, sir, I want to know what has become of the principle of the Nebraska bill, that has been talked about so much—the principle of self-government and popular sovereignty? Did it apply to a Territory or a State? If it applied to anything, it applied to a Territory. The Kansas-Nebraska bill certainly has no force in any State of this Union. It was never intended to have force in a State. Even those who advocate it tell you that it provided simply for a territorial government, and that it did not even convey authority to form a State government. If that be so, what is the great principle of that bill? What is the popular sovereignty of it? Is it the right to regulate slavery? All those who advocated that bill deny the right of the people of a Territory to settle the subject of slavery for themselves, except when they come to be a State. They indorse the Dred Scott decision in the same way that the President understands it, as establishing slavery in all the Territories of the United States. What, then, is the principle that was established by that bill? It is no principle at all. No great rights were conferred by it on the people of the Territory of Kansas not possessed by the people of every other Territory heretofore organized. Even those who contended for this right of the people of a Territory to regulate the subject of slavery, have abandoned it, and now indorse the monstrous doctrine put forth by the Supreme Court, establishing slavery in all the Territories.

By the way, permit me here to remark, for I do not mean to discuss that matter on the present occasion, that the opinions of the majority of the judges of the Supreme Court are just upon a par with the action of the army in Kansas. The army were a set of usurpers there, or were used by usurpers, for unlawful purposes, and the court have undertaken to usurp authority, and pronounce an opinion on a question not before them. Judge Taney says in so many words that the case is dismissed for want of jurisdiction; and yet, after dismissing the case because the court had no right to pass upon it, the majority go on and undertake to express opinions about the slavery question. Their opinions are worth just as much as, and no more than, the opinions of any other gentlemen equally respectable in the country. The fact they wore gowns, sat on the bench, and pronounced them in a case not before the court, gives them no additional sanction. Mr. Buchanan knows—it would be an insult to his intelligence to suppose that he did not know, however he may assume the contrary—that no such question has been authoritatively settled as that slavery exists in the Territories. There never has been a case when it could be authoritatively settled; for in the Dred Scott case every tyro knows that the court decided they had no jurisdiction of it, and the majority dismissed it for that reason. The minority, who disagreed, believed that the court had jurisdiction; and it was necessary, in their view of the case, to pass upon all the questions raised, and to decide them upon their merits; but in the opinion of the majority which controlled, there being no jurisdiction to pass upon the case, what they have said in regard to questions which might have arisen if the court had jurisdiction to investigate them, is out of the case, and is of no authority whatever, either in court or elsewhere.

Our position in regard to the rights of the people of a Territory—or my position, for I speak for nobody else—is, that during the territorial condition, the people have such rights as Congress confers upon them. Congress passes an act organizing a Territory. That act is the charter under which the people of the Territory act; the constitution, if you please, by which they are bound. If Congress thinks proper to confer on the people of a Territory the right to exclude slavery, they undoubtedly may do it. Congress may itself exclude it, and may always do what it grants authority to the people of the Territory to do through their Legislature. The Republican party, so far as I understand its principles, never denied the authority of the people of a Territory to exclude slavery through their Territorial Legislature. They have asserted that it would be proper for Congress, in the first instance, to exclude it. If Congress will not, let the people exercise the right. Either may do it—the people, in subordination to the act of Congress, or Congress itself. It is a total misapprehension of the doctrines we advocate, to say that we deny all right to the people of a Territory, or that we oppose the doctrine of popular sovereignty in the foundation of a State government. The latter question was never raised between parties, the whole controversy being as to the government of the Territories, and not the States. This attempt to transfer the principle of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, which was applicable to a Territory, if it had force anywhere, to a State, is a total misconception of the bill, and is applying it to a condition of things for which it was not made.

Having said thus much in regard to this extraordinary message, I have no objection to the motion which has been made, that it be printed and referred.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I shall reserve to another occasion any reply that I may have to make to the onslaught which my colleague has just made on the Nebraska bill, and the provisions and principles involved in it. I need not say to the Senate or to the country that I shall at all times hold myself ready to vindicate the principles, the provisions, and the history of that measure from any assaults, no matter from whence they may come. I do not choose, however, at this time, to be drawn into the discussion of that question. Nor shall I go into the discussion of the question presented by the message. My opinions have been expressed to the Senate, clearly, I think, so that all present understand them. If they do not, I could not hope to make them more specific to-day. I think the better course, therefore, is for us to refer the message at once to the committee, where it can be examined, and the authority upon which it rests can be investigated, where the matters of disputed evidence and disputed facts can be reviewed and brought before the Senate in a regular form for action, when we can go into the discussion of the measure.

Hoping that that will be the course of the Senate, I ask leave to present a remonstrance, signed by certain gentlemen as Governor and State officers elect in the Territory, or State of Kansas, whichever it may be called, protesting against the reception of that State into the Union under the constitution framed at Lecompton. I move that this remonstrance be also referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. SEWARD. And be printed.

Mr. DOUGLAS. And that it be printed.

Mr. TOOMBS. Mr. President, but for the character of the assault which the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] has thought proper to make on the message of the President of the United States, I should have been content to let it go to the country and vindicate itself; but on account of the nature of that assault, I deem it to be my duty to express my hearty coöperation with the policy which the message vindicates; and at the same time to express my gratification at the signal ability and power with which the great principles lying at the bottom of that policy have been presented to the American people by the Chief Magistrate of the Union.

He has proposed to the American Congress, as becomes his duty under the Constitution, that the Territory of Kansas be admitted to her place as one of the sovereign States of the Union. His policy is that it shall be done now. Upon the point that Kansas ought to be admitted into the Union, it seems that all the people of Kansas, and all the representatives of the people of the United States, in both Houses of Congress, for the last three years, have agreed. Since 1856, there appears to have been no question with any portion of the inhabitants of Kansas that it was their desire to come into the Union. A large portion, said to be a majority by those gentlemen who represent what is known as the Republican party, formed for themselves, nearly three years ago, a constitution known as the Topeka constitution, and came here and asked for admission into the Union under that instrument. A very considerable portion of both Houses of Congress, a majority in the other branch, and a large minority in this, voted to admit Kansas into the Union under what was known as the Topeka constitution. Another portion of the people of Kansas, acting under the authority of the territorial government, and in obedience to law, took no part in the action on the Topeka constitution. Then the Territorial Legislature submitted the question to all the people of Kansas, whether they would come into the Union or not, and a very large majority of the then inhabitants said they desired to come into the Union. In conformity to their wishes, thus expressed, the Territorial Legislature called the Lecompton convention. That convention met in pursuance of this act of the Legislature, which had for its authority the expressed will of the people of Kansas at an election where all had an opportunity of voting, and where, as far as I am informed, no man complained that he had not a fair opportunity of voting. Then, those of the people who were on the side of law and order, on the side of the territorial government recognized by every Department of the Government of the United States, said: "We too desire admission into the Union."

In 1856, this body seeing that this was the desire of all parties in Kansas, the Topeka party being before us with a constitution seeking admission, and believing it to be illegal and not in proper form to justify her admission into the Union, other propositions were then made from various quarters. The Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD], acting in behalf of the friends of the Topeka constitution, the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS], probably other Senators, and myself, suggested plans for doing that which it was settled everybody in Kansas wanted us to do, and everybody here was willing to do, if we could agree on the mode of doing it. I say, therefore, the admission of Kansas is conceded to be necessary, proper, and desirable, by all the people of Kansas, and also by all the representatives of the sovereigns among whom she desires to take her place.

Then I suppose there can be no difficulty about so much of the policy of the President as recommends that Kansas shall be admitted into the Union. Waiving all question as to the number of her people, for various and sufficient reasons, it is admitted on all hands that it is proper to admit her into the Union. The point of dispute is, how shall she be admitted? The President of the United States says she ought to be admitted under the Lecompton constitution. Why? Why ought she to be admitted under that constitution rather than under the Topeka constitution? The President states historical facts, which no man can deny. Those persons who framed the Topeka constitution, for reasons which I do not pretend to say were true or false, as I am simply giving the history of the affair, said: "We will trample under foot the Territorial Legislature"—and the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL], to-day, indorses and defends their action for doing so—"we will not recognize this government; we assume that we are a majority of the people, and we claim, proprio vigore, by virtue of being a majority of the people of the United States in the Territory of Kansas, that we can make our own constitution, not only without law, but against law, and demand admission into the Union, even against the existing government of the Territory." That I deny; that the President denies. There is the issue, and it is a grave issue. It is an issue lying at the very foundation of public liberty—an issue that will survive this question, and a thousand such.

The President says Kansas ought to be admitted under the Lecompton constitution, because it comes with legality; it comes clothed with the dignity of representing the will of the majority, legally expressed. That is the ground on which he puts it. What, then, are the historical facts? The Topeka constitution is avowedly in opposition to the existing government. Its supporters have made that declaration everywhere, and have boasted of it until this moment. It is a pretended government, organized in opposition to the territorial government, which, as I before stated, has been recognized by the President, by his predecessor, by both branches of the last Congress and of this Congress, by every department of legitimate government, and by a Republican House of Representatives themselves; for at the last session of Congress both Houses voted for the payment of the Territorial Legislature. I say the validity of the Territorial Legislature was recognized by the former Executive, Mr. Pierce, and has been recognized by the present Executive. It has been recognized by the Senate and House of Representatives. Every department of this Government has recognized it, except Topeka, if that be a department of the Government. If parties be referred to in this connection, I say that it has been recognized by the Democratic party, and also by the Republican party. Every department of this Government, and all the party organizations, have recognized the legality of the territorial government; and if they had not, it could be well and easily maintained upon irrefragable legal principles. No man, I suppose, denies our right to make a territorial government of some sort. No man denies that we have made such a government for Kansas, that we have had governors, judges, marshals, and constables there; that we have had a code of laws and been acting under them, and have upheld them but too vigorously, according to the account of the Senator from Illinois. Such being the fact, the opposing constitution is a rebellious constitution, made by men in hostility to the laws of the land, as the President has justly and truthfully said.

The friends of the Topeka constitution stand here to oppose the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution; and they tell us, in the first place, that it violates the fundamental principles of the Kansas-Nebraska act. I have a few words to say on that act. I know something of its history and its object, but I shall take it only as it is on the statute book. Its enemies have turned its expounders. It is not to be supposed that they have expounded rightly that which has always met their opposition. Four years ago, there was a great clamor raised when we attempted to pass that act, although it was based upon principles which have been affirmed by every branch of this Government; affirmed by the executive, by the legislative, and by the judicial departments, and sanctioned by the people at the popular elections. When we passed the Kansas-Nebraska act in 1854, there was a greater clamor raised than, I think, can be gotten up on this question of the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution, even with the opposition of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS.] What was that question on which such violent denunciations were made; on which the people were told that liberty was trampled under foot; on which the North was called to the rescue, and an appeal was made to the freemen of that section that their liberties were taken away, that the South was making aggressions on them, and that they were dough-faces if they submitted?

When we came to establish territorial governments for Kansas and Nebraska, the representatives of the southern States of this Union, who have the institution of slavery in their midst, recognized by their laws, affirmed that great principle which, after all these struggles and troubles, has been ended by the proudest and the speediest vindication that ever a great truth got from an excited and prejudiced community. We simply asked you to put no prohibition upon us or our property. We sought no advantage over you; but we said: "this is common territory, and we simply ask that while it is in a territorial condition we shall be allowed to go there with our property, and you with your property, and form a civil society; and we will give you all the great advantages which are offered by a territorial government, of protection and peace, until you are strong enough to protect yourselves and come into the Union." We simply asked that there should be no prohibition on us, or our institutions, or property. That was all our demand; and the South then asked for but one thing in reference to that bill. In 1820, in the eighth section of the act known as an act to admit Missouri into the Union, and for other purposes, there was a clause that slavery, or involuntary servitude, except for crimes, should never exist in this territory. We said, "Repeal that, because it is unconstitutional." We came to the legislative forum; we went to the executive forum; we went to the judicial forum; we went to the popular forum; and everywhere we have received the verdict in our favor by the fair judgment of honest men, North and South. That was all we demanded. The clause which seems to be a bone of contention, and to have created trouble, and to have been bandied about between politicians, about popular sovereignty, was no part or parcel of the demand or of the object of the bill. We were not then to be taught popular sovereignty. We did not want new lessons on popular sovereignty in 1854. We had no new theory on that subject. We said: "Here is a law excluding us from the Territories; repeal it." After consultation, the Democratic party, with a large body of the Whigs, said: "We will repeal it, because it is unjust." It was repealed by gentlemen of the North and the South, constituting a large majority of this House, and a majority of the other, and maintained, as I have said, subsequently, by the judiciary and the people. The effect of that repeal would have been to leave the people, when they might come to make their State constitution, free to make a government to suit themselves; and, in the mean time, it would admit everybody, and protect everybody, while it was, under the Government of the United States, common property. We declared that when they came to ask admission into the Union, and clothe themselves with the attributes of sovereignty, they should be protected in making a government to suit themselves and coming into this Union, with or without slavery, as their constitution might prescribe.

This was all we wanted, but it was said by gentlemen from the northern States that this would be the subject of misrepresentation, that this simple repeal might possibly revive the pro-slavery laws of Louisiana, and whether it did or not, it would be so charged by the adversaries who were raising a clamor throughout the whole North, and therefore they asked us to let the bill interpret itself upon this point. That was the sole reason for the introduction of the sentence which seems now to be made in many quarters the chief of the corner. It was a legislative interpretation of the effect of repealing the eighth section of the act of 1820. We desired nothing more than that repeal, and this legislative interpretation was intended to prevent misrepresentation in the country. It was said "it will be charged, that by repealing the act of 1820, we restore the slavery laws," and many gentlemen supposed that might be the effect. That, however, was not our object. Holding the principle which I did, and the great body of the gentlemen with whom I acted, that slavery was lawful wherever it was not prohibited, I was content to unite with those who held the contrary doctrine, that it was lawful nowhere except where it was expressly allowed by statute. Being willing to stand on my own principles, and legislate on my principles, and take the consequences of standing on them, I said, "all I ask of you is a tabula rasa; therefore, if this can be construed as having the effect you fear; if it can be injuriously construed against you in the non-slaveholding States of the Union; if it will tend to raise a prejudice against you on this question, and stand in the way of your carrying out this great principle of constitutional law, put the fair interpretation in the bill and let it speak for itself." Hence, we injected what a distinguished member of the other House and for a long time a distinguished member of this body, said was a stump speech into the bowels of the bill. It was to prevent misrepresentation of it as I once had occasion to say to the honorable Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD.] That was the sole motive. That clause was that it was "The true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States."

They were left perfectly free to make their own institutions without interference from Congress, which had assumed in 1820 the right to prescribe to them that they should not. In 1820, Congress said, "no matter if every man in Kansas, if every man in Minnesota, desires to make his institutions to suit himself, on the subject of slavery, he shall not be allowed to do so, but we will do it for him." Congress assumed, as a matter of conscience, that it was its duty to do this for the people. To that we objected. We denied the power and the policy. Upon the question of power we have been maintained by the courts, the expounders of the laws, about whom the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] seems to think so little. On the policy of the measure we have been defended by the highest tribunal known to this country, the people. Who are the people? Those who are enfranchised by the thirty-one sovereign States, who have a right to speak in the Government. I do not care whether they are white or black; I do not care whether they are rich or poor; I do not care for what reason any class may be excluded—I say it belongs to these thirty-one sovereignties to judge for themselves into whose hands they will commit civil power, into whose hands they will place the elective franchise. We have appealed to them as "the people," the only people known to the laws, the only people known to the Constitution, "perfectly free," free to execute this right according to law and in no other manner.

The idea of the Topekaites, that under the Kansas-Nebraska act persons were to be allowed to vote at the ballot-box whenever they thought proper, and that those who did not like the territorial government might make a rebellion against it for themselves, is a "perfect freedom" that was discovered by the enemies of the bill; not by its friends. To this day none of the friends of the measure, none of its legitimate expounders, have ever held any such "perfect freedom" as that. That is a "perfect freedom" claimed by its enemies. They could not get their views indorsed here, nor in the other House, nor before the courts, nor before the people; and they have attempted to strangle a great measure, to which they are opposed, by interpretation. The question is a plain one. The law as written is easily interpreted. Who are "the people?" and how do they speak? We know of no people in this country except those recognized as such by law. In the formation of this Government, I believe Connecticut and Massachusetts were recognized as republican States, but they put limitations on the right of suffrage; they excluded men from voting if they were not freemen of a town. My own State excluded some because of their color, and so did many of the non-slaveholding States. Rhode Island and Virginia excluded men because they did not own land. North Carolina excluded them for some purpose because they did not have land, and granted the franchise to the lack-landers for other purposes. She divided it between land-holders and lack-landers. Other States excluded from the right of suffrage those who would not perform military duty. It was conceded that it was for the governing power to determine those who should share at the ballot-box in its exercise; and when they have spoken, this Government has never inquired into its rightfulness or its republicanism.

Sir, this Government never could have been formed on modern wisdom. It was formed on a very simple plan by those who met in 1787, at Philadelphia. They found these various provisions as to the qualifications of voters in the thirteen sovereignties which met there to make a Constitution. Massachusetts might have wanted her own rule; Rhode Island hers; Virginia hers. My own State was more liberal in her franchise. She had but one distinction. She gave political power to every man that bore on his face a white skin. We chose to make that a test. I know some gentlemen think it is unjust, but we do not. When we came into the Union the same test was made by two thirds of the States, that the voters should be white. Some inserted an additional clause against the universal right of suffrage even by white men, by which thousands and tens of thousands of men who fought for the liberties of the country, as we say in ordinary parlance, lived and died excluded from the right of ever depositing a single ballot in the ballot-box, or once casting a vote at the hustings. The framers of the Constitution said "we will not fix any rule; it is a local question; it is one we cannot control; it is impossible for us to settle it; we will leave it to the States, and therefore we will say that whoever is entitled under State laws to vote for members of the most numerous branch of the Legislature in any one State, shall be entitled to vote for members of Congress. That was a simple solution. The convention did not say to Virginia, you must include black people; it did not say to Massachusetts, you must exclude blacks; it did not say to Virginia, you must let in the back-landers; but it said to each State, determine for yourselves what portion of your community it is safe to intrust with political power and we will take your rule, and whoever your laws enfranchise for the most numerous branch of your Legislature shall stand enfranchised for the officers of this Government. That was the simple rule.

When I speak of the people of Kansas, I speak of the people whom the law has declared are entitled to vote, who vote because the law gives the right. As for inherent sovereignty, I know it not; it is an absurdity; it is not an idea of government; it is not an idea of liberty. It does not exist in nature. It exists nowhere but in the fancy or brains of some politicians who want to work themselves out of a dilemma, by manufacturing a term. God gives nobody the right to vote; nature gives nobody the right to vote. Ten men necessarily have no natural right, and no divine right that I know of, to govern nine. It is a question of convention.

Mr. WADE. The people of Missouri seem to have that "divine right."

Mr. TOOMBS. If they make any such claim, it is a bad claim. They may, like others, set up a bad claim; but I do not think they claim any such thing in this case. I am putting the question on the great fundamental principles that will live through all time and all ages. Missouri may violate them, Ohio may violate them; but they will live as long as liberty is preserved. Those whom the Constitution and the laws have enfranchised, are the people, and the only people meant in legal sense, the only people anybody by any possibility could mean in this act. You did not mean women, you did not mean children, you did not mean idiots. Whom did you mean? The people under the government you were making. You made a government, and declared in the act creating it, who should be enfranchised, and how other people should be afterwards enfranchised.

I say now, it did not necessarily happen, and perhaps it was impossible that it could happen in a single one of the thirteen original States of the Union, that its constitution was ever adopted by a majority of its people, in fact or by consent; because most of them were adopted by conventions, and they were divided into districts for the purpose of electing delegates to the conventions. Population is the usual rule for such divisions. In our section of the country, we usually take the Federal population, including whites and blacks, according to the proportions recognized in the Federal Constitution. You take numbers, but you do not by any means determine how many of them are voters. I think probably Kansas comes nearer to proposing an absolute naked rule of governing by numbers than any community I have ever known. The LeCompton constitution was based more nearly on that idea than any which has ever come under my observation. They obliterated all county lines, took a census, and said, we will have sixty members in the convention; we will take the whole population and divide it by sixty, and give the same proportion all over the Territory. I say that is more nearly according to mere numbers than any instance I have known.

When we proclaimed that the people should be free to form their institutions, we declared who were the people who had the right to make institutions. They are made in our country by representation. We provided a government for this Territory; the people elected a Territorial Legislature, and they were to govern through that Legislature until their admission into the Union as a State, and then the people whom the constitution enfranchised were the people intrusted with the power of making, altering, and changing their government. That is a plain proposition which nobody can mistake who will look at the law.

That point was provided for in the very bill from which this clause is seized. It said that at the first election every citizen of the United States, over twenty-one years of age should vote, and all who had declared on oath their intention to become citizens, and then that the first Legislature should fix the right of suffrage on certain limitations; and therefore "the people" meant by this clause of the act was expounded by the act itself.

Then, as the President properly states in his message, the territorial government, thus acknowledged, set out on the principle of the Kansas act, that the people, acting according to law; the people, acting through the government established by law, have this right. That government stands there to-day. It submitted to the people the propriety of calling a constitutional convention. The people decreed that there should be a convention, and the Legislature called it. The convention met; the fruit of that convention is now before us. At this point objection is made, even by some gentlemen with whom I have acted heretofore, in regard to this matter. They do not disagree with the President up to this point, but they say the constitution ought to have been submitted to the people. Why? From whence do you derive the idea that it must be submitted? I do not pretend to say that it may not be so submitted, but I hold that is a point to be determined by the law-making power. I admit that it may be submitted; and it must be submitted, if the law so wills it. If the territorial law calling the convention had decreed that the constitution should be submitted to a popular vote, the work would be incomplete without submission. If the convention itself had declared that it should be so submitted, it would be incomplete without that sanction, because it would have lacked a sanction required by law.

This, however, lacks no sanction of law. The convention determined to put the questio vexata—the question of slavery, before the people, and they submitted no other question. They saw that eighteen States had been admitted into the Union with constitutions framed by conventions. They saw from all your enabling acts, beginning with that of Ohio, in 1802, up to this day, no such requirement was ever made by this Government until it was slipped somehow or other into the Minnesota bill. They saw that in no enabling act had such a requirement been demanded by Congress as essential to the validity of a State constitution. It was not required by the territorial law, nor by the convention. Hence I say there is an absence of all foundation for the idea that there is such a necessity unless you get it somewhere else. Where are you to get it from? It is not in the law of Congress; it is not in the action of Congress; it is not in the territorial law calling the convention; it is not in the Constitution itself. Where, then, do you get it from? You must go to the "higher law" of the honorable gentleman from New York, and there you will not find it. Go and look at the revelation of which he speaks, and it is not there. Go to the only utterance of his that I know of, and it is not there. Go, then, to nature, from the beginning of the world, and she gives no such utterance. Where are you to get it? It is faction; it is demagogism; it is nothing else; it has no warrant in law; none in philosophy; none in nature, and none in the revealed will of God.

The Kansas convention thought proper to submit a portion of the constitution to the people. The President says that in his opinion, according to his construction of the act, they were bound to submit the slavery question. In that I think he is mistaken; because I have shown you what we meant by "the people;" and when the people act they act through organization; they act through the Legislature; they act through the convention; and the action of the convention is the action of the people themselves. It is the embodiment of their sovereignty. Millions of people have been born under the constitutions of Georgia and other States, which never had this essential prerequisite of popular sanction as it is now considered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will the honorable Senator allow me, on the point he is discussing, to ask a single question?

Mr. TOOMBS. With great pleasure.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My question is, from what source do you derive the legal authority of the convention to form a constitution at all? From the Legislature of the Territory?

Mr. TOOMBS. Entirely from the Legislature of the Territory. If the authority came from Congress, we should be bound by any propositions we made. If it comes from the Territorial Legislature, we may accept or reject the propositions.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will put one further inquiry. If the legal authority of the convention was derived from the Legislature of the Territory, has not the Legislature of the Territory, until the State is admitted into the Union, the legal power of legislation still for the State; and may not the Legislature pass a law submitting the constitution to the people of the Territory? May it not be done by any Legislature, as well as the original Legislature which authorized the calling of the convention?

Mr. TOOMBS. I think not, and for very obvious reasons. The Legislature called this convention together, and it has performed its duty, and the people voted upon the question submitted to them before the action of the Legislature, to which the Senator from Wisconsin has referred, took place. Then the previous law was executed, and the constitution wanted nothing but the action of Congress to become the fundamental law. It was then too late for the Territorial Legislature to interfere. It could not then affect the constitution. It might provide for calling another convention, and bringing another constitution here, if it chose, but as far as the constitution then formed was concerned, the law providing for it was an executed law, and nothing could be done under it except to elect State officers, and its validity did not depend on that. That is my view of it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. As a matter of fact, I understand that the election which was to come off under the schedule of the convention, did not take place until after the Legislature had provided by law for another election.

Mr. TOOMBS. Before the action of that Legislature, the election on the constitution took place, on the 21st of December; and the convention having exhausted its powers, passed the matter back to the people. Whether the action of the Legislature was before or after that time, it was incompetent for the Legislature to interfere with that work, because it was executed when the convention dismissed it, and they had nothing more to do except to submit one clause of it, according to its own terms, to the people; all the rest was perfect. Then, neither the Legislature that gave the power could revoke it, nor any subsequent Legislature take it away.

After this digression, I come back to the point I was arguing, and propose to show that my construction of the Kansas-Nebraska act was the contemporaneous construction given by its friends. I hold in my hand a bill introduced into this body by myself in 1856, which, with some amendments, passed this body by a vote of three fourths; but the other House substituted for it a provision admitting Kansas with the Topeka constitution. To show that it was not understood to be the true intent and meaning of this act that the constitution should receive any popular sanction, I will mention that, when the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] and other gentlemen, with myself, proposed to end this disturbing difficulty, by bringing Kansas into the Union, in 1856, the bill which passed this body read thus:

"That the following propositions be, and the same are hereby, offered to the said convention of the people of Kansas for their free acceptance or rejection; which, if accepted by the convention, shall be obligatory on the United States and upon the said State of Kansas."

We passed an enabling act, and went on to declare that a convention should be called to make a constitution; and we proposed to that convention to accept certain terms and conditions. We did not require that they should submit the constitution, formed by them, to the people. This was the true intent and meaning of the act, as thus interpreted by its friends two years after its passage; as interpreted by the Senate by a majority of three to one—an interpretation adopted by every one of its friends in the House of Representatives, and by many gentlemen from other political organizations, who affirmed this to be the true intent and meaning of the act, that submission of the constitution was not a requirement of the Kansas-Nebraska act. This was an authoritative exposition, made by the original friends of that measure, and by other gentlemen who were then members of Congress; and would have been the law of the land but for the Republican majority in the other House, who defeated it by substituting for it a proposition to admit Kansas with the Topeka constitution.

I have not only shown that the interpretation I have put on the Kansas-Nebraska act is the just interpretation, according to the philological construction of the sentence, according to common sense, according to all legal rules of interpretation, but I have shown a legislative interpretation by all its friends when they attempted to carry it out. I hope, therefore, that there is an end to the question as to the true intent and meaning of the Kansas-Nebraska act on this point. It did not require a popular sanction for the constitution before admitting the State into the Union. It did not, however, prevent such sanction if required by the convention.

I shall only advert to one other point. We are told that the Lecompton constitution is a fraud; that there was cheating at the polls; that there was cheating at some crossing, and cheating at Leavenworth; and that there were bogus votes. I have heard this cry from the enemies of the territorial government from the day we passed the original act until this day, and I expect to hear it until Kansas shall be admitted into the Union. I do not intend to deny or affirm the truth of these allegations. I think there are very few new communities, very few excited communities, where voting is done by ballot, anywhere in the United States, where there is not a large amount of cheating. We have heard of such things in the State of California; it has been alleged that in the city of San Francisco corruptions of this kind were carried on to a great extent. In the old, virtuous, civilized city of New York, the commercial metropolis of the Union, it is alleged every day, and sometimes proven. One branch of Congress is now exercised on a wholesale fraud alleged to have taken place in the city of Baltimore. I do not know how that is; I am passing no judgment on it.

I have one answer, which I think is a complete one, to all these allegations. If there be frauds at elections, in all well-constituted governments tribunals are made to try them and correct them; and there let them go. The Baltimore election of members of Congress is to be passed on by the other House. If there be allegations affecting the election of a Senator of the United States, the question is to be settled here. If there has been fraud in the election of members of the Senate or House of Representatives of the Legislature of Kansas, the matter can be passed upon by those bodies respectively when the State shall have been admitted into the Union. That is the tribunal set up by law for the decision of such questions. There and there alone they can be decided. This body, I trust, will never undertake whether or not there have been frauds in the elections of Kansas. If the proceeding is legal prima facie, if prima facie it is fair, our duty ends. When the member from the new State, elected by its people, takes his seat in the other House, that body may investigate the circumstances of his election. When the Senators elected by the Legislature of the new State come here, this body can determine the legality of their election.

Every legislative body is the proper tribunal to decide questions affecting the elections of its members. It is the only tribunal which the experience of twenty centuries has shown can be safely intrusted with any such power. The ablest on English jurists, the ablest parliamentarians, have always held—and we find it deeply imbedded in the privileges of the British Parliament, in the privileges conferred on each House of Congress by our Constitution, in the privileges of every State Legislature, and inherent in every town meeting—that a legislative body is to judge for itself of the election, returns, and qualifications of its members. Without this principle, representative bodies could not live an hour. If you have a case of fraud in the election of members of the Legislature, take the question there for decision. If you have such a case in regard to the election of a Representative in Congress, take it to the other House. If you have such a case as to the election of a member of this body, bring it here. If it be true that these bodies are so corrupt that they will not decide the questions properly, it proves that we are incapable of self-government; and I, for one, shall not admit that for any purpose whatever. They are the judges of such questions—the absolute and sole judges. Every member here holds his seat by this principle. If you admit one wrongfully it cannot be controverted anywhere; but the presumption is, that your decision is right. Society could not live an instant if unjust judgments were not executed as well as just ones. Does the supreme tribunal of any State or country in the world always decide rightly? Nobody pretends that. But there must be finality; there must be a tribunal to decide, or there is no government at all; and therefore bad judgments must be enforced as well as good ones as long as they stand, until altered according to the forms of law.

My reply to the allegation of fraud is, that this constitution comes from a regularly constituted, legal government. The convention was called for by a vote of the people, on the question being submitted by their Legislature. Delegates were elected by the people, and the convention met and framed a constitution. They submitted that portion of it which they thought proper to the people for approval, and it has received their approval. It stands on every form of legality. The law, the peace of the country, the right, demand that the policy of the President shall be sternly upheld by the representatives of the States and of the people.

Mr. WILSON obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. CHANDLER, on whose motion the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 2, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. A. HOLMEAD.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SECURITY OF STEAMBOAT PASSENGERS.

The SPEAKER announced the business first in order to be the consideration of House bill No. 45, further to amend an act to provide for the better security of lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes, the consideration of which bill had been postponed to this day.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to ask that the further consideration of that bill be further postponed one week from to-morrow, and also to ask to have a substitute for the bill, which has been prepared by the Committee ordered to be printed. It was so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed a bill of the House, to supply an omission in the enrollment of a certain act therein mentioned.

NEBRASKA CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, from the Committee of Elections, presented a report in the contested-election case of the Territory of Nebraska, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That the parties, the contestant and contestee, in this case, be allowed the further time of sixty days from the passage of this resolution to take and return supplemental testimony.

The report and resolution were ordered to be printed, and their consideration was passed over informally.

OHIO CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I wish to give notice to the House, now, that I shall to-morrow call up the report and resolution presented from the Committee of Elections in the case of Vallandigham against Campbell, that the preliminary questions involved may be disposed of.

Mr. PHELPS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the

PRINTING DEFICIENCY BILL,

the question being on the amendment offered by Mr. LETCHER, as follows:

Add to the amendment the following words:

Provided, The sum does not exceed that reported by the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. HOUSTON. I shall say but a word in reply to my friend from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] on the point he last raised. I took ground, in a few remarks which I made yesterday, that the proposition before the committee now does not involve a contract. The gentleman has sought to involve me in what he seems to regard as an inconsistency, by reading a resolution which I had the honor to propose to the House at the organization of this Congress. I am astonished that my friend from Virginia does not see that the point involved in this resolution, and the points involved in the discussion now, are totally and entirely different. The resolution, as offered by myself, with the proviso that is appended to it, was offered for the gratification of other members of the House, and not for my own; because, in the incidental discussion that came up on that resolution, I admitted the fact, and stated it, that the proviso did not change the legal power of the House, or the rights of the party who might be elected under the resolution. I believe that the House has power to change the price of printing at any time, after the election of Printer as well as before. There was nothing in that proviso. But others might have differed with me as to the power of the House; and this proviso was expressly placed on the ground that it was a notice to the party who might be elected under it; and that in the event of the House or Congress voting to reduce the prices below those fixed under the act of 1852, he should not set up a claim for damages.

So much, then, for that resolution. But, Mr. Chairman, the point involved here is not that. There the question was as to the price which was to be paid. Gentlemen might have contended that the election of a Printer under the existing law, establishing the rates of compensation, was a pledge on the part of Congress that the party elected under that law should receive the compensation fixed by it. I say that I dissented from that view of the case. I believed that Congress had the power to change the rates of compensation as well after the election of Printer as at any other time. But, sir, what is the point involved in this discussion? It is as to the amount of printing. Gentlemen say that you have ordered a work and that, therefore, you made a contract with the Printer. Now, in that case the price was the thing in issue. In this case the amount of work is the thing. It is not proposed here, nor have I contemplated or intimated such a desire, to reduce the prices for the labor that has been performed. On the contrary, we are willing to pay the price agreed upon in the law of 1852; and the only question involved, as to the power of the House, is whether we have a right to reduce the amount of printing ordered to be done at a previous session of Congress. Now, sir, I will illustrate it.

Mr. REAGAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama contend that the House has not the right to change the price of printing?

Mr. HOUSTON. That is not contended by me. But my friend from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] seems to take that view of the case. I do not. I take the opposite view, and was going on to illustrate it.

Mr. LETCHER. I desire to correct the gentleman from Alabama—

Mr. HOUSTON. If I have done the gentleman injustice in my statement, I withdraw it. I desire now to proceed with my remarks.

If this is a contract, it is a contract from the very moment that the order for the printing is made. The fact of the work having progressed one degree, or two degrees, does not give it any more the semblance or form of a contract than it had when the printing was ordered. Suppose that to-day we should order ten thousand copies of Emory's report to be printed, have we not the right to-morrow to rescind that order, and to say either that we shall not print any at all, or that we will publish a much smaller number than that? No gentleman can deny that we can bring it up by a motion to reconsider.

But gentlemen may say that the contract is not complete until the power to reconsider has passed from the House. I will meet them on that issue. Suppose that we order to-day the printing of ten thousand copies of a book; have we not the power this day week—if no step has been taken towards its execution, if the Printer has done no act to involve him—to rescind the order? But according to the argument of the gentleman, it is a contract on the part of the House, and we cannot reduce the number of copies ordered.

Now, is there a member of the House who, on that view of the case, would not agree with me that the House has the power to rescind the resolution; to rescind its order for publishing any number of books, and either publish none at all or reduce the amount ordered to be published to a much lower number? Well, then, if we can do it in a week, can we not do it at any time? I agree that we are bound to pay for such work as has been done. Whenever we order work to be performed, it is a part of the business of the Public Printer to do that work, and if he does it we must pay him for it. We are bound to pay him, as far as he has progressed, for the work done.

But when we find a volume that has not been entered upon; when we find a volume that has not been printed; when we find that the Printer has not commenced the execution of the order of the House; we have a right to rescind the order, and say that we will publish a smaller number, or none at all.

My friend from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] seemed to take exception to what I said in relation to a want of information in relation to this matter. I certainly know too much about the arduous duties of the Committee of Ways and Means, and the difficulty, at times, of obtaining information, to attempt, even by implication, to cast censure upon any member of that committee.

Mr. LETCHER, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I indicated yesterday an expression of opinion that the running debate upon this bill had been already protracted too long; that instead of saving money to the country, by the continuance of this discussion further, we were absolutely exhausting the public Treasury by detaining the House longer with this discussion. I therefore, yesterday, moved that the committee rise, with a view of closing this five minutes' debate. That, however, did not accomplish the purpose I had in view. I am now advised that the only mode by which I can succeed in closing the debate on this bill, is by moving to strike out the enacting clause. If that motion prevails, I understand the effect will be that those who have the bill in charge will report it to the House, with the various amendments, and the House will be brought to a direct vote upon the bill and amendments. I therefore, in this view of the matter, under the circumstances, move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. PHELPS. I appeal to my friend from Kentucky to withdraw his motion. I desire to submit an amendment to the original bill, which, I believe, will relieve gentlemen from many objections which they have taken to the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would suggest to my friend from Missouri, that if my motion prevails, he can submit his amendment and accomplish his purpose as well then as now.

Mr. PHELPS. No, sir. The gentleman from Kentucky must be aware that if the enacting clause of the bill be stricken out, all the amendments to the bill will be lost. The bill as originally presented, will be brought to the House, with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out. The first question to be taken will then be on concurring with the recommendation of the committee. If that recommendation be non-concurred in, the question will then arise directly on the passage of the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Believing, as I do, that the purpose the gentleman desires to accomplish is to stop, as far as he can, this great waste of the public time, I, myself, am willing to submit to any proposition having that end in view. I will therefore, for the present, withdraw my motion, and allow the gentleman to offer his amendment, hoping that after it shall have been disposed of, the gentleman will renew my motion.

Mr. PHELPS. I desire to submit the following amendment, to come in at the end of the original bill as an additional section. I suppose I have the right to submit an amendment by way of perfecting that part of the original bill which is proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. SEWARD. That amendment is in violation of the decision of the Chair made the other day. I submit that the amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will reply to the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia, that the cases are not similar. In the case presented the other day, to which the gentleman from Georgia has referred, there was an amendment pending to the amendment. Now, the gentleman from Missouri proposes to amend the section of the original bill which it is proposed to strike out.

Mr. PHELPS. And there is no amendment to the amendment pending.

The CHAIRMAN. There is not.

Mr. SEWARD. The original bill has been amended by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky. This is, therefore, an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky. Now, sir, when you get to the end of the original bill, you have got two amendments already to that original bill, and you are multiplying amendments to a greater extent than the rule allows.

The CHAIRMAN. If the Chair understands the state of the question, there is no amendment pending to the amendment. The amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SEWARD] was adopted to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky; and a further amendment to that amendment is therefore in order.

Mr. SEWARD. Well, sir, I move the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri is in order.

Mr. SEWARD. Is not my motion in order?

The CHAIRMAN. Not at present. The gentleman from Missouri has offered an amendment and is entitled to the floor upon that amendment.

Mr. PHELPS. I move the following as an additional section to the bill:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Joint Committee on Printing is hereby directed to inquire if it is right and expedient to discontinue the further publication of any of the reports ordered to be printed, either by the Senate or the House of Representatives of the Thirty-Third or Thirty-Fourth Congresses, and which have not yet been printed in whole or in part.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have offered does not emanate from the Committee of Ways and Means, but it has received the concurrence of a portion of the members of that committee. I propose it as an amendment for the purpose of removing some of the difficulties which exist in the minds of some of the members of this committee.

The gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON,] not now in his seat, was yesterday certainly misinformed, and has done injustice to the Secretary of the Interior, when he told this committee that no portion of Emory's report had been printed. The Secretary of the Interior said otherwise, in a letter which I had read to the committee on Friday last. I was this morning told, by the chief clerk of the Superintendent of Public Printing, that the first portion of the second volume had been in the hands of the printer for six months, and that they were waiting for the residue of the report from the author. The Committee on Printing now propose to diminish the number of copies ordered of the second volume of that work. Now, sir, if it be right and proper to discontinue the publication of any work which has been ordered by either of the last two Congresses, I propose that the Joint Committee on Printing shall inquire into the matter. The Committee on Printing has the right to report at any time, and that committee will, no doubt, enlighten the House with the result of its deliberations. If it be, in their opinion, right and proper to discontinue the publication of the ninth and tenth volumes of the Pacific railroad report, upon which no portion of the work has been commenced, they will report a resolution to that effect.

But, sir, recollect that this public printing has been ordered not by a law, but by resolutions of a single House. If it be right to rescind those resolutions, you may do it by a single resolution of either House. If they consider it expedient that a less number of the second volume of Emory's report shall be printed than was originally ordered, as we have been informed the Committee on Printing have already determined on, let them report a resolution rescinding so much of the resolution of the Thirty-Fourth Congress as ordered the printing of ten thousand copies, and order to be printed as many copies as they may deem proper and expedient. I think, if this amendment to the bill be adopted, it will relieve the committee, and relieve the minds of many members of this committee from the objections which have been taken to the passage of this bill. The Committee on Printing has the right to report at any time under your rules. The Committee on Printing may consider this matter and report to-morrow, if they please, a resolution recommending the suspension of the publication of the ninth and tenth volumes of the Pacific railroad report.

Mr. BURNETT. I wish to ask the gentleman from Missouri why we should vote the money to pay for the ninth and tenth volumes of the Pacific railroad reports, and then pass a resolution directing the Committee on Printing to inquire if their publication may not be dispensed with?

Mr. PHELPS. It leaves the matter in this position: if the House does not direct a suspension of the further execution of this work, the money will have been appropriated for the purpose of meeting that expenditure. If it is the opinion of a majority of this House that it is right and expedient to prohibit the publication of the ninth and tenth volumes, let the Committee on Printing make a report to that effect, and let the House adopt the resolution if they think proper.

The inquiry was made by my friend from Alabama, [Mr. Houstoun,] whether we want this money during the present fiscal year, provided we continue the publication of the additional volumes. I understand that we will. I understand that a portion of it, perhaps, may not yet be prepared; but it will be prepared and furnished to the Public Printer before the 30th day of June next, or shortly after that time. Therefore, the Committee on Printing have time to consider this matter; and if they recommend to the House to diminish the number of copies to be printed, or to prohibit the publication of any additional volumes of any report, they can do so.

I have stated to this House that this bill does not embrace money to be appropriated for the seventh volume of Gilliss's report. I understand that that report is not yet prepared for publication; nor is it contemplated that it will be published under this bill, nor that it will be paid for out of the money appropriated by this bill.

Mr. SEWARD. The amendment which the gentleman from Missouri has offered is, in my opinion, a very mischievous one; and, instead of relieving the difficulties, it complicates them greatly. Suppose, for instance, that the joint Committee on Printing report that it is necessary to discontinue the publication of a certain work: what proportion of the money appropriated by this bill is it contemplated will have to be paid out to those who have performed the work? How does the gentleman propose to adjust the balance due, and settle these difficulties? Now, if the gentleman's amendment proves anything, it proves that this whole question should be settled by the Committee on Printing before you legislate at all for the payment of this money. If they should decide that you should discontinue the publication of a certain number of these works, then you could legislate understandingly.

Mr. PHELPS. In reply to the gentleman from Georgia, let me say this: suppose you should direct a discontinuance of the publication of any volume of Gilliss's report. Now, a part of those volumes have already been printed, and as a matter of course the compensation is due, to the extent of the labor already performed, and you must pay the paper manufacturer for the paper used for that printing.

Mr. SEWARD. I appeal to the gentleman to know how much will be sufficient compensation for the labor already bestowed and for the volumes already completed. By what standard would he settle the compensation to be paid for the work already done? The parties might not be satisfied with the compensation fixed by law, because the publication of a great number of volumes would be less expensive in proportion, than the publication of a few volumes. The result will be that these parties will be coming here and asking additional compensation on account of the discontinuance of the work, because the compensation is not adequate for the amount of work done. I therefore hope the amendment will not be adopted.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1st Session.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 34.

The question was then taken on Mr. PHELPS's amendment, and it was agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia to the amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is it in order now to offer an amendment, either as an amendment to the bill, or as an addition to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I offer the following amendment:

Sec. —. Be it further enacted, That hereafter, in all cases where proposals for any contract or contracts, to be made by any of the Executive Departments or bureaus, and in all cases where notices of any description, issuing from the same, are now required by law to be advertised, the same shall be advertised by publication in one newspaper in the city of Washington, to be selected by the President of the United States: Provided, That the charges for such publications shall not be higher than such as are paid by individuals for advertising in said paper.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That so much of the twelfth section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1846," approved March 3, 1845, as conflicts with this act, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The object of the amendment is this: at present all the notices —

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a point of order. It is that the amendment is not germane to the bill and the question before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is. It comes in as an amendment to the original bill.

Mr. SEWARD. It proposes to change the law in reference to publication of notices. That subject is not under consideration.

Mr. NICHOLS. I saw that amendment before it was offered, and I cordially approve of the object sought to be attained by it, but I make this point of order upon the amendment: the bill makes appropriations, or is intended to make appropriations, for a specific object named in it—the printing of the House of Representatives and of the Senate. Now, the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama proposes to change laws which have been some time in existence, and which affect the organization of the Departments of the Government, and, therefore, I think it cannot be in order as an amendment to this bill. I believe that the gentleman's object is a correct one; and I suggest to him that he had better refer his amendment, in the form of a resolution, to the select committee on the Public Printing which has made an investigation of this subject, has it now under consideration, and will report upon it in a few days.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand this to be a bill to appropriate money for deficiencies in the public printing; and the gentleman who reported the bill from the Committee of Ways and Means has offered an additional section of general legislation. Now, my amendment relates to a part of the public printing—a part, it is true, which comes from the Departments, but at the same time it is public printing, just such as is involved in this bill; and if the Chair will allow me to explain the amendment to the committee, I do not think there will be any opposition to it.

Mr. Chairman, the law which I propose to repeal or modify, is found in the naval appropriation bill. It relates to the public printing, but it is to be found in the naval appropriation bill of 1845. My amendment proposes to dispense with the publication of all of these notices that come from the Departments for mail contracts, &c., in two of the Washington city papers where they are at present printed. The existing law says that all such notices shall be published in the two papers in the District having the largest circulation, and also in a third paper in the District selected by the President of the United States; so that they are published in three papers. Now every member of the House who takes the Union, the Intelligencer, or the Star, occasionally gets a batch, weighing some two or three pounds of notices in relation to the postal service of the country; and I venture to say that those things very seldom find their way into the interior of the country where the bidders come from and the service is to be rendered.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a question of order pending, and it is not in order to debate the amendment. The Chair sustains the point of order raised by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. NICHOLS,] and rules the amendment out of order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will withdraw his point of order. All admit that this is an important amendment; and I will state to the committee that, if the amendment had been the law twenty days ago, you would have saved at least $30,000, which has been thrown away upon the papers of this District, and will do no good to the public service of the country.

Mr. NICHOLS. I cannot resist the appeal of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BOYCE. Is debate in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. NICHOLS. I rose to withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. It is too late. The Chair has sustained the gentleman's point of order, and ruled the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama out of order.

Mr. BOYCE. I offer the following as an additional section to the bill:

And be it further enacted, That hereafter it shall not be lawful to order the printing of any reports or other writings submitted to Congress, until the Joint Committee on Printing shall first estimate and report the extent and probable cost of the reports or writings to be printed.

Mr. PHELPS. I rise to a question of order. The amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina is a proposition to change the rules of the House, and is not germane to the bill. I will vote with the gentleman for the adoption of a rule for the government of the House that no report shall be ordered to be printed until the manuscript shall be in the possession of the House, and the Committee on Printing shall have reported the cost; but it is not in order as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. Let us put it in this bill.

Mr. NICHOLS. I ask the gentleman from South Carolina to incorporate the following in his amendment:

And that hereafter when any report or other communication is submitted to either House of Congress by any Department, bureau, or office of the Government, or by any other person or persons, and such report or other communication is ordered to be printed, no additions of any kind shall be made thereto without the direction of the House or of Congress giving the order to print, and no alterations or corrections shall be made therein which will change the character of the work as originally communicated and ordered to be printed, or which may add to the cost of printing.

Mr. BOYCE. I cannot accept that.

Mr. PHELPS. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will modify his amendment, so as to provide that no alteration or change shall be made unless under the direction of the House or of Congress.

Mr. NICHOLS. That is now the language of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. This debate is not in order.

Mr. PHELPS. I suggest to the gentleman from South Carolina to modify his amendment, so as to embrace extra copies.

Mr. BOYCE. I will accept of that modification. The great difficulty in reference to the expense of this printing department of the Government is, that Congress is induced to order the printing of works without knowing anything about the extent of those works, or the expense of printing them.

Now, if Congress, in ordering the printing of Gilliss's report, or the Japan expedition, or Emory's report, had had any idea of the extent of those works, or of their immense expense, I do not believe they would ever have ordered the printing of those works. The amendment I propose meets this difficulty, and requires that an estimate of the probable extent of the work and of the expense shall be submitted to Congress at the very threshold. In that way Congress cannot be drawn unexpectedly and ignorantly into undertaking to print these mammoth works which cost such immense sums of money, and half of which are worth nothing when completed. Vast expenditures have been made upon this matter of printing, and a great deal of the matter printed is the veriest trash in the world; it only incumbers the mails, and is worth nothing. In order, therefore, to put an end to this growing evil, this profligate expenditure of the public money upon this printing department, it seems to me that we had better adopt some additional amendment or section like the one I have suggested, and I leave it to the committee.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I wish to make but a single remark, Mr. Chairman, and that is, that I hope we shall not spend so much time and economy on these little dribbling expenditures, as to prevent us from stopping the greater expenditure in reference to the Army, &c. We do get some benefit from all these appropriations, and I am inclined to vote for the bill. I would like, however, an assurance from the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] on one point. In the correspondence that was read by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. CLEMENS,] at the opening of Congress, the election of Mr. Wendell, as Printer, was urged on the ground that he had bled so patriotically and so freely in the last presidential campaign —

Mr. PHELPS. I must make a question of order on the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I think I am in order. I simply want an assurance from the gentleman from Missouri that none of this money is to go to remunerate Mr. Wendell for these patriotic services.

Mr. PHELPS. I will answer the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois in this way. Mr. Wendell can get nothing under this bill except for work performed according to the prices specified in the act of Congress of 1852, when the prices were regulated by Congress.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Then I can vote for the bill with a great deal of satisfaction. I believe we do get some benefit from all these publications.

The question was taken on Mr. Boyce's amendment to the amendment, and it was adopted.

Mr. GARNETT. I offer the following amendment to come in as an additional section:

And no extra copies of any document shall be printed, except when ordered by joint resolution.

My motive in offering this amendment is a very simple one. It is to restore the business of printing to the limits of our constitutional authority. Under the name of contingent funds, and orders of a single House of Congress, we have spent, under the head of printing, two and a half millions in the last Congress, and have averaged a million and a quarter for the last four years, and this not by authority of law, but by the order of a single House of Congress.

Now there is no power in the Constitution more carefully guarded than the power over the purse. In all forms of republican government the money power is the one that is most carefully limited; and under our form of government, the Constitution requires that before any money is appropriated or spent, the expenditure shall be sanctioned by both Houses of Congress, and approved by the President. And yet, sir, by a species of legislative legerdemain, we have succeeded, for the last four years, in averaging a million and a quarter in the single matter of printing, without any other sanction whatever than resolutions passed in a single House of Congress, most frequently under the gag, and without the yeas and nays.

If the amendment be adopted, it will at once put a stop to this thing. No large expenditure for printing can then be made unless sanctioned by the legislative authority of this Government, by both Houses of Congress, and by the signature of the President. I submit, then, whether it would not be a worthy and proper reform for this Congress to inaugurate, to declare that while each House of Congress shall be competent to order that printing which is necessary for its own purposes, to enable them to discharge their duties as legislators intelligently, yet that all general expenditures for printing—this immense hole in which so much money is annually sunk—shall be placed again under the control of the proper legislative department of the Government. Many of the amendments hitherto offered have looked to remedying past abuses. This amendment looks to preventing such abuses for the future; and in my humble judgment, it will go far to promote economy and bring down the printing expenses of Congress to the ancient standard.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GARNETT,] merely for the purpose of making one statement. The other day I adverted to the great value of a work which had been published by order of Congress—the Commercial Relations—and I said that it had done us great credit at home and abroad. I am very unwilling that that work, which I really think the only valuable one that Congress has printed, should be put in the same category with these other trashy publications, and made to bear the burden of them. And I now desire to have read to the House an extract from a letter just received at the State Department, addressed to the superintendent, (Mr. Flagg,) from Mr. Alexander Vauemare, agent for international exchanges, dated at Paris, December 1, 1857, in reference to that work, to show how it is regarded abroad.

The extract was read, as follows:

"According to your instructions, I presented to his excellency the Minister of Agriculture, Commerce, and Public Works, the third and fourth volumes, with your thanks. This distinguished statesman received them with gratitude, and expressed once more his high appreciation of your most valuable Herculean labors, and instructed me to renew to you his congratulations for the same. While examining them, the minister expressed his admiration for the beauty and perfection with which these volumes are executed, as well as the liberality of the Federal Government, which never shrinks before any sacrifices calculated to elevate the American character, and the promotion of useful knowledge."

The question being on Mr. GARNETT's amendment to the amendment,

Mr. FLORENCE demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HASKIN and DEWART were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—yes ninety-one, a further count not being demanded.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. NICHOLS. I move the following as an additional section to the bill:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That hereafter, when any report or other communication is submitted to either House of Congress, by any Department, bureau, or office of the Government, or by any other person or persons, and such report or other communication is ordered to be printed, no additions of any kind shall be made thereto, without the direction of the House of Congress giving the order to print; and no alterations or corrections shall be made therein which will change the character of the work as originally communicated and ordered to be printed, or which may add to the cost of printing, without the order of the House ordering the said extra copies.

Mr. Chairman, I offer that amendment for the purpose of obviating an objection which has run through this whole debate. Now, sir, if you will take the last two reports of the Superintendent of the Public Printing, you will find this state of facts existing: that when the report was made to the House of Representatives on the 13th of January, 1857, you will find, in reference to the Pacific railroad report, for instance, that the Superintendent of the Public Printing states that the work will be embraced in six volumes. If you will take the report made by the same officer a year subsequently, you will find that the same work is to be embodied in eleven volumes. Now, sir, this discrepancy comes from the failure of the House, in making its order to print, to limit the amount of matter to be embodied in the report. My amendment is designed substantially to cover this point. It provides, that whenever any report shall be submitted for printing, it shall be perfect in itself, and that it shall be within the control of no other person; that neither the Superintendent of Public Printing, nor the author, nor any executive officer, shall have the power to embody additional matter in the report; that they shall be bound by the report as at first presented. I think that every member of this House has been able to gather sufficient from the discussion which has taken place on this question, to see the necessity of some peremptory provision of law to furnish some check upon the executive officers upon this subject.

I would have preferred to have offered this provision in another form. I believe that independent legislation on an appropriation bill is improper, and in violation of the rules of the House; but inasmuch as the committee have already adopted substantial provisions of legislation, and incorporated them into this appropriation bill, I have offered this amendment in good faith, and I hope it will be adopted. I believe it is the most material amendment which has been offered, and that it will place a salutary and necessary limitation upon the officers having in charge the matter of the public printing.

Mr. HOUSTON. My opinion is that the amendment just offered by the gentleman from Ohio conflicts with that already adopted. I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, adopted a moment ago, provides that no additional or extra copies of any work shall be ordered, without the concurrence of both Houses of Congress. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, as I understand it, provides that no change shall be made in reports as first presented without the consent of the House ordering it to be printed. If the gentleman from Ohio will strike out the last part of his amendment, I think it will make the matter consistent, and I shall be in favor of it.

Mr. NICHOLS. I will modify my amendment by striking out these words: "without the order of the House ordering the said extra copies." I will say, however, for the information of the gentleman from Alabama, that the limitation contained in my amendment was designed to apply as well to the regular copies ordered to be printed, as to the extra copies.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I submit the following as an additional section:

Be it further enacted, That hereafter it shall be the duty of the Executive Departments to contract for and procure the printing, on the most favorable terms possible, of all forms, blanks, and other printing necessary for or connected with their respective Departments, at such point or points, or in the vicinity thereof, in the United States, where such forms, blanks, or other printing may be required for use: Provided, That such printing shall not exceed in price the amount heretofore paid for the same.

Mr. Chairman, the practice now is, as I understand it, to print all the blanks and forms needed for Government purposes in the city of Washington, and send them throughout the United States to the different post offices. The object of my amendment is to have this printing done in the States where it is required. The work can be done there just as cheaply as it can be done here, and more expeditiously. I think, therefore, the amendment is proper, and that the House ought to order this printing to be done where it is required.

I know no reason why all the Government patronage should be confined to two or three papers in the city of Washington. The constituents of every gentleman upon this floor contribute their equal proportion to pay these expenses; and if there is any advantage arising from this, they ought to be permitted to share in it, and it should not be monopolized in the city of Washington. If post office blanks and forms are needed in your State and mine, let the Postmaster General contract with some printing establishment there to furnish them. Then the mails will not be constantly incumbered with these forms and blanks.

Mr. LETCHER. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, and I am opposed to it on the score of economy. Now it is perfectly manifest that by this amendment you are to have thirty-one places for printing these blanks, and you are to pay thirty-one times for the composition of these blanks; while, as it now is, we print all these blanks in the city of Washington, or, perhaps, a part of them in New York. We pay for the composition only once, in the one case, or only twice at the furthest. So that the additional cost is nothing more than paper and press-work.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I merely wish to say to the gentleman from Virginia that if he will notice the proviso to the additional section which I have offered, he will see that his objection amounts to nothing; for the proviso is that the printing shall not cost more than it would if printed in this city.

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman will see at once, that if this plan is to be adopted, you necessarily increase the cost of printing here, on account of the less amount to be done, and thus you necessarily run up the cost elsewhere, as the cost here is taken as the basis of compensation elsewhere.

Mr. PHELPS. And besides, you have the expense of sending the paper to those various points.

Mr. LETCHER. It strikes me that it will be vastly cheaper to send the blanks, after they are printed here, to the various post offices of the United States.

There is one way in which you might lighten the cost and expense; and that is, to stop the transmission of seeds through the mails, which would lessen, to some extent, the cost of mail transportation. But, at any rate, the proposed plan will be attended with greater expense to attain the end than is now incurred by the Government.

Mr. HOUSTON. I propose to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I rise to a point of order in reference to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois. I think there is a short way of disposing of that amendment. We are now upon a deficiency bill to supply deficiencies in the public printing ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives. Here is a proposition which travels outside of the question before the committee. It proposes to regulate the manner in which the printing of the Executive Departments shall be done. I therefore make the point of order that it has no reference whatever to the subject-matter before the committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman makes the point too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order, believing that it is made too late.

Mr. HOUSTON. I now propose to offer, as a substitute for the amendment, the amendment which I offered a short time ago and which was ruled out of order. The substitute proposes to restrict the publication of these notices which ought to be published in the States. They ought to be published in the States instead of here, and the money which is paid for that labor here should be distributed among the States where the blanks and forms are needed. My substitute proposes that instead of their being published in two or three papers here, the publication shall be confined to one paper, and that the thirty or forty thousand dollars saved thereby shall be paid for publication in the States where the service is performed.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a point of order. The amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules the amendment out of order.

Mr. HOUSTON. The amendment relates to precisely the same subject as that of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SEWARD. If it is out of order I object to it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope that the Chair will be good enough to look at the amendment. It was ruled out of order before, and now the Chair has admitted an amendment regulating the printing of the Executive Departments. Now, I ask by what discriminating process a difference can be drawn between the gentleman's amendment and my own?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules the amendment out of order. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I offer the following amendment: Insert after the word "dollars," in the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BURNETT,] the following:

And that said sum of money, so appropriated, shall be applied to the completion of the "Pacific railroad surveys" and the "commercial relations," and to such other work as has been ordered by Congress, which is now executed; and that the Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire and report whether or not any portion of the works above specified for completion can be dispensed with without injury to the volumes already completed.

And strike out all after said word "dollars," down to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. PHELPS. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. SEWARD. The original bill is now being amended, and I suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky is not now before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky is in order.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Of course it is. It would be very remarkable if it were not.

Mr. Chairman, I propose my amendment as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BURNETT.] The gentleman from Kentucky proposes to strike out everything after the seventh line of the bill, and to appropriate $420,000 for the printing, binding, engraving, lithographing, and so forth. Now, I propose to amend his amendment, so as to direct that the $420,000 shall be appropriated to the completion of the Pacific railroad reports and the report on commercial relations, and such other works as are now executed and ready for delivery. My amendment furthermore provides that the Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire into the fact whether or not it would be proper to dispense with any portion of the Pacific railroad surveys or the commercial relations; and if so, that that committee report the fact to the House. The $420,000 will be amply sufficient for that purpose. A sum of $316,000 would cover the amount of printing, binding, engraving, and lithographing, for which we now owe; and the sum proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky gives $104,000 in addition to that.

Now, I desire to state to the committee that, in the original bill, the Committee of Ways and Means ask for $178,000 for lithographing and engraving, whilst there is, in the hands of the proper officers, the sum of $125,000 that has not yet been disbursed. Again, sir, none of the binding of seventy thousand extra copies, and ten thousand seven hundred and ten regular copies of the Pacific railroad surveys has been done; and there is, in the hands of the Clerk of the House of Representatives, at this time, a sum of $125,000. That, with the amount proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, will make a sufficient sum to cover the entire amount of the debt, as well as to carry forward the Pacific railroad surveys and the commercial relations, provided the Committee on Printing deem it proper and right to continue the publication of those works to their completion. Now, I ask the committee to adopt that amendment.

Mr. PHELPS. I would ask the gentleman from Georgia whether he is not aware that the sums now in hand, to which he has referred, were deducted by the Committee of Ways and Means, with the exception of some $5,000?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I know that.

Mr. PHELPS. Then justice required that you should state it to the committee.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The Clerk says that there is a sum of $125,000 still in his hands to pay for this work, and I am informed by an officer under the Clerk of the House that none of the binding of the Thirty-Third Congress or of the Thirty-Fourth Congress has yet gone into the hands of the binder, and they have money yet on hand to pay for lithographing and engraving. Why, then, should we appropriate $790,000 when they have in their possession $125,000 which has not yet been expended on binding and lithographing? I hope the committee will adopt my amendment.

Mr. PHELPS. I desire that the Clerk shall report the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky as it will read if the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia shall be adopted. If I understand the amendment, the gentleman proposes to strike out matter which has already been adopted by the committee. If that be so, I desire to make the question of order, that the gentleman has no right to submit an amendment to strike out what has been adopted by the committee.

The amendments were again read.

Mr. PHELPS. If the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia is entertained, I have something to say in opposition to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the amendment is in order.

Mr. PHELPS. I have but a few remarks to make. I was astonished that the gentleman from Georgia, who is a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, did not inform the House that that committee had diminished the appropriation by so much money as was in the hands of the Clerk, which might be applied to the payment of the expense of binding, engraving, and lithographing. His statement would seem to convey the idea that the Committee of Ways and Means did not take that into consideration, when the fact is, they did diminish the appropriations by that amount with the exception of $5,000 which it was intimated was necessary to pay bills outstanding.

But the gentleman from Georgia rises and tells you, when the printing of the Commercial Relations has not been completed, that he wants no portion of this money to go to defray the expenses of printing that work.

Mr. CRAWFORD. No, sir, I did not say that.

Mr. PHELPS. Then I misunderstood the gentleman, and I have no desire to misrepresent him. But I understood the gentleman to say that no portion of the documents ordered to be printed by the Thirty-Third Congress had as yet been bound. The gentleman stated that—

Mr. CRAWFORD. I did not. If the gentleman will allow me, I will repeat what I said, or intended to be understood as saying. I intended to say that the binding for the Thirty-Third Congress amounted to $93,000, and the binding for the Thirty-Fourth Congress amounted to $39,000, making in all $132,000, which amount was estimated for by the committee, that there was now in the hands of the Clerk $75,000, and that no portion of the work had gone to the binders. That is what I stated.

Mr. PHELPS. The way in which the bill was prepared was this. The Clerk submitted to the Committee of Ways and Means his estimate of the amount necessary to defray the expenses. He exceeded the amount of money which he has at his disposal for this purpose; and we have diminished the sum by the amount of money which the Clerk has on hand, in each instance, for the binding and engraving. So that we do not appropriate any more money than is necessary, according to the estimate of the Clerk, including the unexpended balance of appropriation on hand. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The question was taken on Mr. CRAWFORD's amendment to the amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. PHELPS. I now ask that the Clerk report the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BURNETT,] with the part of the bill which it proposes to strike out. Then we can make it a test vote, and can vote understandingly.

Mr. BURNETT's amendment, as amended by that of Mr. SEWARD, was reported as follows:

Strike out of the bill the following words:

The following sums of money are hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated:

To pay for paper, $169,133.

To pay for the printing ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives during the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, $122,564 58.

To pay for the binding, lithographing, and engraving ordered by the Senate during the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, $320,555 15.

To pay for the binding, engraving, lithographing, and electrotyping ordered by the House of Representatives during the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, $178,321 53.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

The sum of $420,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That no part of the appropriations contemplated by this act shall be paid, unless the same be received and accepted by those claiming to be entitled thereto in full consideration for any and every book now printed or to be printed; for all paper now purchased, or to be purchased; for all engravings, finished or unfinished; lithographing, finished or unfinished; or any other work done, or to be done, ordered during the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, upon the condition only so far as may be within the legal operation of some contract heretofore entered into, which shall be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BURNETT. I desire to know whether it is not in order for me to move that the amendments of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GARRETT,] and of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS,] be added to my amendment as amended?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can offer a substitute for the whole bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. The amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky is proposed as a substitute. Is it not in order now to amend that amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order to amend it by adding to it.

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, I understand that the gentleman from Kentucky moves to add these other amendments to his. His motion is to embody them all in one amendment; and then the two propositions will come up in competition, the original bill as amended, and the amendment as amended. That is competent; and the Chair is right in so ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that it is competent for the gentleman from Kentucky to move to amend his amendment.

Mr. BURNETT. That is the motion I make.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. I ask for the reading of the propositions to be added as amendments to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky. The amendments were again read.

The question now being on Mr. BURNETT's amendment to the amendment,

Mr. HOUSTON called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BUFFINTON and TALBOT were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—yeas 58, noes 69.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

[The committee here informally rose, and a message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by JAMES BUCHANAN HENRY, his Private Secretary, which was handed in at the Speaker's table; and the committee again resumed its session.]

The question then recurred on the substitute submitted by Mr. BURNETT as amended.

The amendment as amended was disagreed to—yeas 51, noes 80.

Mr. SEWARD. I now move my amendment as an amendment to the original bill. I move to add at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of the appropriations contemplated by this act shall be paid, unless the same be received and accepted by those claiming to be entitled thereto, in full consideration for any and every book now printed or to be printed; for all paper now purchased or to be purchased; for engraving finished or unfinished; lithographing finished or unfinished; or any other work done or to be done; ordered during the Thirty-Third or Thirty-Fourth Congresses, and then only so far as may be within the legal operation of some contract heretofore entered into, which shall be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. PHELPS. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his amendment. It is substantially embraced in the amendments adopted to the original bill.

Mr. SEWARD. I insist on my amendment; and demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BURNETT and ADRIN were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—yeas 61, noes 62.

So the amendment was lost.

Mr. PHELPS. I now move that the committee rise, and report the bill and amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 202) to appropriate money to supply deficiencies for the paper, printing, binding, and engraving, ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with a recommendation that they be concurred in.

Mr. PHELPS. I demand the previous question.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to lay the bill upon the table; and upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 88, nays 103; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atkins, Avery, Blair, Burlingame, Burnett, Case, Clawson, Clemens, Cobb, Clark, B. Cochrane, Colfax, Covode, Burton, Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dewart, Dodd, Durfee, Eliott, English, Fenton, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gilman, Goodwin, Grow, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hill, Hoard, Houston, Hughes, Jackson, Leavitt, George W. Jones, Keitt, Kilgore, Lamar, Leach, Leiter, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Potter, Powell, Quinman, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Rowce, Seales, Seward, Ready, Reagan, Ricard, Robbins, Judson W. Sherman, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Stanton, Stephens, Stevenson, Talbot, Thayer, Tompkins, Tripp, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Israel Washburn, Watkins, Wilson, Wood, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollicofer—88.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Andrews, Arnold, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bishop, Bliss, Bock, Braxton, Bryan, Buffinton, Burroughs, Campbell, Cassie, Claflie, Chapman, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, John Cochrane, Cockrell, Comins, Cox, James Craig, Danzell, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dean, Edmundson, Eustis, Farnsworth, Faulkner, Florence, Foster, Giddings, Gillis, Gilmer, Gooch, Goode, Granger, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Hatch, Hawkins, Hickman, Hopkins, Horton, Howard, Huyler, Jenkins, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kelogg, Kelly, Kelsey, Jacob M. Kunkel, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, Letcher, Lovejoy, Maclay, Millson, Montgomery, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Mott, Niblack, Nichols, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Pottle, Purviance, Reilly, Ritchie, Russell, Sandidge, Scott, Shorter, Sickles, Samuel A. Smith, James A. Stewart, Tappan, Wade, Ward, Ellihu B. Washburne, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, and Wortendyke—103.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

Pending the call,

Mr. SHORTER stated the gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. TAYLOR, was confined to his room by sickness.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. PHELPS. I suggest that the amendments be read over; and that any member, who desires, may indicate any particular amendment that he wishes a separate vote upon, and that we vote upon the remaining ones en masse.

Mr. SEWARD. I object. I want a vote upon each amendment separately.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I rise to a privileged question. I voted against laying the bill upon the table, supposing that the vote was upon the proposition itself. I should have voted for laying it upon the table, had I understood the question.

The question recurred upon the first amendment, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the Joint Committee on Printing is hereby directed to inquire if it is right and expedient to discontinue the further publication of any of the reports ordered to be printed by either the Senate or House of Representatives of the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, which have not yet been printed, in whole or in part.

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the amendment be laid upon the table.

Mr. PHELPS. Does not that carry the bill with it?

Mr. SEWARD. It does; and I make the motion for that purpose.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a question of order. That amendment, sir, has no relation to the original subject-matter of the bill. The bill is one to appropriate money to pay for printing, binding, and engraving done, for paper furnished, and so forth. That amendment proposes to place in the hands of the Joint Committee on Printing the power to revise all these works, to direct a discontinuance of them if they think proper, and to report to the House. That is new and distinct legislation.

The SPEAKER. The question of order might have been very appropriate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, but it cannot be entertained in the House. The Chair therefore overrules the question of order.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would ask what would be the effect of laying the amendment on the table? Would it carry the whole bill with it?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. SEWARD. Do I understand the Chair to decide that the House is committed by the decision of the committee?

The SPEAKER. That is the decision of the Chair. The Chair would feel very unwilling, by a mere opinion of his, to overrule the decision of the Committee of the Whole, and to decide that to be out of order which the committee decided was in order, and proper to be reported to the House. The proper time for the gentleman from Georgia to have raised the question of order would have been when the amendment was offered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The amendment was agreed to.

The second amendment was then read, and agreed to, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful to order the printing of extra copies of any reports or other writings submitted to Congress, until the Joint Committee on Printing shall first estimate and report the extent and probable cost of the reports or writings to be printed.

The third amendment was then read, as follows:

And no extra copies of any document shall be printed, except when ordered by joint resolution.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to lay that amendment upon the table.

Mr. BLAIR. What would be the effect of that motion? Would it not carry the whole bill on the table?

The SPEAKER. That is the effect of it.

Mr. READY. Well, is the motion in order after the House has refused to lay the bill upon the table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is, because the bill is not now in the condition, legislatively, that it was in when the motion was made to lay it upon the table.

Mr. STANTON. I rise to a question of order. I submit that, if the gentleman from Georgia wants his motion acted upon by the House, he should put it in a form in which it would be in order. The motion to lay the amendment on the table is not in order, because it would carry the bill with it.

Mr. SEWARD. I am surprised that the gentleman from Ohio should make such a statement as that, in the face of his experience in Congress for the last four or five years.

The SPEAKER. The Chair entertains the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken; and the House refused to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. GROW. I call for the yeas and nays upon agreeing to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 116, nays 75; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Anderson, Andrews, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Blair, Boeck, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Case, Caskey, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, Clark B. Cochran, John Cochran, Cockerill, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Mississippi, Dodd, Dowdell, Edmundson, English, Faulkner, Fenton, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gilmer, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Lawrence W. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hill, Hoard, Hopkins, Horton, Houston, Howard, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kilgore, Jacob M. Kunkel, Letcher, McKibbin, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Millson, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Isaac N. Morris, Mott, Niblack, Nichols, Olin, Pettit, Peyton, Pike, Powell, Quidman, Ready, Reagan, Ricard, Sandidge, Scales, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Singleton, Robert Smith, Stallworth, Stanton, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, Tompkins, Trippe, Underwood, Walbridge, Waldron, Ward, Ellihu B. Washburne, Watkins, Whiteley, Wilson, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—116.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Ahl, Arnold, Bingham, Bishop, Bliss, Braxton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Chaffee, John B. Clark, Clawson, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Danrell, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Iowa, Dean, Dewart, Durfee, Elliott, Eustis, Farnsworth, Florence, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gooch, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Haskin, Hickman, Jewett, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelly, Landy, Lawrence, Leach, Leidy, Leiter, Lovejoy, Maclay, Humphrey Marshall, Montgomery, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Parker, Phelps, Phillips, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Reilly, Ritchie, Robbins, Royce, Russell, Scott, Sickles, Samuel A. Smith, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Wade, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Israel Washburn, and White—75.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARNETT moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Is it in order to move to lay this bill aside, and take up the message of the President of the United States which was received to-day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. May it not be done by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It can be done by unanimous consent; but by nothing short of unanimous consent.

Mr. PHELPS. I must object at this time.

The fourth amendment was then read, and agreed to, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That hereafter, when any report or other communication is submitted to either House of Congress, by any Department, bureau, or office of the Government, or by any other person or persons, and such report or other communication is ordered to be printed, no additions of any kind shall be made thereto, without the direction of the House of Congress giving the order to print; and no alterations or corrections shall be made therein which will change the character of the work as originally communicated and ordered to be printed, or which may add to the cost of printing.

Mr. SINGLETON. I have a resolution which I desire to offer in connection with this bill.

Mr. PHELPS. I must object, the previous question having been sustained.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having all been disposed of, the question recurred on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

Mr. HUGHES. Has the bill been engrossed?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. HUGHES. Then I object to the third reading at this time.

Mr. PHELPS. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will not interpose that objection. It is merely a formal one. I hope the gentleman will withdraw it, and let us dispose of this matter now.

Mr. HUGHES. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. ENGLISH. I renew it.

Mr. PHELPS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed; and upon that question I ask for the yeas and nays. By the time the vote has been taken the bill will be engrossed.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not know who objected to the third reading of the bill. I expect to vote against the bill myself, but I hope that this kind of opposition will be withdrawn, and that we shall take the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. SEWARD. I renew the objection to the third reading of the bill. I intend to fight this bill at every step. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. LETCHER. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER announced that thirty-five members voted for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PHELPS. I will inquire whether the bill is now engrossed?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. PHELPS. Then I hope that the motion to adjourn will be withdrawn; and I withdraw my motion to reconsider.

Mr. SEWARD. I should like to know how the bill came to be engrossed with such dispatch?

Mr. LETCHER. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SEWARD. I renew the call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had not announced that the yeas and nays were ordered. The gentleman from Virginia would not have the right to withdraw the call, provided the result had been announced.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CRAIG, of North Carolina, and WALDRON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ay one, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. SEWARD. I raise the point of order, whether the clerks of this House can engross a bill before it is ordered by the House to be engrossed?

Mr. LETCHER. I believe the Brunswick navy-yard bill was engrossed before it was ordered to be. [Laughter.]

Mr. SEWARD. That is a great mistake, sir. I make this point of order: that no clerk of this House is authorized to engross a bill until it is ordered to be engrossed. It was an unofficial act, done prior to the order of the House; and I might as well bring in a copy and tender it at the Clerk's desk and insist that it is an engrossed bill, as have it brought in in this way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the question of order raised by the gentleman from Georgia. The bill appears to be engrossed. The Chair does not know when it was done, nor is it requisite that the Chair should know.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I hope that the rule, requiring bills to be engrossed and read a third time, will be observed. We have no Committee on Engrossment in this House, to report and certify that a bill is correctly engrossed. When a bill is ordered to be engrossed, the rule requires that the question should be put, "When shall the bill have its third reading?" Then the House can fix the time, whether now, to-morrow, or at any other time, provided that the bill be engrossed in a fair hand. Then it should be read to the House, so that each member may vote understandingly on its passage. But, sir, we have fallen into the habit—

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The Chair understood the gentleman from Tennessee as rising to a question of order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If I am right, the first question is: "When shall this bill have its first reading?" And it is wrong, in my opinion, for us here to pass bills of this character till they have been engrossed.

The SPEAKER. Debate is objected to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask that the bill be read now as engrossed.

Mr. GROW. Rule 116 will settle the gentleman's point of order.

The rule was read, as follows:

"Upon the second reading of a bill the Speaker shall state it as ready for commitment or engrossment; and, if committed, then a question shall be, whether to a select or standing committee, or to a Committee of the Whole House; if to a Committee of the Whole House, the House shall determine on what day—if no motion be made to commit, the question shall be stated on its engrossment; and if it be not ordered to be engrossed on the day of its being reported, it shall be placed on the general file on the Speaker's table, to be taken up in order. But, if the bill be ordered to be engrossed, the House shall appoint the day when it shall be read the third time."

The SPEAKER. The Chair, in stating the question, stated it thus: Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time? And the gentleman from Tennessee is aware that no other form of voting on the question has existed in this House, certainly for the last ten years.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I know that; but we have been in the habit of reading the bill by its title, without being engrossed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to demand that the engrossed bill shall be read.

Mr. PHELPS. I hope it will be read.

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the bill be referred to a select committee, to ascertain whether it is properly engrossed or not.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order; the previous question not being exhausted.

The bill, as engrossed, was read.

Mr. PHELPS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. PHELPS demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to strike out the caption of that bill.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill is not yet before the House for consideration.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Before the previous question is ordered on the passage of the bill, I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will ask his question, unless objection is made.

Mr. BURNETT. I object.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Then I hope the gentleman will withdraw the previous question to enable me to ask the question. I understand that this bill makes an appropriation for printing a book which has never been ordered to be printed by either House of Congress. I desire to know whether there is any appropriation in this bill for publishing the Dred Scott decision?

Mr. PHELPS. No, sir; it does not. I can answer that question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. BURNETT demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 67, nays 135; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Arnold, Bishop, Bocoek, Bowie, Burroughs, Campbell, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, John Cochrane, Cox, James Craig, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dean, Dowdell, Eustis, Farnsworth, Florence, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Hatch, Hawkins, Howard, Huyler, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelly, Kelsey, Landy, Leidy, Letcher, McClay, McKibbin, Millson, Montgomery, Mott, Niblack, Nichols, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Potte, Purviance, Reilly, Ritchie, Sandidge, Scott, Searing, Aaron Shaw, Samuel A. Smith, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, Ward, White, and Wortendyke—67.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Anderson, Andrews, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Bryan, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burnett, Burns, Cuse, Caskie, Clawson, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Damrell, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dewart, Dodd, Duffey, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Fenton, Forney, Foster, Garnett, Garrett, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Gregg, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hill, Hoard, Hopkins, Horton, Houston, Hughes, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, Keitt, Kilgore, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lawrence, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Edward J. Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Powell, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Ricard, Robbins, Royce, Ruffin, Scales, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Singleton, Robert Smith, Spigner, Stallworth, Stanton, Stephens, Stevenson, Talbot, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Watkins, Whiteley, Wilson, Winslow, Wood, Woodson, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollicoffer—135.

So the bill was rejected.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to reconsider the vote just taken for the purpose of recommitting the bill, with instructions to report a bill making an appropriation of a sum sufficient to pay for the work actually done.

Mr. LETCHER. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

THE LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move to take up the message of the President of the United States, sent to us this morning.

No objection being made,

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message of the President of the United States:

To the Senate and

House of Representatives of the United States:

I have received from J. Calhoun, Esq., President of the late constitutional convention of Kansas, a copy, duly certified by himself, of the constitution framed by that body, with the expression of a hope that I would submit the same to the consideration of Congress, "with the view of the admission of Kansas into the Union as an independent State." In compliance with this request, I herewith transmit to Congress for their action, the constitution of Kansas, with the ordinance respecting the public lands, as well as the letter of Mr. Calhoun, dated at Leocompton, on the 14th ultimo, by which they were accompanied. Having received but a single copy of the constitution and ordinance, I send this to the Senate.

A great delusion seems to pervade the public mind in relation to the condition of parties in Kansas. This arises from the difficulty of inducing the American people to realize the fact that any portion of them should be in a state of rebellion against the Government under which they live. When we speak of the affairs of Kansas, we are apt to refer merely to the existence of two violent political parties in that Territory, divided on the question of slavery, just as we speak of such parties in the States. This presents no adequate idea of the true state of the case. The dividing line there is not between two political parties, both acknowledging the lawful existence of the Government, but between those who are loyal to this Government and those who have endeavored to destroy its existence by force and by usurpation—between those who sustain and those who have done all in their power to overthrow the territorial government established by Congress. This government they would long since have subverted, had it not been protected from their assaults by the troops of the United States. Such has been the condition of affairs since my inauguration. Ever since that period, a large portion of the people of Kansas have been in a state of rebellion against the government, with a military leader at their head of a most turbulent and dangerous character. They have never acknowledged, but have constantly renounced and defied the government to which they owe allegiance, and have been all the time in a state of resistance against its authority. They have all the time been endeavoring to subvert it, and to establish a revolutionary government under the so-called Topeka constitution in its stead. Even at this very moment the Topeka Legislature are in session. Whoever has read the correspondence of Governor Walker with the State Department, recently communicated to the Senate, will be convinced that this picture is not overdrawn. He always protested against the withdrawal of any portion of the military force of the United States from the Territory, deeming its presence absolutely necessary for the preservation of the regular government and the execution of the laws. In his very first dispatch to the Secretary of State, dated June 2, 1857, he says: "The most alarming movement, however, proceeds from the assembling on the 9th June of the so-called Topeka Legislature with a view to the enactment of an entire code of laws. Of course, it will be my endeavor to prevent such a result, as it would lead to inevitable and disastrous collision, and, in fact, renew the civil war in Kansas." This was with difficulty prevented by the efforts of Governor Walker; but soon thereafter, on the 14th July, we find him requesting General Harney to furnish him a regiment of dragoons to proceed to the city of Lawrence; and this for the reason that he had received authentic intelligence, verified by his own actual observation, that a dangerous rebellion had occurred, "involving an open defiance of the laws, and the establishment of an insurgent government in that city."

In the Governor's dispatch of July 15, he informs the Secretary of State "that this movement at Lawrence was the beginning of a plan, originating in that city, to organize insurrection throughout the Territory, and especially in all towns, cities, or counties where the Republican party have a majority. Lawrence is the hot-bed of all the abolition movements in this Territory. It is the town established by the abolition societies of the East; and, whilst there are respectable people there, it is filled by a considerable number of mercenaries, who are paid by abolition societies to perpetuate and diffuse agitation throughout Kansas, and prevent a peaceful settlement of this question. Having failed in inducing their own so-called Topeka State Legislature to organize this insurrection, Lawrence has commenced it herself; and if not arrested, the rebellion will extend throughout the Territory." And again: "In order to send this communication immediately by mail, I must close by assuring you that the spirit of rebellion pervades the great mass of the Republican party of this Territory, instigated, as I entertain no doubt they are, by eastern societies, having in view results most disastrous to the Government and to the Union; and that the continued presence of General Harney here is indispensable, as originally stipulated by me, with a large body of dragoons and several batteries."

On the 20th July, 1857, General Lane, under the authority of the Topeka convention, undertook, as Governor Walker informs us, "to organize the whole so-called free-State party into volunteers, and to take the names of all who refuse enrollment. The professed object is to protect the polls, at the election in August, of the new insurgent Topeka State Legislature." "The object of taking the names of all who refuse enrollment is to terrify the free-State conservatives into submission. This is proved by recent atrocities committed on such men by Topekaites. The speedy location of large bodies of regular troops here, with two batteries, is necessary. The Lawrence insurgents await the development of this new revolutionary military organization," &c., &c.

In the Governor's dispatch of July 27, he says, that "General Lane and his staff everywhere deny the authority of the territorial laws, and counsel a total disregard of these enactments." Without making further quotations of a similar character from other dispatches of Governor Walker, it appears, by a reference to Mr. Stanton's communication to General Cass, of the 9th December last, that the "important step of calling the Legislature together was taken after I [he] had become satisfied that the election ordered by the convention on the 21st instant, could not be conducted without collision and bloodshed." So intense was the disloyal feeling among the enemies of the government established by Congress, that an election, which afforded them an opportunity, if in the majority, of making Kansas a free State, according to their own professed desire, could not be conducted without collision and bloodshed! The truth is, that up till the present moment, the enemies of the existing government still adhere to their Topeka revolutionary constitution and government.

The very first paragraph of the message of Governor Robinson, dated on the 7th December, to the Topeka Legislature, now assembled at Lawrence, contains an open defiance of the Constitution and laws of the United States. The Governor says: "The convention which framed the constitution at Topeka, originated with the people of Kansas Territory. They have adopted and ratified the same twice by a direct vote, and also indirectly through two elections of State officers and members of the State Legislature. Yet it has pleased the Administration to regard the whole proceeding revolutionary."

This Topeka government, adhered to with such treasonable pertinacity, is a government in direct opposition to the existing government prescribed and recognized by Congress.

It is a usurpation of the same character as it would be for a portion of the people of any State of the Union to undertake to establish a separate government, within its limits, for the purpose of redressing any grievance, real or imaginary, of which they might complain, against the legitimate State government.

Such a principle, if carried into execution, would destroy all lawful authority, and produce universal anarchy.

From this statement of facts the reason becomes palpable why the enemies of the government, authorized by Congress, have refused to vote for delegates to the Kansas constitutional convention, and also, afterwards, on the question of slavery, submitted by it to the people. It is because they have ever refused to sanction or recognize any other constitution than that framed at Topeka. Had the whole Lecompton constitution been submitted to the people, the adherents of this organization would doubtless have voted against it, because, if successful, they would thus have removed an obstacle out of the way of their own revolutionary constitution. They would have done this, not upon a consideration of the merits of the whole, or any part of the Lecompton constitution, but simply because they have ever resisted the authority of the Government authorized by Congress, from which it emanated.

Such being the unfortunate condition of affairs in the Territory, what was the right, as well as the duty, of the law-abiding people? Were they silently and patiently to submit to the Topeka usurpation, or adopt the necessary measures to establish a constitution under the authority of the organic law of Congress?

That this law recognized the right of the people of the Territory, without any enabling act from Congress, to form a State constitution, is too clear for argument. For Congress "to leave the people of the Territory perfectly free," in framing their constitution, "to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States," and then to say that they shall not be permitted to proceed and frame a constitution in their own way without an express authority from Congress, appears to be almost a contradiction in terms. It would be much more plausible to contend that Congress had no power to pass such an enabling act, than to argue that the people of a Territory might be kept out of the Union for an indefinite period, and until it might please Congress to permit them to exercise the right of self-government. This would be to adopt, not "their own way," but the way which Congress might prescribe.

It is impossible that any people could have proceeded with more regularity in the formation of a constitution, than the people of Kansas have done. It was necessary first to ascertain whether it was the desire of the people to be relieved from their territorial dependence, and establish a State government. For this purpose the Territorial Legislature, in 1855, passed a law "for taking the sense of the people of this Territory upon the expediency of calling a convention to form a State constitution," at the general election to be held in October, 1856. The "sense of the people" was accordingly taken, and they decided in favor of a convention. It is true, that at this election the enemies of the territorial government did not vote, because they were then engaged at Topeka, without the slightest pretext of lawful authority, in framing a constitution of their own, for the purpose of subverting the territorial government.

In pursuance of this decision of the people in favor of a convention, the Territorial Legislature, on the 27th day of February, 1857, passed an act for the election of delegates, on the third Monday of June, 1857, to frame a State constitution. This law is as fair in its provisions as any that ever passed a legislative body for a similar purpose. The right of suffrage at this election is clearly and justly defined. "Every bona fide inhabitant of the Territory of Kansas" on the third Monday of June, the day of the election, who was a citizen of the United States, above the age of twenty-one, and had resided therein for three months previous to that date, was entitled to vote. In order to avoid all interference from neighboring States or Territories with the freedom and fairness of the election, provision was made for the registry of the qualified voters; and in pursuance thereof, nine thousand two hundred and fifty-one voters were registered. Governor Walker did his whole duty in urging all the qualified citizens of Kansas to vote at this election. In his inaugural address on the 27th of May last, he informed them that "under our practice the preliminary act of framing a State constitution is uniformly performed through the instrumentality of a convention of delegates chosen by the people themselves. That convention is now about to be elected by you, under the call of the Territorial Legislature, created and still recognized by the authority of Congress, and clothed by it, in the comprehensive language of the organic law, with full power to make such an enactment. The Territorial Legislature, then, in assembling this convention, were fully sustained by the act of Congress; and the authority of the convention is distinctly recognized in my instructions from the President of the United States."

The Governor, also, clearly and distinctly warns them what would be the consequences if they should not participate in the election. "The people of Kansas, then, (he says,) are invited by the highest authority known to the Constitution to participate freely and fairly in the election of delegates to frame a constitution and State government. The law has performed its entire appropriate function when it extends to the people the right of suffrage; but it cannot compel the performance of that duty. Throughout our whole Union, however, and wherever free government prevails, those who abstain from the exercise of the right of suffrage, authorize those who do vote to act for them in that contingency; and the absentees are as much bound, under the law and constitution, where there is no fraud or violence, by the act of the majority of those who do vote, as if all had participated in the election. Otherwise, as voting must be voluntary, self-government would be impracticable, and monarchy or despotism would remain as the only alternative."

It may, also, be observed, that at this period any hope, if such had existed, that the Topeka constitution would ever be recognized by Congress, must have been abandoned. Congress had adjourned on the 3d of March previous, having recognized the legal existence of the Territorial Legislature in a variety of forms, which I need not enumerate. Indeed, the Delegate elected to the House of Representatives, under a territorial law, had been admitted to his seat, and had just completed his term of service on the day previous to my inauguration.

This was the propitious moment for settling all difficulties in Kansas. This was the time for abandoning the revolutionary Topeka organization, and for the enemies of the existing government to conform to the laws, and to unite with its friends in framing a State constitution. But this they refused to do; and the consequences of their refusal to submit to lawful authority and vote at the election of delegates may yet prove to be of a most deplorable character. Would that the respect for the laws of the land which so eminently distinguished the men of the past generation could be revived! It is a disregard and violation of law which have for years kept the Territory of Kansas in a state of almost open rebellion against its government. It is the same spirit which has produced actual rebellion in Utah. Should a general spirit against its enforcement prevail, this will prove fatal to us as a nation. We acknowledge no master but the law; and should we cut loose from its restraints, and every one do what seemeth good in his own eyes, our case will indeed be hopeless.

The enemies of the territorial government determined still to resist the authority of Congress.

They refused to vote for delegates to the convention; not because, from circumstances which I need not detail, there was an omission to register the comparatively few voters who were inhabitants of certain counties of Kansas in the early spring of 1857; but because they had predetermined, at all hazards, to adhere to their revolutionary organization, and defeat the establishment of any other constitution than that which they had framed at Topeka. The election was, therefore, suffered to pass by default; but of this result the qualified electors, who refused to vote, can never justly complain.

From this review it is manifest that the Lecompton convention, according to every principle of constitutional law, was legally constituted, and was invested with power to frame a constitution.

The sacred principle of popular sovereignty has been invoked in favor of the enemies of law and order in Kansas. But in what manner is popular sovereignty to be exercised in this country, if not through the instrumentality of established law. In certain small republics of ancient times, the people did assemble in primary meetings, passed laws, and directed public affairs. In our country this is manifestly impossible. Popular sovereignty can be exercised here only through the ballot-box; and if the people will refuse to exercise it in this manner, as they have done in Kansas at the election of delegates, it is not for them to complain that their rights have been violated.

The Kansas convention, thus lawfully constituted, proceeded to frame a constitution; and having completed their work, finally adjourned on the 7th day of November last. They did not think proper to submit the whole of this constitution to a popular vote; but they did submit the question whether Kansas should be a free or a slave State to the people. This was the question which had convulsed the Union and shaken it to its very center. This was the question which had lighted up the flames of civil war in Kansas, and had produced dangerous sectional parties throughout the Confederacy. It was of a character so paramount in respect to the condition of Kansas, as to rivet the anxious attention of the people of the whole country upon it, and it alone. No person thought of any other question. For my own part, when I instructed Governor Walker in general terms in favor of submitting the constitution to the people, I had no object in view except the all-absorbing question of slavery. In what manner the people of Kansas might regulate their other concerns, was not a subject which attracted any attention. In fact, the general provisions of our recent State constitutions, after an experience of eighty years, are so similar and so excellent, that it would be difficult to go far wrong at the present day in framing a new constitution.

I then believed, and still believe, that under the organic act the Kansas convention were bound to submit this all-important question of slavery to the people. It was never, however, my opinion that, independently of this act, they would have been bound to submit any portion of the constitution to a popular vote in order to give it validity. Had I entertained such an opinion, this would have been in opposition to many precedents in our history, commencing in the very best age of the Republic. It would have been in opposition to the principle which pervades our institutions, and which is every day carried out into practice, that the people have the right to delegate to representatives, chosen by themselves, their sovereign power to frame constitutions, enact laws, and perform many other important acts, without requiring that these should be subjected to their subsequent approbation. It would be a most inconvenient limitation of their own power imposed by the people upon themselves, to exclude them from exercising their sovereignty in any lawful manner they think proper. It is true that the people of Kansas might, if they had pleased, have required the convention to submit the constitution to a popular vote; but this they have not done. The only remedy, therefore, in this case, is that which exists in all other similar cases. If the delegates who framed the Kansas constitution have in any manner violated the will of their constituents, the people always possess the power to change their constitution or their laws according to their own pleasure.

The question of slavery was submitted to an election of the people of Kansas, on the 21st December last, in obedience to the mandate of the constitution. Here again a fair opportunity was presented to the adherents of the Topeka constitution, if they were the majority, to decide this exciting question "in their own way," and thus restore peace to the distracted Territory; but they again refused to exercise their right of popular sovereignty, and again suffered the election to pass by default.

I heartily rejoice that a wiser and better spirit prevailed among a large majority of these people on the first Monday of January; and that they did, on that day, vote under the Lecompton constitution for a Governor and other State officers, a member of Congress, and for members of the Legislature. This election was warmly contested by the parties, and a larger vote was polled than at any previous election in the Territory. We may now reasonably hope that the revolutionary Topeka organization will be speedily and finally abandoned; and this will go far towards the final settlement of the unhappy differences in Kansas. If frauds have been committed at this election, either by one or both parties, the Legislature and the people of Kansas, under their constitution, will know how to redress themselves, and punish these detestable, but too common crimes, without any outside interference.

The people of Kansas have, then, "in their own way," and in strict accordance with the organic act, framed a constitution and State government; have submitted the all-important question of slavery to the people, and have elected a Governor, a member to represent them in Congress, members of the State Legislature, and other State officers. They now ask admission into the Union under this constitution, which is republican in its form. It is for Congress to decide whether they will admit or reject the State which has thus been created. For my own part, I am decidedly in favor of its admission, and thus terminating the Kansas question. This will carry out the great principle of non-intervention recognized and sanctioned by the organic act, which declares, in express language, in favor of "non-intervention by Congress with slavery in the States or Territories," leaving "the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States." In this manner, by localizing the question of slavery, and confining it to the people whom it immediately concerned, every patriot anxiously expected that this question would be banished from the Halls of Congress, where it has always exerted a baleful influence throughout the whole country.

It is proper that I should briefly refer to the election held, under an act of the Territorial Legislature, on the first Monday of January last, on the Lecompton constitution. This election was held after the Territory had been prepared for admission into the Union as a sovereign State, and when no authority existed in the Territorial Legislature which could possibly destroy its existence, or change its character. The election, which was peaceably conducted, under my instructions, involved a strange inconsistency. A large majority of the persons who voted against the Lecompton constitution were, at the very same time and place, recognizing its valid existence in the most solemn and authentic manner, by voting under its provisions. I have yet received no official information of the result of this election.

As a question of expediency, after the right has been maintained, it may be wise to reflect upon the benefits to Kansas and to the whole country which would result from its immediate admission into the Union, as well as the disasters which may follow its rejection. Domestic peace will be the happy consequence of its admission; and that fine Territory, which has hitherto been torn by dissensions, will rapidly increase in population and wealth, and speedily realize the blessings and the comforts which follow in the train of agricultural and mechanical industry. The people will then be sovereign, and can regulate their own affairs in their own way. If a majority of them desire to abolish domestic slavery within the State, there is no other possible mode by which this can be effected so speedily as by prompt admission. The will of the majority is supreme and irresistible when expressed in an orderly and lawful manner. They can make and unmake constitutions at pleasure.

It would be absurd to say that they can impose fetters upon their own power which they cannot afterwards remove. If they could do this they might tie their own hands for a hundred as well as for ten years. These are fundamental principles of American freedom, and are recognized, I believe, in some form or other by every State constitution; and if Congress, in the act of admission, should think proper to recognize them, I can perceive no objection to such a course. This has been done emphatically in the constitution of Kansas. It declares in the bill of rights that "all political power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority, and instituted for their benefit, and therefore they have at all times an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government in such manner as they may think proper." The great State of New York is at this moment governed under a constitution framed and established in direct opposition to the mode prescribed by the previous constitution. If, therefore, the provision changing the Kansas constitution after the year 1864, could by possibility be construed into a prohibition to make a change previous to that period, this prohibition would be wholly unavailing. The Legislature already elected may, at its very first session, submit the question to a vote of the people whether they will or will not have a convention to amend their constitution and adopt all necessary means for giving effect to the popular will.

It has been solemnly adjudged, by the highest judicial tribunal known to our laws, that slavery exists in Kansas by virtue of the Constitution of the United States. Kansas is therefore, at this moment, as much a slave State as Georgia or South Carolina. Without this, the equality of the sovereign States composing the Union would be violated, and the use and enjoyment of a Territory acquired by the common treasure of all the States, would be closed against the people and the property of nearly half the members of the Confederacy. Slavery can, therefore, never be prohibited in Kansas, except by means of a constitutional provision, and in no other manner can this be obtained so promptly, if a majority of the people desire it, as by admitting it into the Union under its present constitution.

On the other hand, should Congress reject the constitution, under the idea of affording the disaffected in Kansas a third opportunity of prohibiting slavery in the State, which they might have done twice before if in the majority, no man can foretell the consequences. If Congress, for the sake of these men who refused to vote for delegates to the convention, when they might have excluded slavery from the constitution, and who afterwards refused to vote on the 21st December last, when they might, as they claim, have stricken slavery from the constitution, should now reject the State, because slavery remains in the constitution, it is manifest that the agitation upon this dangerous subject will be renewed in a more alarming form than it has ever yet assumed.

Every patriot in the country had indulged the hope that the Kansas and Nebraska act would put a final end to the slavery agitation, at least in Congress, which had for more than twenty years convulsed the country and endangered the Union. This act involved great and fundamental principles, and, if fairly carried into effect, will settle the question. Should the agitation be again revived—should the people of the sister States be again estranged from each other with more than their former bitterness—this will arise from a cause, so far as the interests of Kansas are concerned, more trifling and insignificant than has ever stirred the elements of a great people into commotion. To the people of Kansas the only practical difference between admission or rejection depends simply upon the fact, whether they can themselves more speedily change the present constitution, if it does not accord with the will of the majority, or frame a second constitution to be submitted to Congress hereafter. Even if this were a question of mere expediency, and not of right, the small difference of time, one way or the other, is of not the least importance, when contrasted with the evils which must necessarily result to the whole country from a revival of the slavery agitation.

In considering this question, it should never be forgotten that—in proportion to its insignificance, let the decision be what it may, so far as it may affect the few thousand inhabitants of Kansas who have, from the beginning, resisted the constitution and the laws—for this very reason the rejection of the constitution will be so much the more keenly felt by the people of fourteen of the States of this Union where slavery is recognized under the Constitution of the United States.

Again, the speedy admission of Kansas into the Union would restore peace and quiet to the whole country. Already the affairs of this Territory have engrossed an undue proportion of public attention. They have sadly affected the friendly relations of the people of the States with each other, and alarmed the fears of patriots for the safety of the Union. Kansas once admitted into the Union, the excitement becomes localized, and will soon die away for want of outside aliment. Then every difficulty will be settled at the ballot-box.

Besides, and this is no trifling consideration, I shall then be enabled to withdraw the troops of the United States from Kansas, and employ them on branches of service where they are much needed. They have been kept there on the earnest importunity of Governor Walker, to maintain the existence of the territorial government, and secure the execution of the laws. He considered that at least two thousand regular troops, under the command of General Harney, were necessary for this purpose. Acting upon his reliable information, I have been obliged, in some degree, to interfere with the expedition to Utah, in order to keep down rebellion in Kansas. This has involved a very heavy expense to the Government. Kansas once admitted, it is believed there will no longer be any occasion there for troops of the United States.

I have thus performed my duty on this important question, under a deep sense of my responsibility to God and my country. My public life will terminate within a brief period; and I have no other object of earthly ambition than to leave my country in a peaceful and prosperous condition, and to live in the affections and respect of my countrymen. The dark and ominous clouds which now appear to be impending over the Union, I conscientiously believe may be dissipated with honor to every portion of it, by the admission of Kansas during the present session of Congress; whereas, if she should be rejected, I greatly fear these clouds will become darker and more ominous than any which have ever yet threatened the Constitution and the Union.

JAMES BUCHANAN.

WASHINGTON, February 2, 1858.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move that the message be referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed. As it is late, however, and I presume no member wishes to discuss the message to-day, I will, if no one wishes to speak, move that the House adjourn.

Several MEMBERS. Withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. HUGHES obtained the floor.

Mr. LETCHER. If the gentleman will yield me the floor, I will move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HUGHES. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I appeal to the gentleman from Indiana to allow me the floor for a moment to submit a motion which will be in order. The House will then have the two motions before them, and can choose between them.

Mr. HUGHES. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to state the nature of his motion.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I will send it up to the Chair. It is in the form of a resolution.

Mr. HUGHES. I do not yield the floor to the gentleman to submit a resolution, unless he will first inform me of its nature.

Mr. GROW. I appeal to the gentleman from Indiana, if he does not wish to discuss this matter now, to allow some other gentleman the floor.

Mr. HUGHES. I am ready to go on now, if the House does not wish to adjourn.

Mr. POTTER. I wish to inquire whether the gentleman from Indiana yielded the floor for the motion to adjourn?

Mr. HUGHES. I did yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire, if the House now adjourns, whether this matter does not come up in the morning?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I hope the House will not adjourn. There are gentlemen here who wish to speak to-night. I myself would like to submit some remarks upon the message before the House adjourns.

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman from Indiana having yielded the floor for the purpose, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MORGAN and others demanded the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and the House refused to adjourn—yeas 105, nays 109, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoek, Bowie, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Caskey, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilmer, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Hatch, Hawkins, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—109.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. HUGHES asked to be excused from voting.

The SPEAKER stated that under the rules all motions to be excused must be made before the House commenced dividing. The motion not having been made until after the call of the yeas and nays had been commenced, was therefore not in order.

Mr. HUGHES. Then I desire to say that I care very little about the matter myself, but as my friends are in favor of adjourning, I vote "ay."

The SPEAKER announced that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Hughes] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to give way for a moment, to allow me to submit a motion, and I will then renew the motion to adjourn. My only object is to have the motion entered, and allow it to come up in the morning.

Mr. HUGHES. If it will oblige the gentleman particularly to have his proposition side by side with that of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. Stephens,] and he will communicate it to me, I will make the motion myself; otherwise I decline to yield the floor.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. There is no question at all of the right of the gentleman from Indiana to the floor. It is a matter between him and the Speaker; but I take it for granted that he will be entitled to the floor in the morning. I desire to submit my proposition, and I will then move to adjourn. I have no disposition to interfere with the right of the gentleman to the floor.

Mr. HUGHES. I have interrogated the gentleman from Illinois in regard to his resolution, but have been unable to hear his reply. But I understand, from information, it is to refer this message to a select committee. I therefore submit the following motion, before I submit my remarks, in order that the two motions may be before the House at the same time:

Resolved, That the message of the President be referred to a select committee of thirteen, to report upon the propriety and expediency of the admission of Kansas as a State into the Union, with power to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Now, if the gentleman will allow me to make an amendment to that motion, it is all I desire. If the gentleman will give me the floor I will send it to the Chair; but I am not disposed to thrust it upon him.

Mr. HUGHES. Will the gentleman allow it to be read for information? I want to hear the proposition before I yield the floor unconditionally.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Well, as the gentleman declines to yield, I want him to go on with his speech. I hope, when the gentleman has done, I shall get the floor to move my amendment.

Mr. McQUEEN. Is it competent to interpose any objection in reference to this matter? If so, I want to say here that I never will consent to any further compromise in this House upon the subject of slavery, so far as I am concerned. We have had the last compromise that the South ought to have. ["Order!" "Order!"] Keep cool, gentlemen; you have had the last compromise upon the subject of slavery that, I trust, you will ever get from this House; and I want to say so to you as a southern member upon this floor.

Mr. ADRAIN. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] will be read.

The SPEAKER. He has not yet offered an amendment.

Mr. BOCOCK. A motion has been made since the last motion to adjourn. With the leave of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HUGHES,] I will renew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. GROW. No business has intervened.

The SPEAKER. An amendment has been moved and received.

Mr. GROW. I stand corrected.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the motion to adjourn?

Mr. HUGHES. I do.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays upon the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 102, nays 109; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoek, Bowie, Bryan, Burnett, Caskey, John B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—109.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. WINSLOW said: Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. BRANCH, although sick, came here this morning and voted upon the last call of the roll; but he became so much indisposed that he was compelled to return to his room. He has paired off with Mr. DAMRELL, of Massachusetts, who obliged him in the matter very kindly, and who, though present in the Hall, declines to vote.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I now ask the gentleman from Indiana to allow me to introduce my motion.

Mr. HUGHES. Will the gentleman allow it to be read for information? I can then judge whether I should yield the floor or not.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield the floor for a moment?

Mr. HUGHES. For what purpose?

Mr. BARKSDALE. That I may move a call of the House.

[Cries of "Go on!" "go on!"]

Mr. HUGHES. I decline to yield for any purpose.

I think I owe it to myself, before I proceed, to place myself right in regard to this question of adjournment, and in regard to the appeal made to me to yield the floor. As to the question of adjournment, it was a matter of indifference with me; but I did not desire to detain the House against their will.

As to the request that has been made that I should yield the floor for the purpose of permitting a proposition to be offered, I simply asked that, before I yielded the floor unconditionally, I should be informed what the nature of the proposition was. To that I received no answer. I thought I might have been misunderstood upon that subject, and took the trouble, when the roll was being called, to go to the seat of the gentleman from Illinois, but I found that my understanding was correct.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. If I understand the gentleman from Indiana correctly, he does not correctly state my own position.

Mr. HUGHES. I yield the floor to the gentleman to make a correction.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I understand him to say that he came to my seat, and that I desired him to yield the floor unconditionally. Did I hear right?

Mr. HUGHES. That the gentleman desired me to yield the floor before I knew what the proposition was.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. It was that he should yield the floor to allow my motion to be submitted. I did not tell the gentleman what it was. It was my own motion, not his. I do not desire his approbation of my motion.

Mr. HUGHES. Will the gentleman inform us what it is?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. That is my business.

Mr. HUGHES. The gentleman asks courtesy and declines to return it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I ask no courtesy.

Mr. HUGHES. And I ask none of you. I will not be unparliamentary.

Mr. GILMER. I think courtesy to the gentleman from Illinois—"Order!" "Order!"

Mr. HUGHES. There is no gentleman upon this floor that can take the place of the gentleman from Illinois in this matter. He appealed to me to yield the floor, and I inquired for what purpose? He declined to tell.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The gentleman misrepresents me. I did tell him what I wanted.

Mr. HUGHES. The House, I think, understands very well the issue between us.

I desire to modify the proposition which I submitted, by striking out these words—

"To report upon the propriety and expediency of the admission of Kansas as a State into the Union, with power to report by bill or otherwise;"

so that it will read:

"That the message of the President be referred to a select committee of thirteen."

It has been suggested that it might be inferred from my submitting this proposition for a select committee, that it was my purpose to avail myself of that parliamentary usage which would make me the chairman of that committee. I here disavow any such purpose. I submit the proposition merely that the two propositions shall be before the House at the same time. If that proposition be carried, I shall not consent to occupy a position at the head of that committee. I am upon one more committee now than I can attend to.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that the remarks I design to submit upon this message, and the motion to print and refer it, will occupy the full hour which will be allotted to me under the rule, but in order that I may not be embarrassed at all for want of time, I will ask the permission of the House to print, without reading, some preliminary remarks which I have reduced to writing, which have reference more particularly to the affairs of my own State.

[Cries of "Go on, we want to hear that!" "No," "No!"]

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I object to that.

Mr. HUGHES. Now, sir, I hope we shall have no more talk about courtesy. I will read those preliminary remarks. I did not desire to inflict upon the House a written speech after the numerous examples I have had before me for the last two weeks. But since I cannot be permitted to reach my constituents in any other mode, I shall adopt that course, though it may deprive me of some of that time which I would otherwise have devoted to the real merits of the subject before the House.

The speeches made here are addressed either to the House, or, as the phrase goes, "to the country." I will not promise that I shall say nothing directed especially to my constituents, or to that great public whose judgment is justly formidable, both to authors and speakers; but I do say that I shall speak to the country through the House, for what is most practical and best adapted to illustrate the measures under consideration here before the Representatives of the people, is best worthy the attention of the people themselves.

Mr. GROW. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman is not confining himself to the subject under consideration, and as the gentleman has been so anxious to have the debate strictly confined to the pending question before the House, I think he should be governed by that rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will endeavor to keep the gentleman within the rule.

Mr. HUGHES. Representing a portion of the people of a State in this Union, whose government has been almost subverted, and whose constitution has been trampled under foot, through frauds upon the ballot-box, perpetrated in 1856, by this same Republican party which professes so much purity and love of liberty, I claim to be second to none in zeal for the rights of the people and sacred regard for the freedom of elections.

Mr. GROW. I rise again, sir, to a question of order. Any frauds committed in the gentleman's district in Indiana, are not pertinent to this message; but any frauds that have been committed in Kansas would be pertinent; and, therefore, I hold such remarks are not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot undertake to say that the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana are not in order. The gentleman may have introduced those remarks for the purpose of illustration. The Chair cannot determine at this stage of the gentleman's remarks, whether they are in order or out of order.

Mr. GROW. I will withdraw my point of order, for perhaps the subject of frauds may be very pertinent to this message.

Mr. BOOCK. I hope the Chair will bear in mind how much of the gentleman's time is taken up by these interruptions.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to give way to me, that I may move that the House adjourn. I am perfectly satisfied that no good can come out of this proceeding.

Mr. GROESBECK. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will not meet with a single further interruption in the course of his speech. I hope he will be allowed to have his full hour, and that the Speaker will not deduct from it the time which has been taken up in these interruptions.

Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE. I second that suggestion.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I desire to move an adjournment, in order that the gentleman may have a fair opportunity of speaking. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays upon that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I appeal to the gentleman from Kentucky to withdraw his motion, and let us have the speech of the gentleman from Indiana this evening.

[Cries of "Order!" "Call the roll!"]

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. HUGHES. I recognize no liberty in this country but that which is obedient to law, and I repudiate and detest both that mischievous fanaticism which, in the name of freedom, incites to anarchy, and the turbulent revolutionary and corrupt practices which are its legitimate fruits. Of these, the State of Indiana has had enough within her own borders; and I think it likely her people will deem it wise to settle that account before they exercise any supervision over the affairs of Kansas. Sir, do you know that, at this moment, the State government of Indiana is being carried on without revenue or appropriation laws; that, for want of the necessary assessment laws, no taxes have been levied; that the munificent charities of the State were for a time defeated, and the helpless inmates of her institutions turned out upon the world; that, at the time appointed for the meeting of her Legislature, an organized mob took possession of her Senate Chamber, attempted to depose the presiding officer, and, inspired by the presence, within the bar, of General James H. Lane, commander-in-chief of the army of freedom, enacted such outrages as very shame forbid them even to mention on their journal? Do you know that they inducted into office three pretended Senators, who claimed their seats in virtue of frauds established since by the testimony of Republican witnesses, and unsurpassed in Kansas; and having thus obtained control of one branch of the State Legislature, made use of their usurped power for the subversion of the government? These things are true, sir, as set forth in the resolutions of the Democratic State convention of Indiana:

"9. Resolved, That we arraign the Black Republican party of Indiana before the people, for sustaining the members of that party in the last Legislature of this State in the commission of the following enormous outrages upon public and private rights:

"1. Creating a revolution in the first step towards the organization of the Senate, and violating the constitution and the law by attempting to supplant the legal presiding officer of that body with one of their own number.

"2. Refusing in open defiance of the constitution and in flagrant violation of their oaths to meet in joint convention and be present at the canvass of votes for Governor and Lieutenant Governor, when counted by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

"3. Meeting without a quorum and without a presiding officer, and expelling the Senator from Clarke county, thereby making a mockery of the constitution, breaking their oaths as Senators, and in all their councils calling to their aid the evil spirit of anarchy which has in every age involved nations in bloodshed and overthrow.

"4. Voting more than one hundred times, by a strict party vote, against appropriating money to defray the expenses of the benevolent institutions of the State, thereby closing the doors of charity, and sending the deaf, the dumb, the blind, and the insane abroad in the world, without that protection which humanity dictates, and which Indiana gives to them.

"5. Voting more than one hundred times, by a strict party vote, against a revenue bill and an assessment bill, thereby attempting to prostrate the State government; to bring her into dishonor at home and abroad, by failing to pay the interest on the State debt, as provided for and made obligatory by the constitution, and inflicting other and most grievous injustice upon her citizens.

"6. Refusing to join and assist in the election of Senators in Congress, thereby setting at naught the will of the majority of the voters of Indiana as expressed at the ballot-box, October 14, 1856.

"7. Attempting, as far as in their power lay, to legalize gross, palpable, and wicked frauds upon the elective franchise; recognizing and receiving from the counties of Rush, Fountain, and Marion, persons as Senators conclusively proven in legal investigations to have been elected by illegal, hired, and perjured voters; stifling the voice of inquiry into their pretended and usurped right to their seats as Senators, in the face of legally instituted contests in each instance. Thus alone enabling the party to which the said spurious and illegally elected Senators belonged, to inflict their spirit of misrule upon the State; and finally sending forth to the world a forgery upon the journals of the Senate by which to cover up their high handed villainy, and avert from themselves, if possible, the just indignation of all honest men."

Here are extracts from the majority report of the Committee on Elections on the election frauds in Rush county, Indiana:

"Mr. Speaker: The majority of the Committee on Elections, to whom was referred the matter of the contested election of Rush county, in which Samuel McBride is a contestant, and Leonidas Sexton contestee, would report to the House of Representatives that they have endeavored to institute a careful and thorough examination into the frauds alleged to have been committed in the petition submitted to them by the contestant. They have in their possession depositions taken in relation to the matter by both parties, copies of which are herewith submitted, together with the evidence given by the witnesses who have testified before the committee. Being clothed with the usual powers 'to send for persons and papers,' they proceeded to summon those persons whom they had reason to believe were cognizant of the facts bearing on the case. From the nature of the case, the witnesses were, of course, chiefly members of that party alleged to have committed the frauds.

"In the discharge of their duty the committee desired to hasten the examination of witnesses, with a view to be able to make an early report to the Legislature. The only material facts elicited will be found to be embraced in the testimony of the first witnesses summoned. The formation of a combination to carry the elections of Rush county by fraud, is by these witnesses clearly proved, and the existence of the organization established.

"By the evidence of Messrs. Ray, Spriggs, and Williams, examined early, certain prominent members of the Republican party being clearly implicated, a summons was issued for them, but no efforts were successful to bring them before the committee. The writ of subpoena was utterly disregarded, and even an attachment, duly issued by the Speaker of the House for contempt in failing to appear, had no better effect. One gentleman so much feared to make disclosures within his knowledge, that, when in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, he broke his parole of honor, and fled to Kentucky. Others left their homes, visiting other distant States. Your committee believe, and here confidently assert, that if the actors in these frauds could have been compelled to come forward and testify, a conspiracy of a character heretofore unknown for its extent and character, would have been laid bare. Enough has been developed by the evidence herewith submitted, to implicate men considered heretofore of the highest respectability, and prominent members of the Republican party of Wayne and the adjoining counties, in devising and carrying out plans calculated to pollute the ballot box, and render the election of members of the Legislature a matter to be controlled by money. Not the least important result of these investigations is the establishment of the fact, that this fraudulent arrangement extended far beyond Rush county. From the evidence, your committee have no doubt, that the same foul and corrupt means succeeded in several other counties, but particularly in the county of Marion. Although, in the investigations, questions were confined to fraud in the county of Rush, yet witnesses inadvertently disclosed these facts, and Mr. Williams particularly testifies, that in sending young men abroad, he sent them indiscriminately to Marion or Rush. The contemplation of the development made is painful, viewed either in relation to its extent, or the former character of those who have taken so active a part in its consummation.

"We find at least one member of the State Senate, judges, and other functionaries not only giving encouragement and countenance to the project, but taking the lead, and active among them was the brother of the contestee himself. Judge Perry clearly testifies, in his account of the meeting held in Richmond, early during the canvass, that these heartily approved the plan proposed, and other witnesses prove how well they carried it into faithful execution.

"The testimony shows that the avowed object was to procure young men without families, citizens and voters in those counties having (as was the case with Wayne and Henry) large Republican majorities, and induce them to migrate, a short time before the October election, into Rush county, to vote at that election, and having done so, their object in going thither was accomplished, and they might return as soon thereafter as they should choose to their place of residence.

"The evidence conclusively points to John C. Hudelson, clerk of Henry circuit court, as treasurer and principal contractor to furnish 'outside' voters for Rush county. It is in evidence that he deposited with Watkin Williams, of Wayne county, fifty dollars for that express purpose—that he sent by a son of Solomon Meredith, $350 to E. D. Sprigg, of Wayne county, for a like purpose. Mr. Hudelson left the State, and has been sojourning in some of the eastern cities up to the present time. This makes the handsome sum of $400 furnished to persons in two townships only, while it is clearly proved that the same arrangement extended to other townships in the same county.

"This was not, either, the county of Mr. Hudelson's residence; he lives in the county of Henry, which gives some fifteen hundred Republican majority. Many of the witnesses from both counties say that they had plenty of votes to spare, and if Mr. Hudelson was willing to invest that sum of money in two townships, what amount did he likely expend in the remaining townships of Wayne and Henry? His friend, neighbor, and co-laborer, Elijah Holland, was not only subpoenaed, but afterwards attached, and when brought to the city, ingloriously fled, when under his parole of honor to the Sergeant-at-Arms.

"A. F. Woodcock, the depot-master, and agent at Rushville for the reception and distribution of foreign Republican votes, has not only failed to obey the subpoena to appear before this committee, but it is in evidence that he likewise failed, in his own county, to appear before a justice of the peace, to testify in this same case. Mr. Hackleman swears that he asked him if he could be compelled to attend, and he gave his opinion that he could not.

"Mr. Joel Smith, the Republican candidate for treasurer in Rush county, was duly subpoenaed to appear before this committee. It appears, by the testimony of Mr. Hackleman, that Mr. Smith was in his office, at Rushville, on Tuesday of last week, and that he had a conversation with him on the subject of the power of this committee to attach, and he gave him a like opinion. Mr. Smith has, to this time, failed to appear. Mr. Smith was regarded as a most important witness in this case. So the committee might go on and enumerate many other persons acting with the same disregard to the summons issued by this committee. It is unnecessary to say that this conduct is alike disrespectful to this committee and the House, under whose authority they have acted. It taints the case and the actors in it with suspicion, and gives the whole an odor of fraud, which deserves the unqualified condemnation and rebuke of the House of Representatives."

Evidence of E. D. Sprigg.

"E. D. Sprigg, being duly sworn on oath, says: I live in Cambridge City, Wayne county, Indiana. It was about the last of September or the first of October that I was informed that there would be some young men left with me for the purpose of being paid out to young men who would go to Rush county to vote at the State election. This information was given me (I think) by Solomon Meredith and Dr. Lemuel Johnson. In a short time $350 was handed to me by Mr. Samuel Meredith, a son of Solomon Meredith, who resides with his father in Knightstown, and was directed to hand it to me. He said Mr. John C. Hudelson gave it to him, that he did not know the amount or for what purpose it was sent. I afterwards saw Mr. Hudelson, who is clerk of Henry county, who called on me and said he wanted part of the money. I paid him then $150. In the conversation alluded to with Messrs. Meredith and Johnson, they told me that the Democrats were engaged in importing votes into Rush county, and that we had to meet it on the same ground.

"A number of young men came to me and reported that they were going to take up their residence in Rush county. To each one who thus called on me I paid $5. I paid this sum to as many as nineteen young men, and expected them to go into Rush county to vote. I remember the names of Brothers, Widdeman, Levi Williams, Justice, and Marion Tyner. The balance were all strangers to me. I did not see any of them in Rush, nor do I know that any of them went there. They had all resided in Wayne county previous to the time I gave them the money. I have talked with many persons in relation to the political campaign in Indiana and Rush county, but I do not think I ever spoke to a Rush county man about it until yesterday. I have talked several times with Sol. Meredith in relation to this matter: he always said there was an effort making to run Irish voters into Rush, and in order to counteract that, we had better run some young men there to gain a residence and become voters. If this arrangement extended over the country, I am not posted about it. On the day of the Republican meeting at Cambridge, there were three or four young men came to me, introduced by a gentleman from the northern part of the county. The blank cards alluded to were given to me by Abner D. Bond; they had on them (I think) the name of Woodcock, who, I was told, lived in Rushville. I drew the inference that the cards were to be given to the young men who would give them to Woodcock. I used nineteen of them and destroyed the balance. The general arrangement and understanding among us all was, that Woodcock would find them employment. Lewis Burke and I did not operate together at all. I do not know that I ever heard him talk on the subject. At Richmond, I had a conversation on politics, in which Meredith, Dornier, Hudelson and two or three strangers were present. Burke may have been with them. We were together not more than ten or fifteen minutes; it was not a regular meeting; we talked of the campaign generally; the election and the prospects. Neither Dr. Sexton nor Mr. Varyan were present.

"As regards the money, Mr. Hudelson once asked me if I had received such a package, but he never told me that he had sent it to me by Mr. Meredith. The balance I expressed to Mr. Hudelson since the election. I am a Republican decidedly. Those young men to whom I gave money—with whom I was acquainted—were Republicans; nor would I have sent any young man if I had believed he was a Democrat. I usually told these young men what to do with their cards; if they could get work to do so, and take up their residence there, and it was my opinion that in doing so they became legal voters of Rush county. I always asked these young men as few questions as possible. I gave out these cards from three weeks up to four or five days before the State election.

"I have seen four of these young men since the election. Widdeman lives in Cambridge. Brothers told me he was going to settle in Rush, but in a week or so he returned to Wayne. I did not see Williams for two or three weeks after the election. I am secretary of the Republican club of Cambridge city. Mr. Meredith is president. At one time I paid A. W. Ray twenty dollars, which he afterwards returned to me. I cannot tell how many times Mr. Ray went out on this business, but I paid buggy hire for two trips. I had no connection with any arrangements save my own, but I had the impression that persons were going to vote from other townships in Wayne county; also from Henry. I was of the opinion that young men, going under the circumstances and advice I gave them, into another county, became thereby legal voters in that county.

"Cross-examined.—Except the five young men alluded to, I do not know where they resided, or what were their political opinions, and I think I have not seen any of them since. ELY D. SPRIGG."

Thus it appears that while the howling of these pretended apostles of liberty diverted the attention of the people of Indiana to the distant plains of Kansas, straining their vision to detect afar off the alleged enormities of the border ruffians of Missouri, these smooth hypocrites were taking care of popular sovereignty at home by practicing similar frauds upon our own soil.

And when the Democratic party of Indiana, struggling to maintain the spirit as well as the letter of the Federal Constitution, and to give to the will of the people of Indiana its true representation in the Senate of the United States, chose two Senators in Congress, the apostles of freedom planted themselves upon the frauds and the usurpation which would subvert the sovereignty of Indiana, and destroy the freedom of elections among her people, and denied the right of those Senators to their seats.

These transactions, Mr. Speaker, are fresh, and will be kept fresh, in the memory of the people of Indiana, who burn with honest zeal to redress their own wrongs and punish their oppressors; and whatever differences of opinion may exist or be fomented among them concerning the affairs of a distant Territory, no Kansas clamor will a second time draw off their attention and afford a cover under which the authors of these outrages may escape their just indignation.

The Democratic party of Indiana, the only organization which can restore the supremacy of the constitution and laws of that State, will remain united and triumph over those who have violated the sanctity of the ballot-box and trampled under foot the sovereignty of the people, whatever may be the decision of the Kansas question. But it is by no means my purpose to evade that question.

I have before me that famous statute, called "the Nebraska bill." What is its true construction, particularly in reference to the manner of expressing the assent of the people of that Territory to their constitution?

Must that constitution be submitted to the people, or may it be the work of delegates alone?

What is the true intent and meaning of the act, and how has it been represented to the people? for if their verdict in its favor was given in 1856, in view of a construction then placed upon it by its friends, no different legal construction ought now to prevail—except, indeed, those high, authoritative expositions proceeding from the Supreme Court of the United States, which all good citizens are bound to respect and to obey.

The President has placed his construction upon that act. He tells us in his message, that while the submission of the whole constitution to a vote of the people was admitted, it was not required, but that the question of slavery alone was required to be submitted; that he preferred a submission of the whole instrument, and in good faith endeavored, by his instructions to Governor Walker and all his official acts, to bring about that result, but that the people of Kansas, acting through their delegates, to whose hands they had committed the whole subject, chose a different way, and submitted the slavery question alone—as, according to his judgment, but not his wish, they had the right to do; that he is ready to surrender his will to theirs, legally expressed, and acquiesce in their work, but hopes in future cases, as he had hoped in this case, a submission of the whole constitution may be had, and for that purpose recommends that the Minnesota law be copied into, future enabling acts.

A great statesman, second in intellect to none, unequaled in the art of clothing his ideas with the appearance of logical compactness and popular justice—a dangerous talent, if unfairly used—master of all the details of this Kansas business, and author of the Nebraska bill itself, has also placed his construction of this act before the public. He holds that the submission of the entire constitution to a vote of the people is the only mode consistent with that "popular sovereignty," which is the vital principle of the act; that all others are excluded; and that a constitution not ratified in that manner ought to be rejected. It will be observed that the President does not oppose a submission to the people; on the contrary, he gives it his preference; he only concedes the right of the people to take their own way, and will not refuse them admission because they have not adopted his. The Senator says to the people of the Territory: "You must vote on your constitution; it is vain to tell me that, following in the footsteps of many States of this Union, you choose to make a constitution through delegates; that is not popular sovereignty; I am the author of the Nebraska bill, and this is popular sovereignty."

Here is an issue—an issue between the President, on the one part, and the eminent Senator on the other; and the controversy involves, to its fullest extent, the great question decided by the people in the election of 1856, "the right of the people to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way." It is a momentous issue, not only on account of the great question involved, but of the respective positions of the parties, their past relations to each other and to that country whose fast-healing wounds seem about to bleed again—that country so long distracted, and so much in want of repose.

The position, associations, and past services of the author of the Nebraska bill, gave him the right to remonstrate against any departure from its principles, if there was any; nay, it was his duty, above all other men, to vindicate it, if invaded, for he had been its champion at all times and in every place.

With all his intellect he will never be deemed to have blundered concerning the application of principles so familiar to his mind; and if, indeed, it should appear that he has abandoned the true and vital principle of his bill in its most trying hour—that he has deserted the substance for a most delusive shadow, and displayed a counterfeit presentment of popular sovereignty to that confiding people, whom none but he could have deceived—great will be his responsibility, and unenviable the place which history will assign him. Time will determine this, not the first wild clamor of misjudging friends, nor the first indignant grievings of friends that were.

There are doubtless those in this House, and out of it, to whom, at first view, the doctrines of that distinguished Senator, on this question, have appeared conclusive, who have ever been faithful to the principles of the Nebraska bill. With such I would reason, and to their reasonings I would lend an attentive ear; they have the right to resist all encroachment, if there is any, on the principle of self-government, for they are its friends.

But what shall I say of the new converts to the doctrine of popular sovereignty; the new champions of the faith; the new advocates for the Nebraska bill—they who have hitherto been its enemies; who have reviled it and its author, and invoked the curses of Heaven upon both! They also have placed their construction upon this statute; they think the great doctrine of popular sovereignty is clearly violated, and that the constitution of Kansas ought clearly to have been submitted to a vote of the people. The result for which they have worked night and day, in the Territory and out of the Territory, has come to pass. Kansas is here knocking at our doors, with a slave constitution, because having, as they say, a majority in the Territory; organized rebels have refused to vote! Men who could expend thousands, and travel many a weary mile to fill Kansas with rifles, and stir up civil war, could not walk across the street to vote! Here let me, in passing, allude to one matter—the pretense that several counties were disfranchised and could not vote. The fact is emphatically denied. "But, if it were so; how did those who were allowed an opportunity? Did any considerable number of them vote? Alas for the new revelation of popular sovereignty, and the new prophets of the faith! Heaven defend the Nebraska bill from its new friends, and its author from their alliance!

And now, in moving forward to a solution of the question we have before us concerning the true construction of the Nebraska bill, let us note this landmark. I point out this great fact which meets us at the beginning—I point it out to those who hesitate, to the members of this House, and to that generous constituency to whom I am responsible for my vote in this body—I mean that the great "army of freedom," composed of renegade Democrats, Abolitionists, Maine-law fanatics, Free-Soilers, political preachers, and strong-minded women, is marching under its flag of sixteen stars in solid column, after this new revelation of popular sovereignty! I must decline to follow that flag, and to march in that army, even though false prophets shall arise, who, if it were possible, would deceive the very elect.

I shall now proceed to give my construction of the Nebraska bill, which will fully justify the vote I expect to give upon the Leocompton constitution. No one is responsible but myself. I hold myself responsible to my constituents. In doing so, I shall have occasion to refer to the recorded speeches and reports of the author of that bill; because they are directly in the line of my argument. I disclaim any purpose to fasten inconsistency upon that distinguished man—the inconsistency of individuals is a matter of no importance to the country; but I shall quote from him as authority upon this question—authority that will be received. Incidentally, I shall show that he is inconsistent; but it is impossible to discuss this question without doing so.

It will also be proper to quote from him because it will show that the President, though out of the country, might have drawn his impressions of the "true intent and meaning of the Nebraska bill" from a very high source—no less a source than the author of the measure himself; and that if there is any desertion of principle it is not with those who are now following the doctrines of the Senator to their logical results.

Section fourteen of the Nebraska bill contains the celebrated clause repealing the Missouri compromise and instituting squatter sovereignty, which I have often defended, and which I stood manfully by until it was disposed of by a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Then, and not till then, did I surrender it. That decision has been indorsed by the party with which I act in my State, by the unanimous vote of the State convention. There is another section of the bill which relates to the legislative power of the Territory. It says that that power shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation. Sir, I would not now, after that act has received a construction before the people, and after their verdict has been rendered in favor of it at the polls, set up any new legal construction contrary to the construction placed upon it in 1856. But it is a matter of law, and a matter of history, in my humble judgment, that those two sections referred to the question of slavery while the Territory remained in a territorial condition.

Sir, it has been said repeatedly in this House that the great question made before the people in 1856 was how the people of Kansas should ratify their constitution. What I say, sir, will go on the record, and I hope it will reach the eyes of my constituents: I deny that proposition, and challenge the proof. I say that the first section of this bill disposes of the whole subject of State constitutions in that short clause which says that these Territories shall come into the Union with or without slavery, as their constitution may prescribe, without saying one word as to the manner in which that constitution is to be made or ratified. All this is very plain. What, then, is the matter in controversy? Had any man ever questioned the right of the people, in forming a constitution, to decide the question of slavery for themselves? And especially can it be questioned with reference to the people of these Territories which came into this country under a solemn treaty, which is, as the Constitution of the United States says, the supreme law of the land? That treaty actually provided that the people should be protected in their rights of property, religion, &c.; and one of the most distinguished statesmen that this country has ever produced (John Quincy Adams) has said emphatically, that the people of these Territories had an absolute right to come into the Union as slave States; because it is so nominated in the bond—because of the treaty under which they were acquired. I say that the object of the Nebraska bill, so far as the formation of a constitution was concerned, or as to the mode in which it was to be ratified, was simply to place the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska on precisely the same ground as the States already in the Union occupied.

It was not the intention of this bill to place it on any higher or any lower ground. It is not necessary, sir, that I should consume the time of the House by attempting to show that it is the principle in theory and in practice, in this country, that the people may form a constitution, and that it may be ratified either by the delegates to the convention, or by the vote of the people. Do gentlemen mean to say that it was understood at the time the Nebraska bill was introduced and passed, that the people of Kansas should not have the right to make a constitution without submitting it to the people? There was no such idea broached, and I think I shall show conclusively that no such idea was ever entertained. I desire to call the attention of the House to some documents on this subject.

I hold in my hand, sir, the original Nebraska bill, as introduced in the Senate by Mr. Dodge, of Iowa, and the substitute reported in lieu of it by Mr. Douglas of Illinois; and when we turn to the original draft of this section in that substitute, which was to refer the question of slavery to the people, it is very explicit on that subject. It shows distinctly three things—that, according to the President's doctrine, it was the slavery question that was the trouble; that the intent was to confer power on the Territory, not on the State, and that that was to be a representative power. The construction contended for now, with reference to this law, would resolve every Territory of this Confederacy into an Athenian Democracy where all the people should collect themselves together in one vast plain and enact their laws. That would destroy the idea of a representative Republic, which was the thing in controversy in our revolutionary struggle. It will do very well to tickle the ears of the people by talking about popular sovereignty. But carry out the construction contended for here, and the Constitutions, State and Federal, vanish in thin air; for nothing could then be done in this country unless the people were to assemble and vote upon it in mass.

Most emphatically will the people of Indiana repudiate this doctrine. They have precedents in their own State which cover every phase of this question. They have had two constitutions there. The first was made by their representatives, and ratified by them alone. The second was submitted to the people. They have knowledge within themselves of the power to make constitutions in their own way; and the man who says that the Congress of the United States intended to deny to Kansas or Nebraska the power to make their constitutions in the manner in which any old State made hers, is in error, and I take issue with him on that statement, and refer the question to the country to determine.

Here is the clause which I desire to read:

"All the questions appertaining to slavery in the Territory, and in the new States to be formed therefrom, are to be left to the decision of the people residing therein through their appropriate representatives."

The distinguished statesman who prepared this bill was evidently under the impression that the question of slavery could be decided by the representatives of the people. But here we are told to-day that it could not be, that sovereignty is inalienable, that the right to make a constitution could not be delegated; that, in short, this is not a representative Republic, but a great Democracy after the model of Athens.

But, there is a further proof on this question. I hold in my hand Senate bill No. 172, introduced by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Douglas] for the purpose of framing an enabling act to authorize the people of Kansas to form a State constitution, and come into the Union; and in that act, as originally introduced, is the following clause:

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the following propositions be, and the same are hereby, offered to the said convention of the people of Kansas, when formed, for their free acceptance or rejection, which, if accepted by the convention and ratified by the people at the election for the adoption of the constitution, shall be obligatory on the United States, and upon the said State of Kansas, to wit:" [Here follow certain propositions.]

Now that bill, as introduced by the Senator from Illinois, expressly recognizes that this constitution was to be ratified by a vote of the people. But the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Toombs] offered an amendment, and that amendment was accepted, not only by the distinguished author of the Nebraska bill, but by the whole Democratic party in the Senate, and received the votes of the Democratic Senators, including two members of the Cabinet, who then had seats in the Senate of the United States.

And what was the feature of this Toombs bill? Why, lo and behold! this vital principle of popular sovereignty, this doctrine that stares us in the face, was struck out without a sigh, without a tear, and was consigned to the tomb of the Capulets.

Here is a provision of the bill as modified after the introduction of an amendment by the Senator from Georgia:

"That the following propositions be, and the same are hereby, offered to the convention of the people of Kansas"—

Leaving out all that part that requires the people to ratify the constitution at the ballot-box—

"for their free acceptance or rejection, which, if accepted by the convention, shall be obligatory on the United States and upon the said State of Kansas, to wit:" [Here follow certain propositions.]

Well, sir, the bill as modified received the votes of the entire Democratic party. They recognized the power of making a constitution, and of bringing a State into the Union, without the necessity of submitting that constitution to the direct vote of the people. Yes, sir, and they adopted that provision in preference to the other proposition which required its submission to the people. Yet now we are told that nothing can have life, nothing can be valid unless it has been first submitted to a direct vote of the people at the ballot-box.

And what further would you have on the subject? After that first section had been set aside and the other adopted in its place, after they had abandoned the idea of requiring the constitution to be submitted to the people, that same distinguished Senator submitted a report to the Senate of the United States upon the "Toombs bill;" and let us see whether he was in favor of the constitution being submitted to the people at the polls, or whether he considered such submission as necessary. I read from his report on the "Toombs bill," on the 30th of June, 1856:

"The question now arises, whether a constitution made by a political party without the authority of law, and under circumstances which afford no safeguards against fraud, and no guarantees of fairness, and raises no presumptions that it embodies the wishes and sentiments of a majority of the inhabitants, shall be forced, by an act of Congress, upon a whole people as their fundamental law, unalterable for nine years.

"In the opinion of your committee, whenever a constitution shall be formed in any Territory, preparatory to its admission into the Union as a State, justice, the genius of our institutions, the whole theory of our republican system, imperatively demand that the voice of the people shall be fairly expressed, and their will embodied in that fundamental law, without fraud or violence or intimidation, or any other improper or unlawful influence, and subject to no other restrictions than those imposed by the Constitution of the United States.

"It is true that each party claimed, at the time the Topeka constitution was formed, and now claims, to have a large majority of the legal voters in Kansas, in opposition to the pretensions of the opposite party. Each party has always professed a willingness to test and decide this disputed point in respect to the majority, at the ballot-box, whenever the elective franchise can be exercised in security, and protected against illegal voting, fraud, and violence, and a fair expression of the popular voice thus obtained. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. Toombs,] as a substitute for the original bill of the committee, has been prepared expressly with reference to attaining this desirable result."

That was popular sovereignty, then. He was satisfied, then, for the constitution to be submitted to Congress without the vote of the people upon it. He was willing that the convention should do the whole work. He goes on to say:

"The delegates are to assemble in convention at the seat of government of the Territory on the 1st day of December, and then to decide, first, whether it be expedient or not for Kansas to come into the Union at that time; and if deemed expedient, to proceed to form a constitution and State government, which shall be republican in form, preparatory to admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever."

And again, he says:

"The revised proposition of the Senator from Georgia refers all matters in dispute to the decision of the present population, with guarantees of fairness and safeguards against frauds and violence, to which no reasonable man can find ground of exception, while the Senator from New York, if his proposition is designed to recognize and impart vitality to the Topeka constitution, proposes to disfranchise, not only all the emigrants who have arrived in the Territory this year, but all the law-abiding men who refused to join in an act of open rebellion against the constituted authorities of the Territory last year, by making the unauthorized and unlawful action of a political party the fundamental law of the whole people."

Is it not a fair inference, looking at what I conceive to be the meaning of the author of the bill, and following in his footsteps—looking at the past history of the country—that the people of Kansas have the right to ratify their constitution through their delegates in convention, as well as in any other way? Mark, you, I am not opposing a submission to the people. I prefer that mode because, in the progress of our history as a nation, it has become more in vogue, and seems to be the more favorite mode with the people. The President of the United States, neither in his annual message nor in any other message, opposes this course. On the contrary, he frankly declares that it has his preference. He so declares in his instructions to Governor Walker; and every official act of his Administration relating to the subject, carries out the same idea. And I point to those facts to show that, instead of trampling upon the rights of the people of Kansas, he has endeavored, in good faith, to carry out the plan of a submission to the people.

But, sir, the Kansas-Nebraska bill says, the principles of right and justice say, the whole practice and theory of our Government say, that the people of Kansas have the right to prescribe the manner in which their own constitution shall be ratified; and if that manner does not happen to be the way the President had marked out, it is the duty of the President, as he has done, to concede to them the right of acting in their own way.

But, sir, the distinguished author of the Kansas-Nebraska bill says to the people of Kansas: "You must vote on this constitution. That is the vital principle of the Nebraska bill. I am the author of that bill, and this is popular sovereignty."

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman from Indiana will give way, I will move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HUGHES. I will yield for that purpose.
Mr. MAYNARD. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. ENGLISH. I demand the yeas and nays upon the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will withdraw his motion.

Mr. MAYNARD. Since the yeas and nays have been ordered, I withdraw it.

Mr. HUGHES. I regret that the hour rule, which was established here in 1840, precludes all discussion, where it is necessary to refer to authorities. It takes too long. But, sir, I must be permitted to say that most of the remaining propositions to which I designed to call the attention of the House, are fully covered, and much more ably presented than could possibly be done by me, in the message of the President, which has just been read in the hearing of the House.

In reference to the law under which the convention which framed the Lecompton constitution was called, I have a few remarks to make. The law is almost a transcript of the "Toombs bill," fair in all its provisions. It is almost a transcript of that great measure of pacification upon which the author of the Kansas bill and the entire Democratic party of the country stand committed. Sir, for the execution of that law the faith of the Government is pledged, and no man doubts that the people of Kansas would have carried it out in perfect peace and safety, if they had all participated in the election of the convention which made their constitution. But, sir, they did not do so; and why? A registry was to be made, and these people, acting in pursuance of a plan of organization which commenced far back in the canvass of 1856, refused even to allow themselves to be registered.

But nineteen counties, it is said, were disfranchised. Yes, sir, and the question of fact has been raised upon this floor in regard to the matter. If gentlemen who are so industrious in searching the official records, to cut out a sentence here and there, used by Governor Walker, had consulted the public documents upon the subject, they would have found an answer to that matter.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. The gentleman refers to certain facts in regard to the disfranchisement of counties. I am now here prepared, from a copy of the territorial laws, to show that the statement to which he refers is full of errors, and that but one of the allegations contained in that statement is true. I have the book now with me; and if the gentleman will permit me, in two minutes I will point out to him twelve errors contained in eleven lines.

Mr. HUGHES. I will do it upon one condition. Will the gentleman from Ohio answer me a question? The Supreme Court of the United States having decided, as he understands, and as the country understands, as you and I, Mr. Speaker, understand, that the Constitution carries slavery into the Territories, is the gentleman, in good faith, willing to abide by that decision and carry it out?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I will not answer any question which is not pertinent to this question; but as the gentleman refers to circumstances involving a question of veracity, I am prepared to show, by a document which the gentleman acknowledges as the law of Kansas, that the statement upon which he relies, and upon which gentlemen upon the other side have impugned the integrity and veracity of Governor Walker, is untrue.

Mr. HUGHES. The gentleman stands in the most favorable position—the position of a lawyer, who makes a statement which he knows cannot be admitted in evidence, for the purpose of having an effect upon the minds of the jury. Having had the benefit of his offer, I leave him there. I can excuse him from answering my question, because he has already answered it. I find in the Appendix of the Congressional Globe, third session, Thirty-Fourth Congress, page 108, the following:

"Mr. ENGLISH. I ask the gentleman further, if the Supreme Court of the United States should decide that the Constitution does carry slavery into the Territories, will he acquiesce in that decision?"

"Mr. SHERMAN. I answer, yes."

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I will respond if the gentleman desires, but I will not interfere unless the gentleman consents.

Mr. HUGHES. That gentleman declined to yield me the floor the other day to put a question. I yield to gentlemen who yield to me, and I may say that there has been no over-courtesy extended to me in this House, up to this time.

I say that Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton have said in their official statements that the population of those nineteen counties was very sparse, and that the execution of the registry law was prevented, to a great extent, by the local agents and the people. But, nevertheless, the population was sparse. If the gentleman's proposed correction was upon the point that those counties were attached to other counties, I admit that they were attached for legislative purposes, and not for convention purposes. Sir, nine thousand voters were registered, but only two thousand voted. Where were the other seven thousand? Were they disfranchised? They were doing precisely what their compeers did on the day of the election on the 21st of December—they were carrying out that unlawful conspiracy by which they bound themselves by an awful oath, under military organization, to resist the laws and the Constitution of the United States, and to set up, in defiance of them, a government of their own.

Gentlemen talk about troubles in Kansas. I could, if time allowed, go back and trace the whole of this Sharpe's rifle matter from beginning to end, and show that to this day they are enrolled in brigades and companies, with their officers, colonels and generals, and required to be dealt with accordingly. I say that no man ought to be treated with by the Government, while he retains the attitude of rebellion, and I say that the President of the United States has, in his message, struck the key-note of this whole matter, and it will find an enthusiastic response in the hearts of the people. It is rebellion, rebellion alone that has caused all these difficulties.

Talk about freedom and free constitutions! You say you are opposed to the extension of slavery. If we could agree upon the meaning of the terms, I could possibly agree with gentlemen. What is slavery, and what is freedom? It has been said that "he is a freeman whom the truth makes free, and all beside are slaves." Now, there is the slavery of the bondman, and of the black man, but that is nothing to the slavery of the soul, which bows in absolute subjection man's nobler powers; and I say of the blackest negro beneath a southern sun, that, though his body may be enslaved, his mind may be free; and that, while he toils under the lash of the overseer, if endowed with capacity, his mind may converse with the sublimest truths of science and philosophy.

I say that an individual who is bound by such an oath as that to which I have referred, is bound by that which destroys the individual, and subjects him to a slavery that conquers the soul. I would say to those men who howl about African slavery, before you go to the South to strike off the fetters of the slave, uncoil from around your own hearts the cankering chains which your own folly and fanaticism have riveted there.

You talk about devotion to freedom. I say you may show your devotion to freedom much better by maintaining free institutions already established, than by clamoring about those yet unborn. I could review the history of the recent canvass of a party which filled the country with appeals against their own government, a party that maintained that because a small State had two Senators, and a large State had only two, therefore the Constitution of the United States was wrong; a party that made war upon the free Constitution which spreads its ample folds over thirty millions of white people, and bestowed all its affections upon a miserable instrument of rebellion designed, as they pretended, to protect the people of a single Territory.

I was going on to show the position which those people occupied. Governor Walker, in his official report, says:

"The difficulties in this Territory are not yet adjusted, and, without the submission of the constitution to the people, a peaceful settlement is entirely impracticable. There is still a considerable party in Kansas who will resist the adoption of the constitution, however framed, upon the ground so long occupied by them, that the Territorial Legislature which called this convention was elected by voters of another State, (as they allege,) and not by the people of Kansas."

That was the ground they occupied before the convention met and before the delegates to it were elected. These men were pledged then not to recognize anything the convention might do, and to refuse to adopt the constitution it might frame, on the ground that they would not recognize the territorial government of Kansas. Well, sir, they were warned by Governor Walker upon that subject, and I commend these sentences of his to the attention of gentlemen with whom he has become a great and shining light:

"The people of Kansas, then, are invited by the highest authority known to the Constitution, to participate freely and fairly in the election of delegates to frame a constitution and State government. The law has performed its entire appropriate function when it extends to the people the right of suffrage; but it cannot compel the performance of that duty. Throughout our whole Union, however, and wherever free government prevails, those who abstain from the exercise of the right of suffrage authorize those who do vote to act for them in that contingency, and the absentees are as much bound, under the law and Constitution, where there is no fraud or violence, by the act of the majority of those who do vote, as if all had participated in the election. Otherwise, as voting must be voluntary, self-government would be impracticable, and monarchy or despotism would remain as the only alternative.

You should not console yourselves, my fellow-citizens, with the reflection that you may, by a subsequent vote, defeat the ratification of the constitution."

That was the flattering unctious they were laying to their souls. Why? Because they wanted this very contingency to arise, that Kansas should be knocking at the door of Congress with a slave constitution, so that they might have food for agitation. But Mr. Walker goes on:

"Although most anxious to secure to you the exercise of that great constitutional right, and believing that the convention is the servant, and not the master of the people, yet I have no power to dictate the proceedings of that body."

Ah! but they say they were assured that the constitution should be submitted to the people. I tell you, sir, Mr. Walker said it was his opinion that it would be; and he said, too, that if it was not so submitted, it ought to be rejected by Congress; but he told these men that the convention had the absolute authority to submit the constitution to the people, which implies the authority to withhold it, and he warned them not to rely on the privilege of a subsequent vote. He told them that he could not, and that the President could not, dictate the proceedings of the convention. And now they come here, and say that they had no chance to vote. Where were they when the delegates to that convention were elected? They say they had no chance to vote in the election of the 21st of December because the full constitution was not submitted. Why, sir, they had a chance to make the constitution; to construct it from the preamble to the end; but they had fully, deliberately, and defiantly committed themselves against it, and declined to have anything whatever to do with the proceeding. And now they come here claiming to be the people of Kansas. But we had an illustration yesterday of what these men are driving at. They want the Topeka constitution. They have sent resolutions here recommending the Topeka constitution; and what do they ask? Do they propose that that constitution shall be submitted to the people? By no means; not at all.

I omitted, in my argument, some minutes ago, to show that Mr. SEWARD, of New York, offered an amendment to the Toombs bill, which proposed that Kansas should come into the Union after certain propositions had been accepted by the Legislature. That amendment, I believe, received the vote of the whole-Republican party in the Senate. It is as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That the following propositions be, and the same are hereby, offered to the State of Kansas for the free acceptance or rejection by the Legislature of said State, which, if accepted by the same, shall be obligatory on the United States and upon the State of Kansas, to wit:

"From this it appears that the Republican party recognize the power of a Legislature to make terms for admission into the Union. This is going beyond even a convention, and falls far short of a vote of the people. Here is one of the resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas, presented here yesterday, which no more requires a vote of the people on their constitution than the Cincinnati platform:

"Resolved, That the people of Kansas Territory claim the right, through a legal and fair expression of the will of a majority of her citizens, to form and adopt a constitution for themselves."

[Here the hammer fell.]

[APPENDIX.]

I here append the general orders of Lane's Kansas volunteers:

GENERAL ORDER NO. 1.

HEADQUARTERS KANSAS VOLUNTEERS,
(For the protection of the ballot-box.)

LAWRENCE, July 18, 1857.

TO THE PEOPLE OF KANSAS: The convention at Topeka, on the 15th instant, passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That General James H. Lane be appointed by this convention, and authorized to organize the people in the several districts to protect the ballot-boxes at the approaching elections in Kansas."

Now, therefore, in pursuance of the authority thus vested in me, I do earnestly request the people of Kansas to form companies in their various neighborhoods, towns, and settlements, and every man enroll himself in some one of the same; that when each company shall contain not less than thirty, nor more than eighty men, it elect a captain, one first and one second lieutenant, two sergeants, and two corporals; and that it make a perfect and complete roll of all its officers and men in accordance with the printed form which will be transmitted from this office.

It is also desirable, and I hereby request that the captain of each company shall require a registry to be made of all persons in his neighborhood, town, or settlement, if any such there be, who shall refuse to enroll himself in said company, and transmit the same, with his company's roll, to this office.

When the aforesaid rolls shall be received, commissions for the officers will be promptly forwarded, after which requisitions for arms, signed by the company's officers, may be sent to the office of the quartermaster general.

Kansas expects every man to do his duty in this matter. The time has come for thorough organization and efficient action. The despotism which has been forced upon us must be overthrown. We must look to the ballot-box as the instrumentality of our disenthralment, and prepare to defend that ballot-box at any and every sacrifice against any and every attempt to violate its integrity.

The general staff, as organized this day, consists of M. F. Conway, adjutant general; E. B. Whitman, quartermaster general, and William A. Phillips, commissary general, each with an office in this city.

Correspondence may be conducted with any of these officers, and information, at all times, obtained from them in the line of their respective duties.

Signed at the office of the adjutant general this day.

J. H. LANE, Commanding.

GENERAL ORDER NO. 2.

HEADQUARTERS KANSAS VOLUNTEERS,
(For the protection of the ballot-box.)

LAWRENCE, July 20, 1857.

Whereas, the people of Kansas, in convention, at Topeka, on the 15th instant, did adopt the following resolution:

"Resolved, That General James H. Lane be appointed by this convention, and authorized to organize the people in the several districts to protect the ballot-boxes at the approaching elections in Kansas;"

Now, therefore, in pursuance of the authority thus vested in me, and in order to facilitate the accomplishment of the object thus set forth, I do hereby establish divisions and brigades, and appoint superintendents of enrollment for the same, with instructions as follows, to wit:

DIVISIONS.

First division. Commencing at the mouth of the Kansas river, thence by the river west to a point where a line between range seventeen and eighteen crosses the same; thence south following said line to the line separating townships twenty-two and twenty-three south; thence east, following the said line to the line between range twenty-one and twenty-two east; thence south, to the southern boundary of Kansas; thence east, to the Missouri State line; thence north, along said line to the place of beginning.

Second division. Shall comprise all that district of country lying west of the first division, and south of the Kansas river.

Third division. Commencing at the mouth of the Kansas river, up the main channel of the Missouri river to a point where the base or boundary line between Kansas and Nebraska terminates at the same; thence south, following the line between ranges eighteen and nineteen, to the Kansas river; thence down the main channel of said river, to the place of beginning.

Fourth division. Shall comprise all the region of country lying west of the third division and north of the Kansas river. (Here follow the details of the several brigades and divisions.)

In addition to the above, the superintendents of enrollment are requested to visit all other places within their respective limits, and to take such steps, wherever they go, as may be necessary to secure the enrollment of the people into companies, as per general order No. 1, herewith transmitted. They are also requested to proceed at once to the performance of their duties.

The brigade superintendents will report with dispatch to the superintendents of their respective divisions, and the latter will report to the adjutant general immediately upon the completion of their work.

Signed at the office of the adjutant general this day.

J. H. LANE, Organizing.

M. F. CONWAY, Adjutant General, K. V.]

Mr. GROW obtained the floor.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield me the floor?

Mr. GROW. For what purpose?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I wish to move an amendment to the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HUGHES.]

Mr. GROW. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. SEWARD. I object, unless the gentleman from Pennsylvania yields the floor unconditionally. I object to this farming out of the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia objects, unless the gentleman from Pennsylvania yields the floor unconditionally.

[Cries of "Withdraw the objection!"]

Mr. SEWARD. I withdraw the objection, so that we may see the intimacy existing between the gentleman from Illinois and gentlemen on the Republican side of the House.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I move to amend the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Indiana, by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

That the message of the President concerning the constitution framed at Leecompton, in the Territory of Kansas, by a convention of delegates thereof, and the papers accompanying the same, be referred to a select committee of thirteen, to be appointed by the Speaker.

That the said committee be instructed to inquire into all the facts connected with the formation of said constitution and the laws, if any, under which the same was originated; and whether such laws have been complied with and followed.

Whether said constitution provides for a republican form of government, and whether there are included within the proposed boundaries of Kansas sufficient population to be entitled to a Representative in this House, upon the basis now fixed by law; and whether said constitution is acceptable and satisfactory to a majority of the legal voters of Kansas.

Also, the number of votes cast, if any, and when, in favor of a convention to form a constitution as aforesaid, and the places where they were cast, and the number cast at each place of voting and in each county in the Territory.

The appointment of delegates to said convention, among the different counties and election districts of said Territory, and the census or registration under which the same was made, and whether the same was just and fair, or in compliance with law.

The names of the delegates to said convention, and the number of votes cast for each candidate for delegate, and the places where cast, and whether said constitution received the votes of a majority of the delegates to said convention.

The number of votes cast in said Territory on the 21st of December last, for and against such constitution, and for and against any parts or features thereof, and the number so cast at each place of voting in said Territory.

The number of votes cast in said Territory on the 4th day of January last, for and against said constitution, and for and against any parts or features thereof, and the number so cast at each place of voting in said Territory.

The number of votes cast in said Territory on the day last named for any State and legislative officers thereof, and the number so cast for each candidate for such offices, and the places where cast.

That said committee also ascertain, as nearly as possible, what portion, if any, of the votes so cast at any of the times and places aforesaid, were fraudulent or illegal.

Whether any portion, and if so, what portion, of the people of Kansas are in open rebellion against the laws of the country.

And that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. GROW then resumed the floor.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield the floor for that purpose, I will move that the House adjourn.

Mr. GROW. I will do so, if it be the pleasure of the House.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at six o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 3, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. SMITH PYNE, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair must explain an entry on the Journal. The Army bill was under consideration as a special order yesterday, when a message was received from the President of the United States, which was read by general consent at that time, and a motion was made to refer it, which consumed the remainder of the day, and the Senate adjourned on it. Under the circumstances, no order having been made in regard to the special order which was under consideration when the message was received, the Chair directed an entry that it was "postponed until to-morrow." If there be no objection, that order will stand on the Journal.

The Journal was approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. STUART presented a memorial of a number of persons styling themselves Hollanders, adopted citizens of Michigan, praying an appropriation for completing the improvement of Black Lake harbor in that State, and compensation for the Holland colony pile driver, which was lost with a portion of the pier erected in the waters of Lake Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BRODERICK presented a resolution of the Legislature of California in favor of a mail route from San Francisco to Petaluma, and from thence to Humboldt and Trinity; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of California in favor of a tri-monthly mail between San Francisco and Crescent City, by steamers; also, between Crescent City and Yreka, and Trinidad and Yreka; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. SEWARD presented a petition of citizens of Morrisania, New York, praying that the public lands may be laid out in farms or lots, for the free and exclusive use of settlers not possessed of other lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CAMERON presented the petition of William W. Hubbell, inventor of a new and useful improvement in eccentric explosive shells, praying for compensation for an infringement of his patent; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

Mr. IVERSON presented a memorial of officers of the first and second regiments of dragoons, and of the regiment of mounted riflemen, praying for such an amendment of the laws creating the five regiments of mounted troops, as will make them one corps; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. DURKEE, it was Ordered, That the petition of Prudence Couch, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. DAVIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 119) for the relief of the officers and soldiers of the Army who were stationed at Fort Kearny, Nebraska Territory, previous to the 1st day of March, 1853; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

REPRESENTATION OF THE NEW STATES.

Mr. HARLAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the constitutionality and expediency of a law allowing the new States such increased representation in Congress as their present population would entitle them to under the apportionment of 1850.

OFFICERS OF THE TEXAS NAVY.

Mr. HOUSTON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to furnish, for the information of the Senate, a full statement exhibiting such action as has been had in his Department in relation to the appropriation of five years' pay to the officers of the navy of the late Republic of Texas, embracing,

1. The names of the persons who have been paid under the act referred to; the amount to each, and the nature of the evidence on which payment was made.

2. A copy of his decision in the case of Captain John G. Tod, of said navy, together with a copy of all the papers upon which said decision was founded.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the report of the Court of Claims on the claim of Samuel C. Reid and others, officers and crew of the private armed brig General Armstrong, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; which was agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of John Hughes, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of John Pope, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of William K. Remmon, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the report of the Court of Claims on the claim of David Myerle, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 120) for the relief of David Myerle. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SIMMONS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred a bill reported from the Court of Claims the 28th of July, 1856, for the relief of Sturges, Bennett & Co., merchants of the city of New York, with the opinion of the court on the claim, reported the bill (S. No. 121) without amendment, and submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

NAVAL COURTS OF INQUIRY.

Mr. MALLORY. The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the amendment of the House of Representatives, to the joint resolution (S. No. 4) to extend the operation of the act, approved January 16, 1857, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy,'" have had the same under consideration, and direct me to report it back with a recommendation that it be concurred in with an amendment. The amendment proposed by the committee is a verbal one, striking out one date, and putting in another to make it accord with the true date of an act. If there be no objection, I ask that it be acted on now so that it may go back to the House.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives, which is to add, at the end of the resolution:

"Except as to any case pending, undetermined, before any court of inquiry under the act of the 17th of January, 1857, at the expiration thereof."

The Committee on Naval Affairs propose to amend the amendment, by striking out "seventeenth" and inserting "sixteenth."

Mr. MALLORY. The act was approved on the 16th of January, 1857, and not on the 17th. The amendment is to make the recital conform to the real date.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs whether he considers the amendment vital.

Mr. MALLORY. I do certainly. The amendment of the House of Representatives refers to an act which was passed on the 16th of January. The real date is the 17th of January, 1857.

Mr. DAVIS. It will delay, and possibly defeat action on the resolution, to send it back to the House of Representatives, though there can be no objection to having the date corrected if they can get it considered in the other House; but the machinery of that body may defeat action.

Mr. TOOMBS. I ask the chairman of the committee what the amendment is?

Mr. MALLORY. The House of Representatives, in adding an amendment to the resolution, have recited a bill as passed on the 17th of January, 1857, whereas it was passed on the 16th. This is a mistake as to the date of the bill. In the House a motion was made to amend it, but it was not allowed. It may be an important amendment or not; I leave that to the Senate to say.

Mr. CLAY. I would inquire of the Senator whether the description of the act does not designate it sufficiently?

Mr. MALLORY. Let the Secretary read the amendment, and the Senate can see.

The Secretary read the resolution and amendment.

Mr. STUART. Inasmuch as the House amendment does not give any other description of the act except its date, I consider the amendment of our committee indispensable to give it any force. If it had recited the act by its title, and then given a wrong date, it would be sufficient; but it has given you no reference to the act at all except its date. When you come to refer to the matter, you find no act of that date.

Mr. IVERSON. That may be true, but there is no such act as the act of the 17th of January, 1857, and, therefore, the amendment of the House of Representatives is perfectly nugatory. It refers to an act which is not in existence. The act in existence was passed on the 16th and not on the 17th. If the House amendment refers to an act not in existence, of course the amendment passes for nothing, and it cannot accomplish or affect anything. It is useless, therefore, to amend that which, in itself, is nothing at all; and as it may endanger the passage of the whole resolution by sending it back to the House of Representatives, I trust the amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs will not be adopted.

Mr. TOOMBS. I think the amendment of the committee is wholly unimportant, because the description of the act is sufficient. I believe it only covered one case, and that probably has taken a direction now that makes the amendment unnecessary. That I understand to be the fact, so that the amendment becomes wholly immaterial, and it has nothing to operate upon, even if it were operative. I think we had better defeat this amendment, and concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives as it comes here.

Mr. MALLORY. I differ with the Senator, unless he has some information that I have not. I have made inquiries on the subject, and I think there is one case that will be reached by this amendment, and to reach that case the amendment ought to be made. It is a case where an officer is raised from the dropped list to the leave list.

Mr. POLK. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs whether he considers the amendment of the House of Representatives an important amendment? If it is, it seems to me that it cannot be effective unless we change the date.

Mr. MALLORY. I do consider it of consequence. When the time of the courts was up, and they were about to be disbanded, there were two cases pending and undetermined, which the House of Representatives desired to embrace. They added the amendment to our joint resolution, to embrace those two cases. It is now important to embrace only one of those cases, because in the other the court declined to make a change; they left the officer where they found him. But to embrace that one case, I think the amendment of the House of Representatives is important; and inasmuch as that amendment, in referring to the act, refers to it wrongly, I think it is important to make it right in that respect.

Mr. POLK. It is very clear it does not affect the act as it now stands, unless the date be changed. The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on concurring in the amendment of the House of Representatives, as amended.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to ask whether it is in order further to amend it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will state to the Senate a further amendment which I wish to make. As the resolution has passed both Houses, of course I have no desire to interfere with it, or defeat it. I said what I deemed it my duty to say in regard to it before it passed this body. There is another case, however, which I wish to meet, and which I think justice to the parties interested requires should be met and provided for; and that is, the case of a person who was absent at sea at the time of the passage of the original act of 1857, and has not returned to this country up to the present time. The original act limited the date of applications, if I recollect aright, to one year from its passage. It extended the privilege of a trial before a court of inquiry to all who should apply within one year from the date of the passage of that act. At that period, one individual, an officer formerly in the Navy, and, I believe, a very meritorious officer, supposing that he was out of the Navy, had accepted the command of a merchant vessel, and gone to the East Indies. He has not been in the country, or able to return to it, to take any steps with reference to his restoration to the Navy since the passage of the act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will suspend his remarks. It becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which comes up at this hour.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the whole matter goes over, I am willing to stop here till to-morrow. In the mean time, I can reduce my proposed amendment to writing.

KANSAS LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to refer the President's message, received yesterday, to the Committee on Territories, is the business now before the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Was that made the special order for this morning?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It takes its place as a special order by being the unfinished business when the Senate adjourned yesterday.

Mr. WILSON. I propose to offer the following amendment to the proposition to refer the message to the Committee on Territories:

And that the committee be instructed to ascertain the number of votes given at each county in the Territory upon the question of calling a convention to form a constitution; to inquire into the appointment of delegates to the convention, and the census and registration under which the same was made, and whether the same was in compliance with law; the number of votes cast for each candidate for delegate to the convention, and the places where cast, and whether said constitution received the votes of a majority of the delegates to said convention; the number of votes cast in said Territory on the 21st of December last, for and against said constitution, and for and against any parts thereof, and the number so cast at each place of voting; the number of votes cast on the 4th day of January last, for and against said constitution, and the number so cast at each place of voting; the number of votes cast on the 4th day of January last for any State and legislative officers thereof, and the number so cast for each candidate for such offices, and the places where cast; and that said committee also ascertain, as nearly as possible, what portion, if any, of the votes so cast at any of the times and places aforesaid were fraudulent or illegal; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. IVERSON. I was under the impression that as the Senate adjourned on this question without making it a special order, it would not come up before one o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will explain to the Senator that there were two special orders assigned for half past twelve o'clock to-day, one of which would be called up; but this subject, being the unfinished business, takes its place at the head of the special orders, and comes up at half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. HALE. I desire to make a report from a committee. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield me the floor for that purpose?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

THOMAS AP CATESBY JONES.

Mr. HALE. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom his memorial was referred, to report a bill (S. No. 122) for the relief of Captain Thomas Ap Catesby Jones. As the bill is a very short one, and has twice already passed the Senate, once on full debate a year ago, and as Commodore Jones is a gallant old sailor, and is now sick, and may not live a great while, I ask that the bill may be put on its passage at once.

Mr. MASON. I hope it will be considered now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the bill will be read the first and second time.

There being no objection, the bill was read twice, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the accounting officers of the Treasury to allow to Commodore Jones the pay of which he was deprived by the decision of a court-martial in the year 1851, with a proviso that this act is not to be construed into an expression of opinion upon the organization, conduct, or decision of that court.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. How much does the bill appropriate?

Mr. BIGGS. Is there any report accompanying the bill?

Mr. HALE. There is none; but I will state what the facts are. Commodore Jones was put on trial by a court-martial, and sentenced to be suspended five years; two and a half years without pay. At the end of two years the sentence was remitted. In consideration of the very gallant services of Commodore Jones, and of his age and health, the committee have agreed to report this bill without going into the question whether the court-martial was legal or illegal, leaving that an open question, but simply giving the old Commodore the two years' pay of which he was deprived.

Mr. STUART. I object to the bill.

Mr. MASON. The Senator from Michigan objects too late. The bill had the unanimous consent of the Senate to be put on its passage, and was read on that unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair stated that the Senator from New Hampshire asked the unanimous consent of the Senate to let the bill go through its several readings, and be put on its passage. The Chair paused several seconds, and hearing no objection, announced that there was no objection, and directed the second reading of the bill.

Mr. STUART. I rose as soon as the Senator from New Hampshire sat down, and objected to it. This bill is an old affair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair heard no objection to the second reading of the bill, but if there be objection to the third reading of the bill to-day, it cannot pass now.

Mr. STUART. All I want is to have the bill considered. It has been considered here once, and rejected, after very full investigation.

Mr. HALE. Let me correct that mistake. It passed by a very large majority.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill lies over on this objection to its third reading.

COURTS IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. BAYARD. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back the bill (H. R. No. 22) to alter the time of holding the courts of the United States in the State of South Carolina, and to ask for its present consideration. It is a bill which meets the approval of the Senators and Representatives from that State, and it is a courtesy always to suffer such a bill to pass. It relates simply to the time of holding the courts. I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. STUART. What is it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill for information.

The Secretary read it.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill. It provides that hereafter the terms of the district court of the United States for South Carolina, at its sitting in Charleston, shall be held on the first Monday in January, May, July, and October, in each year, instead of at the times heretofore appointed; and that the term of the circuit court at its sitting in Charleston, shall be held on the first Monday in April in each year, instead of at the time appointed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment; ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HUNTER. I wish to ask the general consent of the Senate to take up the pension appropriation bill. It will not take five minutes to consider it. It is according to estimate, and we can pass it directly. If it leads to debate, I will agree to lay it down.

The Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill (H. R. No. 3) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States, for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment; ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY HUBBARD.

Mr. POLK, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Henry Hubbard, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 123) for his relief; which was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WADE. I ask for the consideration of that bill now. It has once or twice passed the Senate before, and it has the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill be read through, before consent is given.

The Secretary read the bill. It provides that there be paid to Henry Hubbard $672 75 for his services as United States agent, charged with the safe-keeping of the public property at the harbor of Ashabula, Ohio, as certified by the bureau of topographical engineers, with interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum from the 11th of June, 1856, from which time payment is shown to have been delayed for want of appropriation.

Mr. BIGGS. It is a very bad practice, it seems to me, to take up a bill which has just been reported, without the report being either printed or read. I object to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the bill cannot now be considered.

Mr. POLK. I move that the report be printed. The motion was agreed to.

R. R. RICHARDS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the joint resolution (S. No. 9) introduced by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIGLER,] be taken up and passed at this time. It will not occupy one moment. It is a very small matter. The bill has been reported unanimously by the Committee on the District of Columbia. I move to take it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senator proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the joint resolution (S. No. 9.) for the compensation of R. R. Richards, late chaplain to the United States penitentiary, for his salary, up to the 30th of June, 1857. It provides that $300 be paid to him in full, for his half year's salary, ending June 30, 1857.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. BIGGS. Is there any report accompanying this joint resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not aware of any report accompanying the resolution.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President—

Mr. BROWN. With the indulgence of the Senator from Michigan, I will make a very brief explanation of this resolution. This gentleman, Mr. Richards, was appointed by Secretary McClelland, chaplain of the penitentiary. He acted there and received his pay for three quarters. When the account was presented for the fourth quarter, the auditor stopped it on the ground that the appointment was illegal. There was a difference of opinion between the Secretary of the Interior and the Auditor of the Treasury, as to whether he could make the appointment. He withheld the compensation, and required of Mr. Richards that he should pay back a quarter's salary which he had received for the quarter preceding that time. Under that requisition he did return $150 to the Treasury, as one quarter's salary. This bill is to return to him the $150 which he paid into the Treasury, and to pay him for the other quarter during which he served. He served under a commission from the Secretary of the Interior, who writes a letter, which is among the papers, saying that he had no doubt at all, himself, that he had a right to make the appointment, and that the appointment was legal. The auditor thought differently, and refused to pay the salary.

Mr. BIGGS. Then I understand it to be a case in which there is a difference of opinion between the accounting officer of the Government and the Secretary of the Interior as to the legality of the appointment of this chaplain. I am unwilling, particularly when there is that difference of opinion, to extend the laws in regard to compensating chaplains. It seems to me that unless there is a better excuse given for it than has been presented by the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi, the joint resolution ought not to pass.

Mr. HAMLIN. What the Senator from Mississippi has stated is true; but there is one other fact that he did not state, and which I think has a material bearing on the case. I was a member of the committee, and did not agree to the report; but I do not propose to enter into any discussion here against it. I will simply state one fact, which explains the reason why the Secretary of the Interior could not make this appointment. Mr. Richards was a clerk in one of the Departments, receiving his compensation there, and the law provided that a person should not receive the compensation of two offices at the same time. He was getting his pay for praying and writing, and for that reason I opposed it.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator's statement is true; but it was not the business of Mr. Richards to determine what the law was. He was appointed by a competent power, and performed the service. There is no charge that he did not perform all his clerical duties. He did all that he was required to do. I believe he was a clerk at $1,200 a year. There is no charge that he neglected his duty in that respect. Then on the Sabbath he performed his ministerial duties at the penitentiary, under this appointment, which he doubtless believed was made according to law. Now, when the services have been rendered under a mistake of the Secretary of the Interior, if you will, the question is, who are you going to cheat? Are you going to cheat the preacher? That is the only point in the case. Are you going to take his services under an appointment of the Secretary of the Interior, and refuse to pay for them? It was not his fault that there was a mistake about the law. That was the fault of the Secretary, if there was, indeed, any fault. If that question were involved, I should discuss it, and undertake to show that he had a right to make the appointment, and that this is not one of the cases referred to by the law mentioned by the Senator from Maine; but I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate on a $300 claim.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; there being, on a division—ayes 26, noes 11. It was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives was received, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the House had passed a bill to amend an act for the relief of Whitemarsh B. Seabrook and others.

INDIANA SENATORIAL ELECTION.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I rise to what I suppose is a privileged question. Some days ago the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary reported a resolution in regard to the right to seats of the Senators from Indiana. That resolution has been lying over for some time, on account of the indisposition of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] who has been in his seat for the last day or two, and is now present. I think it desirable that it receive speedy action—either that we proceed to its consideration now, or at some early day to be agreed upon. I believe those who dissent from the report of the majority of the committee are ready to proceed with it now; and unless there is some reason shown for delay, I ask that the Senate proceed to its consideration at once.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senate that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] was upon the floor, and it cannot be taken away from him without his consent. Does the Senator yield the floor, in order that this question may be taken up?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYARD. I did move to take up the resolution of the Committee on the Judiciary some days ago; but in consequence of the absence of the honorable Senator from Vermont I postponed it until he should be well enough to come in. I was perfectly willing then, but I am not now willing to take it up—not, at all events, before Monday. Whether on Monday I can agree to call it up, as far as my own vote is concerned, I cannot at present answer. The reason that actuates me I will state. When I originally asked the Senate to take up the resolution, there was nothing that I conceived ought to take precedence of it. I believe, however, there is now before the Senate, for the purpose of reference, a question connected with what is called the Kansas issue, which I consider far more important than any other question which can be brought before the Senate as regards the permanent destinies of this country; and the sooner that question can be disposed of, the better for the preservation of the Union and the peace of the country. Under these circumstances, though this be a privileged question, I feel myself bound not to ask that it shall be taken up; and, in fact, to vote against its being taken up until there is at least a reference of that question, and probably until its disposition.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think the Senator from Delaware has given the very best reason in the world why this question should be taken up. He tells us that there is pending a question which may affect the stability of the Union itself—an important issue in regard to Kansas; and that he is unwilling to determine who are entitled to seats in this body until that vastly important question be settled. Why, sir, I think the first thing is to determine who has the right to settle that question. It should be settled by a Senate properly constituted. It will be remembered that for nearly a year a question has been pending here as to the right of two of the sitting members of this body to occupy seats. I do not propose now to discuss it; but I move that the question in regard to the right to seats of the Senators from Indiana be postponed until to-morrow at one o'clock, and made the special order for that hour, to the exclusion of all other business until it be disposed of.

Mr. BAYARD. I disagree with the honorable Senator from Illinois altogether. If this were a case in which there were contesting members from the State of Indiana, and the individual rights of others claiming to be representatives of that State on this floor were before us for decision, I should think that we ought to dispose of it before we entered upon any other question; but the State of Indiana has sent to us, with the prima facie evidence of proper election, two Senators, who have their seats upon this floor. I am perfectly aware that there are questions which must be decided by the Senate ultimately as to the legality of the election; but of the broad, general fact, which I can look at outside of that, that these Senators represent the public sentiment of the State of Indiana, I can entertain no doubt. Under these circumstances, when a question is to arise important to the destinies of this Union, why should not a sovereign State of the Union be represented, even though it be that it may turn out ultimately that the election was not in that form which the Constitution of the United States requires, and therefore invalid? I think the distinction is a clear one. As there is no individual interest connected with this matter, no contesting persons who claim to be entitled to the seats, as the result of the decision, if it shall be what the Senator from Illinois desires, will simply be that the State of Indiana will be unrepresented on this floor, as there is prima facie evidence of the right of these gentlemen; and as I believe the public sentiment of that State, even if the election was not regular in itself, is represented by them, I am not willing to lessen the number of the Senate when a question so grave and important as that of the admission of Kansas is to come before us.

Mr. BRIGHT. So far as is proper for me to speak, I desire to say that I am anxious to have this matter disposed of. I have not believed, really, that the Senator from Illinois was in earnest in insisting that the Senators from Indiana were not legally elected Senators from that State; but from the pertinacity with which he adheres to his position and insists on the consideration of the subject, I desire to say that I am anxious to have it considered. I think it is proper that the Senate should know my feelings on the subject; and I presume these are the feelings of my colleague, though I have not conferred with him on the point.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then, sir, I trust we shall unite on an early day for the consideration of the subject, and that my proposition that it shall be considered to-morrow will meet the approbation of the Senate. I defer any reply to the Senator from Delaware on the present occasion, as I will not encroach on the time of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proper question is first on the motion of the Senator from Illinois to take up this resolution. If taken up, he then can move to make it a special order.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I make a motion to take it up.

Mr. BROWN. If the resolution is to be taken up and postponed without debate, I have no objection; but if it is to be taken up and discussed now, so as to delay the discussion on the reference of the President's message, I object.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will inform the Senator from Mississippi, that I do not propose to discuss it at the present time; but merely to take it up and have it made the special order for to-morrow.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator has already given an intimation of the character of the motion he proposes to make; and that is, to postpone this question until to-morrow at one o'clock, and make it the special order for that hour to the exclusion of all other business. No such motion can pass without debate. I certainly shall not be silent when it is proposed to make this question override all other business. If it is simply to be taken up and postponed until to-morrow at one o'clock, and take its position with the other special orders, I have no objection to that; but I object to giving it precedence to-morrow over everything else.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am willing to test that to-morrow when the question arises. I now move to make it the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. HALE. I should like to know, for my own information, what is the right of a privileged question here. I remember to have heard it raised in a former Senate, when a distinguished Senator from South Carolina, not now a member of the body, and not now living, was at the head of the Judiciary Committee. In the discussion we then had, he said it made no odds how long, or how often a question affecting a member's right to a seat was postponed, it being a question of privilege as to who might vote in the Senate, any member of the Senate might raise the question at any time by objecting to the incumbent's voting when his name was called. If that be so—and I really rise for information—it would seem that, this being a question of privilege, it is in the power of any Senator to take that course, and object to these gentlemen voting. That was the course suggested by the late Judge Butler. I should like to know what a question of privilege is if it may be postponed at the will of a bare majority. If it may be so postponed, it may be postponed indefinitely, and then there is no privilege about it. It strikes me that it enters into the very constitution of the body, that the question of who shall sit here and vote is a question which by its own inherent force must override every other question, unless by the common or universal consent of the Senate a different course is suggested. I want information on this subject.

Mr. BAYARD. If the question were not to give rise to any debate, I should not have interposed an objection to its consideration. The report of the committee authorizing the taking of testimony does not dispose of this question. That is opposed by the minority of the committee, and their views have been submitted in writing. This will give rise to debate; and yet if the Senate coincide with the majority of the committee, there can be no final action until the testimony shall be taken. It will, however, give rise to extended debate, I have no doubt; because at the last session of the Senate, when a precisely similar resolution was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, (and though then a member of the committee I was not present when it agreed on the resolution, and did not know anything of it until it was reported,) it went over in consequence of debate being raised then, when there was no time for the disposition of it. But for the objection made then, the testimony would have been taken by this time. The same question arises, and will be discussed now. Of course it will interfere with what I suppose to be (although this is a privileged question) a more important matter than the disposition of the right of a Senator who has come here and been admitted with the proper credentials, prima facie credentials certainly, and such as are usual when there is no contestant in the case to have his rights infringed upon. Under these circumstances, I cannot see the necessity for immediate haste when there is pending what is, I think, a measure of greater importance; but I do not contemplate anything like an indefinite postponement. I say, further, I look solely to the measure to which I have alluded, which I consider of such vital importance, and if that were out of the way, no other measure would have induced me to ask the Senate to delay the consideration of this matter; but in reference to that, I consider it sufficiently important to justify me in voting against disposing now of a question of privilege which is to give rise to debate.

Mr. COLLAMER. I am unable to appreciate the views which the gentleman from Delaware seems to entertain in relation to this question. It is true that a majority of the Committee on the Judiciary have reported a resolution, directing the taking of testimony on certain matters connected with the election of United States Senators in Indiana. It is also true that the minority of that committee have presented their statement of the case, in which we insist that no testimony can alter the character of the case; that the facts, the undisputed facts, in relation to the manner in which the election was made, are such as to show that the election was not legal, was insufficient, and is incapable of being corrected. This is the ground taken. I do not propose to enter into the merits of the minority report, and consider whether it is well-founded or not; but certainly, if the view of the minority be entertained and sustained by the Senate, it will bring on a final and definitive view of the case on its merits.

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. COLLAMER. The minority think they sufficiently present the question. Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware seems to suppose that because these gentlemen had a certificate, that is, had the proper prima facie credentials, though their right is questioned, though it is contested, and though the point is on trial, yet, after all, we ought to proceed with great questions which concern the interests of the country; and if they are very important and concern the interests of the country deeply, we ought to defer settling who has a right to vote on them till after those questions are disposed of. I cannot understand that. It seems to be based on the presumption that inasmuch as these men had certificates, it must be that they represent truly the views of the people of Indiana. Non sequitur. That depends on whether they were legally elected. If they were not legally elected, you can raise no presumption of that kind; and it is but begging the question to say now, that they represent the sentiment of the people. That depends on whether they were properly elected or not, and that question is to be tried.

I view this not only as a privileged question, but as a question of privilege; and it is in the very nature of it preliminary. The right to vote is preliminary to the decision of any subject upon which Senators are to vote; and it is proposed to defer it because there is an important subject to be voted on. That is the very reason why it should not be deferred. The more important the subject to be passed upon ultimately, the more important it is to settle the preliminary question of who has the right to vote on it. With these views, I do not think this should be deferred to any other question; but, from its very nature, we have a right to insist that it shall be first passed upon, and that the Senate shall fix the earliest day for doing so. With these views, I cannot but insist that either now, or at an early day to be fixed, it shall be taken up.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I merely rise to suggest that this motion, I presume, is made under a misapprehension of its effect on the question. I understand that a question relating to the organization of the body, the right of individuals to hold seats, here, is a question of privilege. It can be taken up any day, on a motion being made by a majority vote, to the exclusion of special orders of every kind. If that be the case, the question to-morrow morning, without any motion being made now, will stand in precisely as good a condition as it would if it were taken up now and made the special order for to-morrow. Therefore, I do not see that anything is gained by taking it up now and postponing it. If you make it the special order for to-morrow morning, and then there is not a majority in favor of going on with it, they can pass it by. It being a question of privilege, a motion to take it up to-morrow morning will take priority then, and if there is a majority for taking it up, it can be taken up. Hence, I do not see that we can gain anything by taking it up this morning, and then postponing it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that he considers this a privileged question; and that the Senator from Massachusetts, having yielded the floor to the Senator from Illinois, he could bring it to the attention of the Senate; but of course the Chair would feel bound to recognize the action of the Senate to the subject of postponing it to another day.

Mr. HUNTER. I presume that no matter what is the character of the question, a majority of the Senate can postpone it. If it be a privileged question, all the priority which it has is to enable its mover to bring it up for the consideration of the Senate; but when it is up, the Senate, if it chooses, can postpone it and take up other business. All that I understand the Senator from Delaware to maintain is, that in the present condition of the public business, it would be better to postpone this matter and go through with the question which is now up, on which the Senator from Massachusetts has the floor, on the reference of the President's message.

Nor do I see that there are any such claims for speedy action as have been urged, inasmuch as this is not a motion to settle the question. It is a mere resolution to take testimony, which, if adopted, will require time. It will not be possible to take testimony and have a decision of the case before this question to which Senators have alluded will probably be decided. I do not see that that enters into the consideration of it at all. It seems to me to be a question which is to be considered and decided in reference to the business of the Senate, and the first thing it strikes me that we ought to do is to dispose of the motion for the reference of the President's message. In regard to the taking of testimony in this case, we can take up the resolution in the morning hour to-morrow or any other time, I care not when, and decide it; but I do not regard it as one of those questions which takes precedence over all others. It might have been so when it was first introduced; but it has already been once postponed, and a majority can continue to postpone it as they choose.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1858.

NEW SERIES... No. 35.

Mr. BIGGS. It seems to me that, by the course which is being pursued, the order of business in the Senate is becoming quite complicated. We had introduced, by unanimous consent yesterday, the message of the President of the United States. Upon that a motion was made, by unanimous consent, for the printing and reference of the message. That is the unfinished business; and that is the business regularly before the Senate, on which the Senator from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor. Now, it seems to me that, without unanimous consent, although the Senator from Massachusetts may yield the floor to the Senator from Illinois, we should be doing very wrong to take up another subject, either for consideration or for postponement. Considering the propriety of the order of business, it seems to me that, although the Senator from Massachusetts does yield the floor to the Senator from Illinois, he has not the right to make the motion, unless by the unanimous consent of the Senate, because it is entirely out of order, as the business of the Senate now stands. If that be the ruling of the Chair, as it seems to me proper it should be the ruling of the Chair, with all due deference to other Senators and to the Chair itself, I object to the Senator from Illinois making this motion on the present occasion; and insist that we shall proceed with the business properly before us, on which the Senator from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SEWARD. I think there would have been no difficulty about this case whatever, if it had not been for a remark, which seems to be quite extraordinary, by the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, that this question, which is a privileged one, and concerns the rights and dignity of the body and the constitution of the body itself, could be or ought to be postponed upon any ground of expediency in regard to the votes of the sitting members on measures which are to be decided by the body. I think but for that suggestion, which he himself, when he comes to reflect on it, will consider an unfortunate one, there would have been no debate on the proposition to assign an early day for the consideration of this resolution. It is demanded on the part of the minority of the committee, and it is assented to by the sitting members. For one, I think that there is no question so important to the Senate as the maintenance of its own integrity, its own dignity, its own honor, and that when the seat of any member is challenged, the first, the highest duty of the Senate, paramount to all others, is to give it such consideration as can be given to it consistently with the dispatch of the business of the country before the Senate at the time.

I quite agree with what has been said by the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] and others, that there is no necessity for having a vote to take up this question to-morrow. The honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] or any other Senator, can, to-morrow, move to take it up, and I do not think it important that the debate on the President's special message of yesterday should be delayed for the consideration of this question. I presume that the message will find a reference in the course of to-day or to-morrow. When it is referred, then this question can be taken up, and either considered immediately or at some early day thereafter.

I throw out these views for the purpose of suggesting to my honorable friend from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] that he can to-morrow, if the condition of public business shall favor it, call for the consideration of this question; and although I am holding my mind open on the question in regard to the rights of these Senators to their seats, yet I will go with him, or with anybody else here, in arriving, at as early a day as possible, at the question of the title to those seats or any others. I should not ask any other course in my own case, and I am glad to see that the honorable gentlemen who are concerned in this matter do not ask any other course in theirs.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Virginia assumes that nothing is to be done in this case except to pass the resolution to take testimony. We think that no testimony is requisite, that all the facts are here essential to a proper decision of the case; and that being so, it may be decided at once. But, not to interfere with the Senator from Massachusetts, who has the floor to-day on another subject, I will give notice that I shall to-morrow morning move to proceed to the consideration of this subject; and now I ask leave to withdraw the motion which I made to make it a special order for to-morrow, so that he may take the floor and proceed with his remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No action having been taken on the motion, the Senator has a right to withdraw it.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

Mr. WILSON. I am informed that Senators desire that the President's message shall be printed now, and that the debate shall go on upon the question of reference; I therefore ask that, by unanimous consent, it may be ordered that the message and the constitution accompanying it be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to print under the rules goes to the Committee on Printing, unless by the unanimous consent of the Senate that be dispensed with. [Agreed.]

Mr. HUNTER. I hope consent will be given.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the order will be made to print the message and the accompanying documents. The question now is on the motion to refer the message to the Committee on Territories, to which motion the Senator from Massachusetts has offered an amendment proposing certain instructions to the committee.

Mr. WILSON. This application, Mr. President, for the admission of Kansas into the Union, into this sisterhood of free Commonwealths, comes to us under circumstances that demand the prompt, thorough, and full investigation of the Senate and of the House of Representatives. Charges have been made by the people of Kansas, by Government officials in Kansas, of illegalities and frauds—illegalities and frauds which have deprived the people of that Territory of their rights, and defeated their will. These reports have gone over the country, over the Christian and civilized world, bringing dishonor and shame upon free Democratic institutions. Under these circumstances, sir, I take it that every man, every Senator here, every member of Congress, every fair minded and honorable man throughout the Republic, desires, before we vote to bring Kansas into the Union or to reject her application, that all the facts connected with the calling of the convention to frame a constitution, the election of delegates, the framing of the constitution, the mode of submission to the people, the election under the constitution, and all the questions concerning the rights and the interests of the people of Kansas shall be fully investigated. To accomplish this object, which every honorable gentleman in America must desire, I have submitted the motion that the Committee on Territories be instructed to make this investigation, and that they have power to send for persons and papers.

I indulge the hope, Mr. President, that every Senator on this floor will promptly vote for these instructions, and that the Committee on Territories will make the most searching, thorough, and complete investigation into this whole subject; and if there be frauds; if there be wrongs; if there be anything in the action of that Territory that baffles the popular will; that robs the people of their rights, that the facts will be presented to the Senate and to the country, and that we shall be guided on this great question, which now arrests the profound attention of the country, by the simple idea of ascertaining the real will of the people of the Territory of Kansas, and letting that will control our action.

Before I sit down, sir, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to some of the allusions, assumptions, and declarations of the President, in this extraordinary communication to Congress. The President told us, in his annual message, that the attention of the country had been too much drawn to the Territory of Kansas. I regret, I think the country will regret, I think every man who cares anything for right or justice, who cares anything for the honor of the American name and the American character; ay, anything for the good name of the Chief Magistrate of the Republic, will regret that the President himself had not devoted time enough to the consideration of the affairs of Kansas to have enabled him to present to the Senate and the country, a full, intelligent, accurate, and truthful statement of the events that have transpired in that Territory. I say here, sir, what I know to be true; what every intelligent man in the Senate knows to be true; which the country and the world know to be true—that the statements in this message misrepresent, wholly and entirely, the events that have transpired in that Territory; and wherever this message goes, it will carry to the world a stupendous and gigantic misrepresentation of affairs in the Territory of Kansas.

I know, sir, that the President cannot be expected, in the midst of the vast duties that devolve upon him, to understand everything that has transpired in that Territory. He was out of the country when the act for the organization of Kansas was passed; he was out of the country during the eventful years of 1854 and 1855, and a portion of 1856; years in which events of great magnitude transpired in Kansas. He was nominated, we all know, sir, because he was out of the country, and had no connection with those events, because he was able to prove an alibi. But, sir, he sends to us, to men familiar with the events of the past four years, this message, covering this application for the admission of Kansas, on the application of John Calhoun, the president of that convention, and he gives a coloring to events in that Territory which will give to the country and to the world about as correct an idea of the affairs of that Territory as the bulletins of Napoleon gave to the people of France of the condition of the grand army on their retreat from Moscow.

The President tells us that there is a delusion in the country in regard to the condition of affairs in Kansas; that it is supposed there are two parties in that Territory contending for the government of the Territory. He gives us to understand that this is not the fact, that there is not a great free-State party struggling to make Kansas a free State, and a slave-State party struggling to make Kansas a slave State; that these two parties are not contending on the soil of that Territory for mastery; and he would have the country to understand that this is not the state of affairs in that Territory, but there is a party of law and order, a party that legitimately and legally governs the Territory; and that there is another party setting at defiance the laws of Congress and the Constitution of the country, and that they are laboring to overthrow by lawless violence the government of the Territory and to impose on the people a constitution of their own choice. Now, sir, I know, you know, every man here knows that this is not the fact. I say here to-day that there is no party and there has been no party in the Territory of Kansas setting at defiance the Constitution of the United States, or the laws of the United States; no party, nobody, no set of men, in that Territory in rebellion against Federal authority. On the 30th March, 1855, the people of that Territory were summoned to the ballot-box to elect thirteen members of the Legislative Council and twenty-six members of the House of Representatives. On that day there was an invasion of that Territory of forty-nine hundred men from the neighboring State of Missouri. These forty-nine hundred armed men went into every council district and into every representative district but one. They took possession of the electoral urns; they selected the Legislature to frame the laws for that Territory, and to shape and mold its future. Of the twenty-nine hundred men in the Territory who had a right to vote, less than fourteen hundred voted on that day, and yet a majority of actual residents were in favor of a free State and had majorities in sixteen of the eighteen districts. These facts have been proved, demonstrated, by taking the names of the persons enrolled as actual voters, and taking the names of the persons who voted on the 30th of March. These facts were proved under the order of the House of Representatives, and by a thorough investigation by a committee of that House, and no man here or elsewhere can deny them.

The people of Kansas had imposed upon them that day a government not elected by themselves, a government imposed upon them by those forty-nine hundred men from the State of Missouri. The people of the Territory felt this to be a great outrage on their rights. They had a right to feel so. The people of any State would have felt outraged on going to the ballot-boxes and finding them in the possession of armed men from another State. Governor Reeder undertook to correct some of these frauds upon the ballot-box by withholding certificates from the members thus elected, and Governor Reeder, on that day when he undertook to right these wrongs, was marked for swift destruction.

The Legislature assembled; threw out the free-State members who held certificates from Governor Reeder; it passed laws violating the rights of a free people; it violated the freedom of speech and of the press; it denied to them the right to go to the ballot-box unless they took a test oath that no freeman could take without degradation. Those laws would not allow a man to sit in a jury-box if he denied the right to hold slaves in that Territory. These laws were intended—to use the language of one of the leading men who imposed them on the people—to degrade and drive out of the Territory the free-State men. What were freemen to do under such circumstances? They had been brought up in the belief that the people were the inherent source of power, that all power came from the people in their sovereign capacity. They had read the Kansas-Nebraska act, and they supposed that act conferred on the people, without the intervention of a Territorial Legislature or of Congress, the right to come together to frame a constitution and to ask for admission into the Union as a sovereign State. The people of other Territories had framed such constitutions. They assembled in convention, they framed such a constitution, they submitted that constitution to the people and it received the popular verdict. They elected their officers under it; they chose their Senators, and sent them to this Chamber to ask for admission into the Union. They undertook to enforce no laws, and from that time to the present they have kept that Topeka government in existence; they have framed some acts necessary for its preservation; but from that day to this they have never attempted to enforce those laws. I declare here to-day what I know personally to be absolutely true, and I declare it in the face of the declaration of Governor Walker and of the President, that the presence of your army in that Territory, the proclamations of your officials, the action here in the Senate and the House of Representatives, have not prevented that people from putting those laws in execution; but they have acted according to their own well chosen and deliberate policy. They never intended to go into rebellion; they never intended to enforce these laws against the laws of Congress. They have always denied the validity of your territorial laws which were imposed upon them by fraud and force; they have not used them for the protection of their liberties or their lives. Young men, who went to that Territory to practice their professions, have, from conscientious scruples, from that time to this engaged in the most common labors of life rather than acknowledge those laws, or take the oath to support them. The masses of the people of that Territory from that time to this have never acknowledged those laws as binding on them; they have never claimed their protection. They have been outraged, robbed, imprisoned; they have seen their dwellings burned down; they have been invaded; many of their fellow-citizens have been murdered because they loved liberty; but they have not invoked the protection of those laws. They never have; they never will; they never ought to do so. No man here would ever submit to them, or claim their protection, or use them for his own personal protection.

The President, in support of this charge of rebellion, quotes the evidence of Governor Walker. Governor Walker, sir, went to that Territory as the President's instrument to accomplish a certain purpose. He was appointed Governor of that Territory on the 30th of March, 1857; he entered that Territory on Sabbath evening, the 24th of May. Much of the intervening sixty days of time was spent by the Governor in making speeches, and writing letters magnifying his great mission. I went to the Territory from St. Louis in company with Governor Walker; I saw him at Lawrence; I saw him when he was welcomed by the people of "rebellious" Lawrence in a generous way, of which any man might be proud; I was at Leecompton, the capital, when he arrived there. Governor Walker went to that Territory, and his own letters demonstrate it, on this mission to divide the people of Kansas who were in favor of a free State, to unite the free-State Democrats with the pro-slavery men, and secure the slavery then existing in Kansas, and make it a black-law, pro-slavery, Democratic State. That was his mission; and no man in America could have labored more faithfully to accomplish that object. He went to that Territory a pro-slavery man, in favor of the pro-slavery policy of this country; and in his inaugural address to the people, in view of the fact that it might become a free State, he said that the great Indian territory of the South would be slave territory, and that slave States might be made out of it. I was there when that address was issued; and although we are told now that everything in the Territory was in a state of excitement bordering on rebellion, I say here to-day, that there was no spot on the North American continent where there was more quiet than existed on the 1st of June last in the Territory of Kansas. Rebellion existed only in the teeming brain of Governor Walker. The persons appointed to take the census and to enroll the voters had not performed their duty in about half of the counties of the Territory. The free-State men, under the lead of Governor Robinson and other leading men, made a proposition to acting Governor Stanton, before Governor Walker arrived, to go into the election of delegates to the convention if they could be enrolled, and the ballot-boxes so protected that there should be no invasions and no fraudulent voting. They did not wish to commit themselves in that election, and find at the polls what they found at the polls on the 30th of March, 1855—an invading host of illegal voters, to rob them of their rights. Secretary Stanton, who was then acting Governor, to whom this proposition was made, answered these gentlemen by saying he had no power to correct the list of voters, and he could do nothing to aid them. Some of the people, in some of the counties where the officials had refused to take the census or to register the voters, made an application to go on and elect their delegates; and it was suggested to them that they could do so, and that their delegates might be accepted by the convention. When the day of election came, less than twenty-three hundred men went to the polls to vote, about one ninth part of all the voters in the Territory.

When the result of that election was known in the Territory, it was believed by intelligent men of all parties that the convention would never assemble; that it had gone down beneath the moral sentiment of the people, that it was an ignominious and contemptible failure. The President quotes Governor Walker's hasty and ill-timed language in regard to the action of the people of the city of Lawrence. We were told here, the other day, by a Senator from Georgia, that the city of Lawrence was the sink of filth, folly, and falsehood. Sir, I venture to say that there is not a town in the United States, north, south, east, or west, of the numbers to be found in this town of Lawrence, containing more of individual worth, or personal character, or general intelligence. I venture to say that there are more college graduates in that town, than in any town west of the Alleghenies of equal population. The people of Lawrence are a law-abiding, liberty-loving people. Having lived for two years without the protection of law, having been robbed and plundered, and being desirous of doing something for their own local interests, the people of that town, in July last, framed and adopted a city charter. The people there are all on one side—there are, I think, only two or three slave-State men there, and no one intended to enforce any laws on them. It was a charter framed by common consent. The laws under it were intended to be executed by common consent. The committee of the people say in their address:

"As its action will be purely local, and have reference merely to our own internal affairs, no collision is apprehended with any other organization claiming to exercise general jurisdiction in the Territory."

They did not intend to violate the laws of the Union, or of the Territory. The Governor moved the troops upon that town, and pronounced their acts rebellion; but the people went right on. They framed their ordinances, they put their ordinances in execution, while his army was encamped on their soil; and from that time to this, they have peacefully and quietly administered their own local town affairs, and have harmed nobody in or out of the Territory. This simple act, performed by common consent, having the assent of the whole people, intended to operate only in their own local affairs, was pronounced by Governor Walker as the greatest rebellion the world had ever witnessed!

"A rebellion so iniquitous, and necessarily involving such awful consequences, has never before disgraced any age or country."

This ridiculous declaration is only equaled by his ridiculous action in moving the army on Lawrence. The Governor tells us that this town of Lawrence was the hot-bed of the Abolitionists of the East, that paid agents of those societies were there. I deny the fact that paid agents were in the town of Lawrence, of any Abolition society, East or West.

The Legislature imposed on Kansas by lawless violence provided that the people should vote in October, 1856, whether they would call a convention to frame a constitution. In October, 1856, the vote was taken, and about two thousand votes were given upon that question. Test oaths were then demanded, and the free-State men would not vote. The President sharply censures them for not doing so. The Legislature, in the winter of 1857, passed the convention act. The plan was to make Kansas a slave State. The time, the mode, and the machinery were all selected with the skill of political tricksters to secure that result. Governor Geary vetoed the act, because it contained no clause authorizing and directing the submission of the constitution to the people for their ratification or rejection. In a succinct letter Governor Geary tells us that—

"In a conference with the committees of the two Houses, by whom the bill had been reported, I proposed to sign the bill, provided they would insert in it a section authorizing the submission of the constitution as above indicated. But they distinctly informed me that the bill met the approbation of their friends in the South—that it was not their intention the constitution should ever be submitted to the people, and that to all intents and purposes it was like the laws of the Medes and Persians, and could not be altered."

Governor Geary tells us that he was informed that the reason why the constitution was not to be submitted to the people was, that their friends in the South, who were in favor of making Kansas a slave State, required that it should not be submitted. Their friends in the South were wise in this respect. They believed they could control the election of the delegates to the convention; but they knew that if the constitution was submitted to a fair vote of the people, the people by an overwhelming majority would vote it down; and they then demanded, if we are to believe these gentlemen of the committees of the two Houses, that the constitution should not be submitted to the people. Why did gentlemen from the South demand that the constitution should not be acted on by the people? They knew that that people were in favor of making Kansas a free State; that they would vote down any constitution that did not make Kansas a free State; and therefore the people must be robbed of their right to vote on their own constitution.

The President sent Governor Walker to the Territory with the promise, with the assurance that the people should vote upon the constitution. Governor Walker, in his letter of acceptance, says that he understands the President and Cabinet to be committed to that policy. Governor Walker went to the Territory, and in his inaugural address promised the people that "unless the convention submit the constitution to the vote of all the actual resident settlers of Kansas, and the election be fairly and justly conducted, the constitution will be, and ought to be rejected by Congress."

What was the effect of these declarations on the people? The people said "the census has not been taken; the registry has not been honestly made; we shall be cheated if we go to the polls to elect delegates to this convention. We do not wish to commit ourselves and then be cheated and defrauded. We will let them elect their delegates to the convention, frame their constitution, and when they submit it to us, we will vote it down." That was the sentiment of the free-State men throughout the whole Territory, and all the evidence goes to show it. I know it to be so by my own personal experience in that Territory. I know it to be the sentiment of the leading men and of the people.

We are told by the President that the reason why they did not vote was that they wanted to enforce their Topeka constitution; that they wanted to frame laws and establish their rebellious government! Sir, they had a convention on the 9th of June, before the delegates were elected to the Lecompton convention, and they voted, with only one solitary exception, against putting the laws framed under the Topeka constitution in force. The people intended nothing of this kind; but they decided to elect their officers under the Topeka constitution, to keep that Government alive for protection in the last resort and then resolved to go into the October election under protest. They went into the October election and carried the Legislature and Delegate to Congress.

Now, sir, I wish to call attention for a few moments to Governor Walker's course in regard to the October election. The President quotes Governor Walker when he sustains his theory, but he does not quote him when Governor Walker's testimony goes to show that the people of Kansas have been cheated and defrauded. For promising that the people of the Territory should have the right to vote on their constitution, Governor Walker was assailed in all the slave States of this Union south of us. I think some of the Senators of this body demanded that he should be removed. He was denounced throughout the southern States by a class of public men and by a class of public journals for having promised that the people of Kansas should have a fair opportunity to vote for the adoption or rejection of the Lecompton constitution. The Administration which gave him that assurance quailed beneath this denunciation from the slaveholding States. It changed its policy, abandoned Walker, and betrayed the people of Kansas.

When the October election came on, there was stupendous frauds perpetrated at Oxford and in McGee county. These fraudulent votes, if counted, would have settled the character of the Territorial Legislature. Governor Walker could not give his sanction to those frauds. What did he do? He investigated the frauds at Oxford, and the frauds in McGee county, and threw out the fraudulent votes. For that act, for throwing out these palpable frauds, for throwing out the list made up out of the Cincinnati directory, in which it is said Governor Chase's name was included, for performing that act of justice, Governor Walker was assailed from one end of the southern States to the other by politicians and presses. Men who had sustained the invasion of the 30th of March, 1855, of four thousand nine hundred men from Missouri, men who had refused to investigate those frauds, men who had upheld the laws enacted by the Territorial Legislature, men who had sustained the use of the army in the Territory, and all the acts which have transpired in that Territory, these men denounced Governor Walker for throwing out frauds that prevented them, as they thought, from consummating the iniquity of dragging Kansas into the Union as a slave State.

We are told by the President that the people of Kansas have had a fair opportunity to vote on the slavery question. I am surprised that the President of the United States has so little regard for the intelligence of the Senate and the country, and for his own reputation, as to make a declaration of that character. The people of Kansas had a fair opportunity, he tells us, to vote on the 21st of December last, for or against slavery. Sir, they had no such opportunity; and the President of the United States, if he does not know it, ought to know it. The slaves in the Territory, it was declared by the Lecompton constitution, were property; and—"The right of property in slaves now in the Territory shall in no manner be interfered with."

"No alteration shall be made to affect the right of property in the ownership of slaves."

These provisions went into your constitution with no slavery! There are about three hundred slaves in the Territory of Kansas. This constitution with no slavery recognizes the existence of the right of property in those slaves, and declares that in no manner shall that property be interfered with. In any proposed amendment to the constitution, we are told "that no alteration shall be made to affect the right of property in the ownership of slaves." That was the constitution with no slavery.

Then we have the constitution with slavery; and I assure Senators that I had much rather have your Lecompton constitution, with slavery, than your Lecompton constitution without slavery. Your constitution without slavery recognized slavery in the State, declared that it should never be interfered with, made it eternal; those slaves then there and their posterity forever. That was the constitution without slavery. What a mockery is it to tell the people of Kansas that they had an opportunity to vote for or against making a slave State.

But we are now told by the President that we can change this constitution before 1864. I have no doubt of that. I believe the people have the right to change their constitution when they please, and just how they please. But what security have we that the men who have been retreating for the last ten years from the Wilmot proviso down to the doctrine that slavery exists in the Territories by the Constitution of the United States, as much as it exists in Georgia or South Carolina—what security have we that the President of the United States, that the Congress of the United States, that the Supreme Court of the United States, will not declare that this constitutional provision cannot be changed, that it is of binding force in the new State, and is the eternal law of that State, beyond the reach of the people? I know there are men in the country who have already proclaimed this to be true. You can find in southern presses the doctrine that the people have no right to change it. If the slave drivers of the South put their foot down and demand that that shall be the accepted doctrine of the Administration and the pro-slavery Democratic party, the Administration and the pro-slavery Democratic party, with all the branches of authority, will adopt it as readily as they have adopted any of the monstrous heresies of the past. I have no faith in their promises or declarations. I know that this Administration came into being as the agent of the slave propagandists; that by them it lives, moves, and has its being, and without their support it would perish in one hour. Whenever the slave power makes a demand on this Administration, or on the pro-slavery Democratic party, that demand I know is first resisted by a portion of them in the North, but they surrender in the end. No man can maintain his manhood and continue to enjoy the confidence of the Africanized Democracy of this age.

If we had said, Mr. President, twelve years ago, that the Democratic party, which then, in both Houses of Congress, stood up here for the glorious doctrines of the ordinance of 1787, would have retreated from that doctrine, and come down, down, to the doctrine that the Constitution of the United States carries slavery wherever it goes all over the Territories; that wherever it goes it carries chains and fetters for men; they would have justly regarded it as a libel upon them, but there they are now. They have only got a step or two further to go. They have only got to declare—and they have raised the question in the judicial tribunals of the country—that they may take their slaves in transitu through the free States, and then come to the final doctrine enunciated in the Union a few days ago, that these views, legitimately carried out, would prevent the abolition of slavery in the States by the State constitutions. I believe they intend to come to that. I believe the slaveholding interest will ultimately demand the right not only to carry their slaves into the Territories and hold them there, but they will demand the right to carry their slaves in transitu through all the States, and then to set up the doctrine which we find in the Kansas constitution, that slaves are property, that property is above all constitutions and all laws, and that you have no right by constitutional action, or any other action, to abolish slavery in the States. Then we shall be an Africanized Republic.

The President tells us that the people of Kansas, on the 4th of January, by voting for the election of officers under the Lecompton constitution, recognized its validity. If the people of Kansas refuse to vote, they are denounced as rebels that have no rights, and they are held to be bound by the will of those who do vote. If they do vote, then they recognize the validity of this constitution. The President will not be satisfied with their action any way. The Legislature, finding that this constitution was not to be submitted to the people, assembled, and summoned the people to the ballot-box on the 4th of January, to give their votes for or against the constitution. By the provisions of that constitution there was an election to take place on that day. The free-State men went to the ballot-box, and by from twelve to thirteen thousand votes voted down that constitution. They wanted to make another protest against it; and what were they to do? They could not vote against the Lecompton men for State and Legislative officers, without putting up men of their own and electing those men over them. They nominated a ticket. They went into that canvass to vote down that constitution, and to vote down the men who supported it.

This vote of the people of Kansas against these men and for the election of free-State men, was an additional protest against your Lecompton swindle; and it is a perversion of fact, a perversion of truth, a perversion of all that is just, for any man; be he President, Senator, or Representative, to charge that the people of Kansas, by voting for the election of officers under the constitution, intended, in any way, to give their sanction to it. These men went to the ballot-box on the 4th of January to blot out forever the Lecompton constitution. They knew the people were against it by an overwhelming majority—of five or six to one. They meant to overthrow Calhoun and his corrupt minions in that Territory, who have violated law and justice, who have stained their names and lives by frauds and outrages. They meant not only to vote down the constitution, but to crush out the men who were endeavoring to force it upon them. The only way to do that was to elect men, pledged against the constitution, and who would come here as they already have done, and ask you, ask Congress, ask the country, to reject it as a fraud on the people. Yet this act, proclaimed to the country and to the world, the President of the United States misrepresents and perverts.

Sir, we have had enough of these petty quibbles in Congress without expecting them to come from the other end of the avenue. We have had the pleading of technicalities, all the little technicalities and specialties put in on a great question of public policy. All the outrages in Kansas have been perpetrated under the color of law. Tyrants always rule under the color of law. Instead of asking "what is the opinion of the people? what do they want?"—instead of ascertaining what the public will is, we have had Senators, Representatives, and now we have the President, quibbling on technicalities and forms by which the substance is to be lost to the public.

We have the evidence of Governor Reeder, of Governor Geary, of Governor Stanton, in a paper recently published, and of Governor Walker, that outrages and frauds have, from time to time, been perpetrated in the Territory of Kansas. Now we have before us the fruits of all these frauds and all those wrongs. Senators here object to their final consummation. The Senator from Illinois, [Mr. Douglas,] who introduced the measure for the repeal of the Missouri compromise, who, for four years, has stood here, and before the country, as the champion, the acknowledged champion, of that policy—a man who, during the struggles of the last three or four years, has led here, as he had a right to lead the supporters of this policy in the Territory of Kansas and in the country, asks that these frauds shall not triumph; that these wrongs shall not be finally consummated. He asks that the people of Kansas may have an opportunity to vote upon the constitution, for or against, before admission into the Union; and because he has paused now, because he simply asks that the people shall have the right to vote in framing a constitution for their own government, he is denounced from one end of the country to the other, by the supporters of the policy indicated by the President in this message. He has not uttered a word or written a line indorsing the views that we on this side of the Chamber hold on the question of slavery; but because he now demands that the plighted faith of his party shall be redeemed, that the people shall have the right to vote on their own constitution, he is hunted down in the Senate and in the country. Already he is branded in some sections of this Union as a Black Republican, or the ally of the Black Republicans. Black Republicanism seems now to be this: any man is a Black Republican who refuses to support the last iniquity, the last crowning act of infamy. No matter though his whole life has been devoted to the interests of slavery, if he pauses now, if he refuses to allow slavery to triumph by palpable frauds, he is to be crushed for that act, and to be read out of the Democratic party.

The Governor of Virginia—that Governor who was ready to dissolve the Union in 1856 if Fremont was elected, who was ready to call out his militia, and who boasted that they would “hew their bright way through all opposing legions”—has pronounced these acts in Kansas “unveiled trickeries” and “shameless frauds,” which the people of Virginia would scorn; for that declaration he is denounced in Virginia and throughout the country. You have had Reeder, Geary, Stanton, and Walker sacrificed. Now you propose to sacrifice the distinguished Senator from Illinois, and the hardly less distinguished champion of the pro-slavery Democracy of the Old Dominion. You propose to drive everybody out of this Administration party who refuses to consummate the last iniquity, to make effective the last crime in the interests of slavery.

I hope the motion I have made to instruct the Committee on Territories to investigate everything connected with the formation of the constitution of Kansas will be adopted by the Senate. If Senators are disposed now, at this time, with all these frauds, all these wrongs before this nation, to investigate and be guided by the facts, the country will give them the credit, whatever may be their wish of being actuated by a sense of justice. The ear of this country is pained with the crimes and frauds that have been perpetrated in Kansas. No man here or elsewhere can doubt them for a moment. The voice of the people of Kansas comes here in a thousand ways and asks us to reject the application, because it has been framed and carried through in violation of the public will.

I say, then, that if we reject this proposition to instruct the committee to go into a full and thorough investigation, it will be understood in Kansas and in the country, and throughout the world, that the Senate of the United States sanctions the frauds by which a constitution, made by a small and contemptible minority, under the lead of Government officials, has been forced upon the people of Kansas contrary to the clearest expressions of the popular will. If the Senate shall refuse to institute the most searching inquiry into all the matters concerning the formation of this constitution, it will stand before the world and go down to after ages, associated with the men who have, by violence and fraud, forced the accursed system of slavery upon a reluctant people.

Mr. BROWN. I rise, Mr. President, to express my cordial concurrence in the message of the President of the United States. It has seldom fallen to my lot to read a paper of the same length and find in it so little which in my judgment is fairly subject to criticism. In many of the arguments of the President in his annual message to Congress I did not concur, though I did concur in his conclusions. From his message on Central American affairs I dissented almost entirely. In this message I concur, not only as to its chief arguments, but as to its conclusions. It will hardly be expected that I should concur in every sentiment expressed in a paper of such length; but as to its main arguments, its principal conclusions, I think there can be but two opinions, and they are the opinions entertained by national men of all parties on the one side, and by sectional men of all parties on the other side. It was never expected that the Senator from Massachusetts would concur in the arguments or conclusions of a national President, whether he be a Democrat, an American, or a Whig. Nothing but sectional Republicanism will do for that Senator. Nothing but measures which look to the triumph of one section of the Union and the putting down of the other section ever has met, or is likely ever to meet, the approbation of the Senator from Massachusetts. With his views politically, it is not strange that he should wholly dissent from such a message. I am not going to reply to the speech of that Senator. If I had ever intended to reply to that speech, I could have done it some three years ago. I think the honorable Senator makes a mistake in supposing that old speeches, like old wine, will bear keeping. They grow stale. There are many old things for which I have great respect. I love old friends; I love old wine in a moderate degree, [laughter;] I reverence old age; but I abhor an old speech, delivered from year to year through a whole senatorial term.

I would greatly prefer seeing the question taken on the reference of the message; and if the Senate is prepared to do that, I shall be very glad to have it done. But if the debate is to go on, I shall submit this evening what I have to say. I am perfectly willing, however, if no one else is disposed to continue the debate, to let the vote be now taken, and let the message be referred; and when we get the report, then have the debate. If there is a general acquiescence in that view of the subject, I shall yield the floor.

Mr. KING. I was disposed yesterday to speak to this question, and a Senator, not now in his seat, on this side, thought he would do so. I have no particular desire to speak, but I should be glad to hear the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. BROWN. Does the Senator want to go on?

Mr. KING. If the gentleman gives me the floor, I will go on now. I do not want it, if he wishes to speak. I would rather hear him.

Mr. BROWN. As I said before, if the debate is to go on I would as soon submit the few remarks I have to make now as at any other time. From what Senators say to me I think there is a strong probability that we can get the vote this evening on referring the message.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to say to the Senator that I feel rather disposed to say something on this subject before it closes. If I make a speech, it may not be a very brief one; so that I think there is very little probability of the debate being closed this evening.

Mr. BROWN. Then, Mr. President, under the circumstances, I see no probability of accomplishing the design I had in view; and I suppose I may as well proceed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I would suggest, with the leave of the Senator, that if he does not desire to proceed this evening, there is no disposition on my part to urge a vote. The Army bill is yet before the Senate; and if the Senate choose to lay this aside until to-morrow, if the Senator prefers to speak to-morrow morning, it would certainly be very agreeable to us.

Mr. BROWN. There is a disposition on our side of the House, I will say to our friends on the other side, to dispose of the important question before us, so that we may reach other questions that lie behind.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should not like myself to be forced into a debate at a very late hour; it is not customary. If the Senator chooses to go on now, however, very well.

Mr. BROWN. It is not on that account that I hesitate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will perceive that unless the Senate chooses to say that all that is to be said must be said to-night, it would perhaps be as well to postpone the debate now, as the hour is late.

Mr. BROWN. Well, Mr. President, I must say to Senators that I intend to address myself to this question with as much deliberation as possible. I do not intend to occupy any extraordinary time; but as the evening is drawing on, if any of them choose to go away while I am speaking, and occupy their time elsewhere, I shall take it not at all unkind. What I have to say is not designed to influence the votes of Senators, and especially not the votes of Republican Senators. Like Ephraim, they are joined to their idols, and I shall let them alone. I may have something to say in the progress of my remarks which ought to have influence on the minds of Democratic Senators inclined to differ with me in opinion on this question; but even if they do not choose to remain in the Chamber, I shall not take it as at all unkind if they go away.

On a former occasion, I called attention to the fact that, at the beginning of the Kansas controversy, we expressly enacted that Kansas was to be admitted into the Union when she came to form her State constitution, with or without slavery, as her people should determine; that all of us who voted for that proposition thenceforward stood committed to the admission of the State. I asked then, as I ask now, whether it is fulfilling that obligation to resort to technicalities, to resort to special pleading, with a view of avoiding the force of the agreement? Republican Senators are not committed to this view of the subject, because they voted against the bill. The Democratic Senators are committed to it, because they stand on the record in favor of the bill.

I had further called attention to the fact that the national Democratic party, in council assembled at Cincinnati, solemnly reiterated this declaration, and made it one of the corner-stones of its political edifice; and, therefore, every member of that convention, and its nominees; every member of the party throughout the Union, stood solemnly committed to the same doctrine, that Kansas was to be admitted, with or without slavery, as her people should determine when they came to form a constitution. I had shown from the record that Democratic speakers, from that day forward, had on all proper occasions declared that they were prepared to redeem the obligation into which we had thus entered. I had inquired whether, this fact being true, we were now, on any system of pleading, to avoid the force of the contract?

Now, Mr. President, beyond all dispute, slavery lies at the bottom of all our difficulties on this territorial question. Whenever we are about to organize a Territory over any portion of the domain lying South, this question arises; and it leads to long, animated, and angry controversy. On the other hand, whenever we are about to organize a territorial government over any of the domain lying North, it is done without controversy. Whenever we are about to admit a State in the North or Northwest, there is no controversy. Michigan was admitted, and Iowa and Wisconsin have been admitted, and other northern States have been brought into the Union, without any sort of objection on the part of southern Senators and Representatives. But when Arkansas and Florida and Texas were about to come in, we had a revival of these contests. More recently, we have had Minnesota and Washington and Oregon organized into Territories—regions where slavery had not gone, and was not likely to go—and there was little or no controversy; but when we were about to organize the Territories acquired in the war with Mexico, we had a renewal of these angry contests, the point of conflict being always the existence in the Territories of domestic slavery.

The two Territories that were organized together in 1854, Kansas and Nebraska, gave rise, for a time, to a joint controversy; but still the main point was in Kansas, as it has been ever since. Why? Because slavery had not gone, and was not likely to go, to Nebraska; while, if it had not actually gone, the probabilities were strong that it would go, to Kansas; and hence the whole controversy rested on that Territory, there being an effort, on the one hand, to force the institution out of the Territory, and there being a strong disposition, on the other, to stand by what we conceived to be the constitutional right of those who have the custody of that institution, to take it into the Territories.

The question of slavery, Mr. President, has not only given annoyance to Congress and the country, but it has been the fruitful source of annoyance to political parties. It broke up the national Whig party. When the whole northern wing of that party became thoroughly abolitionized, the southern portion refused any longer to affiliate with them; the party was broken up. Out of its ruins and out of the dissensions in the Democratic party, rose the American, sometimes called the Know Nothing party—a party which perished almost as soon as it was born. The fragments of these dissolved or dissolving parties were gathered together in the northern States, and constituted the Republican party—a party which has no existence, or shadow of existence, anywhere outside of the non-slaveholding States of the Union.

This being true, there remains for us but one party which can lay just claims to nationality; that is the Democratic party. But now the same element which broke up the Whig party, which prevented the formation of a great national American party, which has made the Republican party purely sectional, is at work for the destruction of the national Democratic party. If the destruction of that party shall be worked out, if it shall follow in the wake of its predecessors, then it is absolutely certain that the country will instantly be divided into two sectional parties. The whole North will unite as a northern party, and the whole South will unite as a southern party. When this shall be done, it requires no spirit of prophecy to foretell the result. When all the North is pulling in one direction, and all the South in a contrary direction, that the Union must be drawn asunder is as certain as that the sun rose this morning and will go down to-night.

With fearful consequences like these staring me in the face, and feeling the responsibility which rests upon me as one member of the Democratic party; seeing the imminent danger of its dissolution, and believing that bad men everywhere seek its dissolution, and to the end that I have pointed out, I approach the consideration of this question with extraordinary embarrassment; and as I intimated before, what I have to say is to be said rather to the country, and to that portion of it which I have the honor in part to represent, than to any one here.

I hope it will be understood here, as I am sure it is understood elsewhere, that this Union has no more devoted friend than I; that there exists not in all this broad Republic one citizen prepared to make greater sacrifices than myself for its preservation. If I sometimes hesitate to go with those who claim to be, par excellence, the friends of the Union, it is because I doubt whether their policy does not lead rather to its disruption than its perpetuity.

Repeated efforts have been made to compromise the question of slavery in the new States and Territories, and they have as repeatedly resulted in disaster. In 1819-20 there was an attempt to compromise it. The country had been wrought up to a state of very high excitement, and the political doctors of that day said that a sedative, a light draught, the compromise, known ever afterwards as the Missouri compromise, was all that the case required. Wiser men of that day thought it was a disease so deeply rooted that it required more powerful remedies. If I can say it without giving offense, I will remark that the advice of political quacks was taken, and instead of striking at the root of the disease, Congress undertook to settle it, to cure it by compromise, by the application of sedatives; and the compromise of 1820 was adopted.

Years passed on, and as other territory was asking admission into the Union, that happened which the wise statesmen of 1819-20 on the southern side of the question declared would happen. The North—Massachusetts among them, Massachusetts who, in the person of the Senator, has stood up here to-day the champion of law and order—refused to recognize the binding force of the compromise. Though Arkansas asked admission, lying clearly south of this compromise line, now so much revered and honored on the other side of the House, there was an attempt made to deny her admission, on the ground that her constitution tolerated slavery. We acquired subsequently the Territories of California, Utah, and New Mexico. Proposition after proposition was submitted to extend the Missouri compromise line to the Pacific, and as often as it was submitted it was rejected by our northern friends. That compromise, then, was a failure, not recognized by anybody.

In 1850 it was considered necessary to compromise again. Then we were told that the philosopher's stone had certainly been found; that not only "the five bleeding wounds" had been cured, but that everything which could give rise to agitation in the future had been permanently settled, and the whole disease had been torn up by the roots, and from that day forward we should have no controversy on the subject of slavery. To me the compromise of 1850 was distasteful. I abhorred it from the beginning, and am perhaps one of the very few, if I am not indeed the only man in Congress who voted against it in all its forms, in all its features, and in all its parts.

Four years passed away, and it became necessary to compromise again. In 1854 we were told that the question had again got into difficulty, and it was necessary to compromise it a third time. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] brought forward his famous Kansas-Nebraska bill—a bill which I propose now to consider. The main feature of that bill was the one so often quoted, that it neither designed to "legislate slavery into the Territory, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States." I need not say that this provision sprang out of an attempt to enforce the Wilmot proviso on the country, not only on the territory north of the Missouri compromise line, but on the territory south of that line. The contest was kept up for years in almost equal balance, the friends of the proviso insisting that they had the right, by congressional legislation, to exclude slavery, and we of the South on the other hand contending that we had the right under the Constitution, without the aid of legislation, to carry our slaves into the common territory; and that, having them there, we had the same right that gentlemen of the North had to demand protection for any property of theirs. I say the contest thus stood, and was kept up with various chances of success for several years. About 1848 what was considered by many as a most happy idea was hit upon—the doctrine of non-intervention. It was tried in the presidential election of that year, and had very many warm and zealous advocates. It was more successful in the contest of 1852; but it was not until 1854 that it was formally enacted into law. Then it received the sanction of Congress. No longer bandied about in political circles or resolved upon by vast political meetings, it received the high sanction of the Congress of the United States, and was enacted into a law.

It is hardly necessary for me to say that as an original proposition I was opposed to it. I belonged to that class of politicians who believed that a southern man had the same right to go into one of the common Territories of the Union, and take with him his slave property, that a northern man had to go and take with him any other species of property. I believed that I had the same right to go from Mississippi and take my slave property, that the Senator from Massachusetts had to go and take anything which was recognized as property by the laws of his State, and that when I got it there, I was entitled to the same protection from Congress to which he was entitled for his property; or if the Territorial Legislature made the law, then the Territorial Legislature was under the same obligation to protect me and my property that it was under to protect the property of the Senator from Massachusetts. That is what we asked, and it was all we asked. We had, however, no power to enforce a recognition of our claim, and the other side found themselves deficient of the power to enforce their idea of our total exclusion. After years and years of conflict, this idea was taken up that Congress would neither legislate slavery into the Territory nor exclude it therefrom, but leave the people thereof perfectly free to regulate their domestic institutions in their own way. We passed the Kansas bill, and we stood in that bill solemnly committed to the ground that we would admit the State with or without slavery, as her constitution at the time of her admission should prescribe.

This was our last compromise; and now we are here, in less than four years after its passage, discussing again whether we are not to have another compromise. So far as I am concerned, and I speak for myself alone and for those who have authorized me by their commission to speak in their name, I am for no compromise; I am for the law as it is written. I accepted the compromise of 1854, I say, reluctantly in the beginning; but having accepted it, I made up my mind as a man of honor to abide by it. I am not prepared to see its force destroyed by any resort to special pleading, by any resort to miserable county-court technicalities.

Having said this, I come to the next point in the controversy. The law of 1854 was passed, under which Kansas was organized as a territorial government. A Legislature was chosen for the Territory; but before that election was gone into, movements were set on foot here to which I beg leave, by way of reviving the recollection of gentlemen as to what is the true history of this transaction, to call attention. I find them set forth in the memorable report of the Senator from Illinois, made to the Senate on the 12th of March, 1856. That Senator stands opposed to-day to the admission of this State into the Union under a constitution formed, as I believe, and as I think I shall be able to show, by her people. The Senator from Massachusetts undertakes, in the close of his speech to-day, to defend the Senator from Illinois. It was not from that quarter that defense came in days gone by. If the Senator from Illinois can stand a defense from that quarter, I have nothing to say in regard to it.

Mr. WILSON. Allow me to say a word.

Mr. BROWN. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. I think the Senator from Mississippi is entirely mistaken. I made no defense of the Senator from Illinois. He is capable of defending himself here or elsewhere. I simply referred to the fact that the Senator from Illinois, who introduced the Kansas-Nebraska act, who, for four years, has been the champion of that policy, the trusted leader of the Senators who supported that policy, has paused, has refused to consummate a stupendous and gigantic fraud; and for that act he who has been their champion is now denounced from one section of the country to the other, and threatened with being driven out of the party whose leader he has so long been. That is what I said.

Mr. BROWN. I have no comment to make on that part of the Senator's speech. If it appears as it was delivered, I shall be quite content. But I desire to call attention to this controversy as it arose in Kansas, and to show high authority for the position which I take, that the Republican members in the Senate, and their friends in the States, were responsible for the first outrages committed there. It was because I intended to use the high authority of the Senator from Illinois in this connection, that I alluded to him at all, and I was thus reminded that he had been but a few minutes before, as I thought, defended by the Senator from Massachusetts. In the report of the 12th of March, 1856, to which I before alluded, the Senator from Illinois said, as I believed at the time, and still believe, truly:

"The passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act was strenuously resisted by all persons who thought it a less evil to deprive the people of new States and Territories of the right to State equality and self-government under the Constitution, than to allow them to decide the slavery question for themselves, as every State in the Union had done, and must retain the undeniable right to do, so long as the Constitution of the United States shall be maintained as the supreme law of the land. Finding opposition to the principles of the act unavailing in the Halls of Congress, and under the forms of the Constitution, combinations were immediately entered into in some portions of the Union to control the political destinies, and form and regulate the domestic institutions of those Territories and future States through the machinery of emigrant aid societies. In order to give consistency and efficiency to the movement, and surround it with the color of legal authority, an act of incorporation was procured from the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, in which it was provided, in the first section, that twenty persons therein named, and their 'associates, successors, and assigns' are hereby made a corporation by the name of the Massachusetts Emigrant Aid Company, for the purpose of assisting emigrants to settle in the West; and for this purpose they shall have all the powers and privileges, and be subject to all the duties, restrictions, and liabilities set forth in the thirty-eighth and forty-fourth chapters of the revised statutes of Massachusetts."

"The second section limited the capital stock of the company to $5,000,000, and authorized the whole to be invested in real and personal estate, with the proviso that 'the said corporation shall not hold real estate in this Commonwealth (Massachusetts) to an amount exceeding twenty thousand dollars."

"Although the act of incorporation does not distinctly declare that the company was formed for the purpose of controlling the domestic institutions of the Territory of Kansas, and forcing it into the Union with a prohibition of slavery in her constitution, regardless of the rights and wishes of the people, as guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States, and secured by the organic law; yet the whole history of the movement, the circumstances in which it had its origin, and the professions and avowals of all engaged in it, render it certain and undeniable that such was its object."

This, then, was the commencement of the present controversy. No sooner had the Kansas bill passed, than a movement was set on foot, (as was charged by the distinguished Senator from Illinois, and as I believed at that time, and still believe,) through the instrumentality of a certain secret circular, prepared and signed by some of the Republican Senators—the then Senator from Ohio, Mr. Chase, now Governor of that State, the eminent Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] and I believe, also, the Senator from Massachusetts, not now in his seat, [Mr. SUMNER]—which gave rise to this organization in Massachusetts, this Emigrant Aid Society, with a capital of $5,000,000, only $20,000 of which was to be used within the limits of the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. SEWARD. Allow me a word of explanation. I am desirous that my honorable friend from Mississippi shall not perpetuate an old error, which was corrected at the time. Although there were some statements that I was a signer of the paper to which he alludes, those statements were corrected at the time of the occurrence and according to the fact. I am not entitled, therefore, to any of the merit or any of the demerit of the proceeding on which he is commenting. I know the honorable Senator would not like to continue an error which is merely personal in its bearing.

Mr. BROWN. I am glad to hear that there is one who did not sign it; but there was such a paper. The point I was making is, that there was such a paper, and that it gave rise to the emigrant aid societies in Massachusetts and elsewhere. I make no point as to the individual Senators who signed it. Now, taking the same report, from which I before read, at page 9, I want to show how the persons who were sent out by the Massachusetts Emigrant Aid Society demeaned themselves when they got to Missouri:

"When the emigrants sent out by the Massachusetts Emigrant Aid Company, and their affiliated societies, passed through the State of Missouri, in large numbers, on their way to Kansas, the violence of their language, and the unmistakable indications of their determined hostility to the domestic institutions of that State, created apprehensions that the object of the company was to abolish Kansas as a means of prosecuting a relentless warfare upon the institution of slavery within the limits of Missouri. These apprehensions increased and spread with the progress of events, until they became the settled convictions of the people of that portion of the State most exposed to the danger by their proximity to the Kansas border. The natural consequence was, that immediate steps were taken by the people of the western counties of Missouri to stimulate, organize, and carry into effect a system of emigration similar to that of the Massachusetts Emigrant Aid Company, for the avowed purpose of counteracting the effects, and protecting themselves and their domestic institutions from the consequences of that company's operations."

I produce this authority to show how the controversy commenced. It had its origin in the secret circular; it next exhibited itself in the formation of emigrant aid societies under the authority of the Massachusetts Legislature. The emigrants were sent out, and demeaned themselves as is described in the paragraph I have just read, and, in the strong language of the report, the natural consequences were the stirring of a feeling of resistance in Missouri. If there had been no secret circular issued, there would have been, probably, no organization of an emigrant aid society. If there had been no emigrant aid society, with a constituted capital of $5,000,000, to stimulate the settlement of the class of persons set forth in the report from which I have read, in the Territory of Kansas, there would have been no counter movement in the State of Missouri, and we should have escaped the charges about border ruffianism, and all the complaints which we have heard uttered to-day for the fortieth time by the Senator from Massachusetts, of the terrible outrages committed by those people. I hope the Senate, like a high court of chancery, will require that he who comes here and asks for justice shall come with clean hands. If things have not been done in Kansas with the precise regularity, with all the order and decorum which the Senator is accustomed to see at home, whose fault is it? Who began the error? I shall now proceed to show who has perpetuated it.

The election for members of the Legislature, as I said before, was holden at the time, at the places, and in the manner prescribed by law. That there must have been irregularities, from the statement of facts already submitted, any one will see at a glance. The emigrants sent out from Massachusetts and the other New England States, were sent out in full force. They were met in the Territory by emigrants from the State of Missouri.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Mississippi if he knows what proportion of the free-State men in Kansas emigrated from New England?

Mr. BROWN. I do not know, of course.

Mr. HARLAN. Then I will remark, merely in order that he may not base his argument on a wrong state of facts, that more than four fifths of the free-State men in Kansas are from the northwestern States—the States northwest of the Ohio river. There are to-day, doubtless, more people in Kansas from the State of Iowa than from all the New England States combined. The free-State men arrested, with arms in their hands, as it was stated, by the Army of the United States, were principally from the State of Michigan; and there were none of those emigrants, I believe, from New England. The great body of the free-State men in Kansas to-day are from the northwestern States; and this is from the necessity of their position. Within those States there is to-day a population of between six and seven million people. They necessarily, according to the legitimate laws of emigration, throw over into the new Territories of the Northwest an immense emigration, that overwhelms any other class of emigrants in point of numbers.

I have deemed this correction necessary, as I saw that the Senator from Mississippi was basing one portion of his argument on the supposed fact that the Massachusetts Emigrant Aid Society had sent the major part of the free-State men to Kansas. This is not true. They went to Kansas from the States of the Northwest, as they are going to Nebraska and to Minnesota. There are some men from New England, and some from the southern States, but the great mass is from the Northwest.

Mr. BROWN. For any purpose of mine, it is not a matter of consequence where they went from—whether from Massachusetts or from the Northwest. My point is, that the movement was set on foot through the instrumentality which I have named. I never supposed that the operations of the Massachusetts Emigrant Aid Society were confined to the limits of that State, else it would not have been provided that only $20,000 of the capital of $5,000,000 should be invested in property in Massachusetts. It was intended to operate elsewhere. That it operated in Michigan, Iowa, Wisconsin, and all the free States, I dare say is true; but Massachusetts was the seat of the cancer. It spread out its roots, it is true, into all the free States; its influence was felt everywhere. It is the influence of the movement of which I speak, and not the precise locality where it was set on foot.

Then, sir, I repeat again, that it was the influence of this emigrant aid society that gave rise to the first conflicts in the Territory of Kansas. It was the conduct of its creatures as they went through the State of Missouri, as shown by the report of the eminent Senator from Illinois, that first stirred the blood of the Missouri people, and determined them to defend, not Kansas, but themselves; for they had unmistakable evidence that these people were being planted there so that they might make forays on Missouri, and, in the language of the report, wage a relentless warfare on slavery in the State of Missouri.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I simply wish to inquire of the Senator whether he is aware that, by the report of the committee appointed by the House of Representatives to investigate the matter, it was shown by the testimony of those who were engaged in the transaction—Missouri men—that even before the Missouri compromise act was repealed, associations were formed in that State in the shape of Blue Lodges, as they were called, with the express purpose of procuring emigration into the Territory of Kansas, in order to shape its political institutions, and settle there and acquire the mastery?

Mr. BROWN. I was not aware of any such thing. I use the report of the Senator from Illinois, not only because it comes from a high source, but because I have been already admonished in the debate this morning that the source from which it comes is regarded as of high authority on the other side of the Chamber. When the eminent Senator from Illinois speaks to the Republican members of this Chamber, they are accustomed to listen. If I am not mistaken, they not only listen, and listen attentively, but they are, to a great extent, guided by his counsels.

Mr. WADE. The gentleman ought not to bind us by confessions made previous to the conversion. Anything stated since, we will hear; but anything before that, I do not consider myself bound by. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWN. Well, sir, that is rather more witty than profound. But I will show, in this connection, what happened immediately on the reading of that report. The Senator from Massachusetts, not now in his seat, [Mr. SUMNER,] at once rose and said:

"I cannot allow the subject to pass away, even for this hour, without repelling, at once, distinctly and unequivocally, the assault which has been made upon the Emigrant Aid Society of Massachusetts. That company has done nothing for which it can be condemned under the laws and Constitution of the land. These it has not offended in letter or spirit; not in the slightest letter, or in the remotest spirit. It is true, it has sent men to Kansas; and had it not a right to send them?"—Congressional Globe, first session Thirty-Fourth Congress, p. 639.

Now, sir, I wish to show how the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] met that speech at the time. He first declares that the facts as he set them forth in the report are true, and then, addressing himself to the Senator from Massachusetts, says:

"This he knows as well as I do. I do not intend to allow denials of the truth of facts to be interposed to screen men from the consequences of their action, when that action is avowed and susceptible of proof; hence the Senator's denial cannot be interposed. It is a denial of facts which he knows to be true; it is a denial of facts which shall not be controverted. If, instead of denying, he proposed to justify them, I would willingly hear him; but he cannot be permitted to deny them." * * *

"If he means that he is prepared to go to the country to justify treason and rebellion, let him go; and I trust he will meet the fate which the law assigns to such conduct. If he means that the hopes of his party are to produce a collision in Kansas, in which blood may be shed, that he may traffic in the blood of his own fellow-citizens for political purposes, he will soon discover how much he will make by that course. We understand that this is a movement for the purpose of producing a collision, with the hope that civil war may be the result; blood shall be shed in Kansas. Sir, we are ready to meet the issue. We stand upon the Constitution and the laws of the land. Our position is the maintenance of the supremacy of the laws, and the putting down of violence, fraud, treason, and rebellion against the Government."

I am aware that this strong language was controverted at the time as unjust; but I am not aware, nor do I believe the record will show, that there was interposed at that day any denial of the facts. The challenge of the Senator from Illinois was broad—as human language could make it. Not only his language, but his manner, was daring and defiant. The Republican Senators were told at that day that their friends were charged with fraud—with rebellion against the constituted authorities of the country—and if they wanted to justify such conduct, they might attempt it, and take the consequences of the justification, but they should not deny the facts; and I believe the facts were not denied.

It was under circumstances like these, I say, that the election for the first Legislature was gone into. The pro-slavery party triumphed; and at once we had a howl raised all over the country, from one extremity of it to the other, that the election had been carried by fraud. The party who attempted the first fraud, and that upon a most gigantic scale, calling to their assistance from a single State a concentrated capital amounting to $5,000,000, lost the election in the Territory; and then they cry out "fraud," "rascality," "villainy," "bogus laws," and all that. On the broad principle named by me before, that he who commits the first fraud cannot afterwards be allowed, in a court of equity, to complain that his adversary has committed frauds, I claim a judgment in this case. If gentlemen on the other side stood at a disadvantage in the beginning, when did they ever set themselves right? All that I have heard from them since, has been one eternal cry about "fraud," "violence," "bogus laws," and all that. Setting out with the fixed determination, by the use of money and organized societies, to carry the election against the will of the people, they were beaten, and then set up this howl.

The validity of the election, as has been repeatedly said, and, as I suppose, will not be controverted, was recognized by Congress, recognized by the President, recognized by all the five or six Governors whom we have sent there; ay, sir, and recognized by a vast majority of the people of Kansas themselves, of all parties. The acts passed by that Legislature are in force there to-day; and, as was strongly said by Governor Walker, if you blot them out you leave the Territory without law. On that point, I desire the attention of Senators to Governor Walker's language:

"The Territorial Legislature, then, in assembling this convention, were fully sustained by the act of Congress, and the authority of the convention is distinctly recognized in my instructions from the President of the United States. Those who oppose this course cannot aver the alleged irregularity of the Territorial Legislature, whose laws in town and city elections, in corporate franchises, and on all other subjects but slavery, they acknowledge by their votes and acquiescence. If that Legislature was invalid, then are we without law or order in Kansas; without town, city, or county organization; all legal and judicial transactions are void; all titles null; and anarchy reigns throughout our borders."

Thus, sir, it seems that the authority of the Legislature, its validity, was recognized in the Territory, and is recognized now on all subjects except slavery. Though it is not germane to the point which I am discussing, I will ask in this connection, if it was a valid Legislature for all other purposes, if it could grant town charters and city charters, if it could pass laws by which the rights of property are determined, if, in the comprehensive language of Mr. Walker, it was a competent Legislature for all other purposes, and it be true that the people were left to regulate their own affairs in their own way, how does it come that it was not a competent Legislature on the subject of slavery?

The Legislature thus chosen, the validity of which has been thus recognized by the President, by both Houses of Congress, by six successive Governors, by a vast and overwhelming majority of all the people of the Territory on all subjects except the subject of slavery, called a convention; but they did not do so without first consulting the people to know whether they desired to have a convention. I hold in my hand an extract from the Kansas Herald of October 18, 1856, which sets forth the returns of an election held in obedience to law to determine whether the people of Kansas desired to have a convention called or not. A vast and overwhelming majority of the people instructed the members of the Legislature to call a convention. Then it was not, as has been assumed, an act of supererogation. It was not an act of assumption on the part of the Legislature to order the convention. It was done in obedience to the popular will. The people at the ballot-box had ordered that it should be so.

The Legislature did not call the convention without first preparing the way, so that it should be done in the best manner possible, and in a way to avoid all future controversy. I have before me an act of the Legislature, in which it is directed that a census of the whole population shall be taken, and a registry of the votes made, for the purpose of ascertaining who was legally entitled; and, under that authority, I find that—

"Every bona fide inhabitant of the Territory of Kansas, on the third Monday of June, 1857, being a citizen of the United States, over the age of twenty-one years, and who shall have resided three months next before said election in the county in which he offers to vote, and no other person whatever, shall be entitled to vote at said election; and any person qualified as a voter may be a delegate to said convention, and no others."

What could be fairer? Was there any attempt to give advantage to one party over another? Every bona fide white male inhabitant over the age of twenty-one years was entitled to vote; and all he was required to do was to give his name to the census-taker, and allow it to be recorded on a register kept for that purpose, so that when the election came on, these emigrant aid men, these bogus men from Massachusetts, and these border ruffians from Missouri, might be excluded. It was a fair attempt on the part of the Legislature to allow all who were justly entitled to vote the privilege of exercising it, and excluding all who were not entitled to vote.

When gentlemen find fault with this action of the Legislature, would it not be well to point out the objection? Was it not fair? Was it not as fair for one side as for the other? It was an attempt to register all who should be entitled to vote, and to exclude all from every quarter, whether they came from the North or the South, who were not entitled to vote. How was that proposition met? Governor Stanton, in his message to the Legislature at the late extra session, tells us that nine thousand two hundred and fifty-one votes were recorded, and no more. He tells us that a large number were not registered, and he assigns various reasons for it. I will read his very words:

"The census therein provided for was imperfectly obtained from an unwilling people, in nineteen counties of the Territory; while, in the remaining counties, being also nineteen in number, from various causes no attempt was made to comply with the law. In some instances, people and officers were alike averse to the proceeding; in others, the officers neglected or refused to act; and in some, there was but a small population, and no efficient organization, enabling the people to secure a representation in the convention. Under the operation of all these causes combined, a census list was obtained of only nine thousand two hundred and fifty-one legal voters, confined to precisely one half the counties of the Territory, though these, undoubtedly, contained much the larger part of the population."

Mr. Walker subsequently repeats the same charge, and says there were fifteen counties disfranchised. As this is an important point in the transaction, I shall pause to examine it with some little care. Is it true that either nineteen or fifteen counties were disfranchised either under the circumstances named by Mr. Stanton, or those presented by Governor Walker? I think I shall be able to demonstrate that no such thing is or can be true. Recollect Mr. Stanton states there were nine thousand two hundred and fifty-one votes registered. This was the number on the last day of March, 1857, when the register was closed. In October following, more than six months after, when it is admitted the whole population voted, registered and unregistered, at that election at which Mr. Parrott, now a Delegate in the other House, was chosen, when I believe all parties took a hand in the election, what number of votes was polled? According to the authority of the Kansas Herald, ten thousand nine hundred and fifty-three votes were polled, being only seventeen hundred and two more than were on the register. According to the Herald of Freedom there were polled at that election eleven thousand six hundred and eighty-seven, or two thousand four hundred and thirty-six more than were on the register.

Now, sir, if you will bear in mind that this was an election at which everybody went to the polls without let or hindrance, and then remember that the country had been populating from the last of March, when the register was closed, to October afterwards, you will find, I think, most of these two thousand four hundred and thirty-six, according to one authority, and seventeen hundred and two, according to the other, accounted for. There would be that many more by the ordinary laws of population; and then it is admitted large numbers were found by the census takers who refused to give their names. In a country like that, sparsely populated, new, and without roads, beyond all question, there would be considerable numbers who could not be found even with the utmost vigilance. Now, make a fair deduction for the increased population for six months; make a fair deduction for those that could not be found; make a fair deduction for those who refused to register, and take those deductions from the excess of two thousand four hundred and thirty-six, according to the Herald of Freedom, an Abolition paper, and you have very few deliberately disfranchised men left—not half enough to populate nineteen counties, according to Mr. Stanton, or fifteen counties, according to Governor Walker. I think, therefore, unless the figures speak falsely, I have shown already that Mr. Stanton and Mr. Walker are mistaken. And I now choose to show, even at the expense of wearying myself, that these gentlemen never seemed to entertain this idea until lately. Let us see what Mr. Stanton said on the subject in his first address to the people of Kansas, when he went there and assumed the duties of acting Governor, by virtue of his commission as Secretary. In this address, dated the 17th of April, 1857, he said:

"The Government especially recognizes the territorial act which provides for assembling a convention to form a constitution with a view to making application to Congress for admission as a State into the Union. That act is regarded as presenting the only test of the qualification of voters for delegates to the convention, and all preceding repugnant restrictions are thereby repealed. In this light the act must be allowed to have provided for a full and fair expression of the will of the people, through the delegates who may be chosen to represent them in the constitutional convention."

Recollect that when this was said the register had been closed; we had then these complaints that men had been disfranchised, and everything had been said about it. Then the great prominent fact which stared the country in the face was, that considerable numbers of the free-State men had refused to register; and the acting Governor speaks to them, and tells them they had a full and fair opportunity open to them to give expression to their views. How could he say that, if nineteen counties, or one half the counties in the Territory, had been disfranchised? I do not pretend to say that a full registry was taken or kept in all the counties of the Territory. I think that may not have been. I see the fact stated on the authority of an eminent citizen of the Territory, that the census was taken in some instances for four or five counties together, under the name of one county. I have the paper before me, but shall not stop to read it, because I do not consider it very essential.

Next let us see what Mr. Walker said on this subject. Mr. Walker went to the Territory and issued his inaugural address on the 27th of May. The registry had then been closed nearly two months. He had the benefit of the experience of Mr. Stanton, who was his immediate predecessor; and then, addressing the people of the Territory, he used this language:

"The people of Kansas, then, are invited by the highest authority known to the Constitution to participate freely and fairly in the election of delegates to frame a constitution and State government."

Mr. Walker, with all the facts before him, addressing the people two months after the registry had been closed, and all the complaints had been uttered, said to the people of Kansas, "an opportunity is now offered to you of freely and fairly expressing your opinions," how can he now come forward and say that fifteen counties, some of them the oldest in the Territory, had been deliberately disfranchised?

I show then, first by the figures, next by Governor Stanton, and next by Governor Walker, that the statement is not true. It cannot by possibility be true that fifteen counties of the Territory were disfranchised, if by fifteen counties be meant any considerable portion of the population. If it be simply meant that the forests and the soil were disfranchised, without reference to the people, it may be true. There may be territory enough there to make fifteen counties, and those counties may have legislative names; but when Mr. Walker is at pains to say, as he does, that some of them are the oldest counties, if the story is not contradicted in some way, the country will be led to the conclusion that by this declaration it is meant that one half the population has been disfranchised. I undertake to say, first from the poll-list, next from Mr. Stanton's declaration, and lastly from Mr. Walker's himself, that the statement is not true in that sense, and cannot be so. If Mr. Walker thought as he now states, and as he seems willing to have his friends here state upon his authority, that these people had been disfranchised, and that they were only seeking rights which belonged to them under the Constitution and laws, I want to know how he could ever find it in his heart to address to them such language as I shall now read? In addressing the Secretary of State, under date of July the 15th, 1857, he says:

"In order to send this communication immediately by mail, I must close by assuring you that the spirit of rebellion pervades the great mass of the Republican party of this Territory, instigated, as I entertain no doubt they are, by eastern societies, having in view results most disastrous to the Government and to the Union."

Sir, if Mr. Walker, writing on the 15th of July, 1857, to the Government whose commission he held, under whose authority he was acting, and to whom he was bound to make truthful and correct reports, had seen that these people had been disfranchised, that fifteen counties had been denied the right to participate in the election, and had seen, as he seems quite willing now to have us believe he did see, that they were struggling for rights which had been lawlessly and violently torn from them, how could he say to the President that they were in open rebellion against the Government? No, sir; he did not so understand it. He doubtless thought and understood as he wrote, and as he said, that the spirit of rebellion pervaded the entire mass of the Republican party in that Territory, that they were instigated by certain eastern societies, the Massachusetts Emigrant Aid Society and its affiliated societies elsewhere, and that the purpose was to break down the Government, and overthrow the Union. These were the grave charges brought at that day.

Let us go a step further, and hear him talk to the poor downtrodden free-State men of Kansas! Robert J. Walker talking to these people who, he now says, had been disfranchised, who had been denied, according to his present authority, all right to participate in the election; who had been tyrannized over, trampled upon, and treated worse than outlaws and outcasts, says, (I read from his proclamation of July 15, to the people of Lawrence:)

"You have, however, chosen to disregard the laws of Congress and of the territorial government created by it; and whilst professing to acknowledge a State government rejected by Congress, and which can therefore now exist only by a successful rebellion, and exact from all your officers the peridious and sacrilegious oath to support the so-called State constitution; yet you have, even in defiance of the so-called State Legislature which refused to grant you a charter, proceeded to create a local government of your own, based only upon insurrection and revolution. The very oath which you require from all your officers to support your so-called Topeka State constitution is violated in the very act of putting in operation a charter rejected even by them.

"A rebellion so iniquitous, and necessarily involving such awful consequences, has never before disgraced any age or country."

That is Robert J. Walker talking to these downtrodden people who had been disfranchised! Did he think they were disfranchised at that day? Mark you, he had been in the Territory then from the 27th of May to the 15th of July following. During all that time he had made no discovery that the rights of these people had been injured, or he could never have said to them: "a rebellion so iniquitous, and necessarily involving such awful consequences, has never before disgraced any age or country." Then again, in addressing the Secretary of State on the 20th of July, he says:

"I am no alarmist; but if the Lawrence rebellion is not put down, similar organizations, extending to counties as well as towns, will be carried into effect throughout the Territory, the object being to overthrow the territorial government and inaugurate the Topeka State government, even before the admission of Kansas as a State by Congress."

And he calls for troops, thinking nothing else will do. Now, one extract further. On the 27th of July, Governor Walker disposed of this whole complaint about border ruffians. In addressing the Secretary of State on that day, on his responsibility as Governor of the Territory, bound to give correct information, acting under the solemn obligations of his oath, he says:

"There is no longer any pretext for the suggestion that any portion of the people of Missouri intend to invade the ballot-box at any election in Kansas."

If all this be true, why did not the people go forward and vote? A full, free, fair opportunity was afforded to them to do so. They certainly were not to be intimidated, nor browbeaten, nor driven from the polls by the Missouri border ruffians, when the Governor of the Territory could assure the President, as he did, that there was no longer any pretext for saying that Missourians intended to invade the ballot-box or take any part at the election. Yet the spirit of rebellion was kept up in the Territory.

I come back to the convention. It was chosen; it assembled; it made a constitution. At this point we lose an ally who has stood by us from the beginning of the controversy. The Senators on the other side of the Chamber were never expected to go with us for the admission of Kansas, but the Senator from Illinois was expected to do so. He, it will be recollected, was the author of the bill; he it was who urged upon us the acceptance of the proposition to admit the State with or without slavery as her constitution might determine; he it was, of all other men, who was most bound to stand by that agreement, and never to abandon it until compelled to do so by some gross violation of it on our part. The Senator stood committed to the legality of the first Legislature, as I have shown you. He defended all its proceedings up to the calling of this convention. He told us but two days ago that, in calling the convention, the Legislature had not transcended its power. He insists that it would be more regular to get authority from Congress before the Legislature acted; but, if the Legislature choose to act without the authority of Congress, he admitted two days ago, clearly and distinctly, it had a right so to act. He admits that a refusal on the part of the convention to submit the whole constitution to the people does not invalidate it. He would prefer to have the whole constitution submitted to a popular vote; but he says it is not essential that it should be done.

This narrows the controversy, it seems to me, to a single point, and that this is: is the constitution, as it is now presented to us, the act of the people of the Territory of Kansas, ascertained in the mode prescribed by law? Is it a constitution made by the people at the time, at the place, and in the manner, prescribed by the written law? If it be so, then I think we shall have no difficulty in maintaining that it must be accepted, whether it tolerates or excludes slavery; and that it is but a resort to a technicality, not creditable to those who resort to it, to make complaints that a majority of the people of the Territory possibly did not vote in regard to it. If they did not, whose fault was it? Did it lie in the power of Congress to compel them to vote? Did it lie in the power of the Legislature to force them to the ballot-box? Could the President, or the Governor, or any other power known to the law, compel these people to go to the ballot-box and vote, whether they would or not? If I have shown you from the documents, as I think I have, that the law gave them the privilege of voting; that the Governor proclaimed to them that they had a full opportunity of voting; that he would use the military power at his disposal to secure them the right to vote; if all these guarantees were held out and they refused, is the constitution to be overturned? Are we to refuse to accept the State, in deference to the judgment of those pronounced by the Senator from Illinois to be rebels and traitors against the Government—those denounced by the Governor of the Territory as rebels and traitors, seeking to overthrow the Government and overturn the Union? Are we to refuse, in deference to the judgment of such men, to fulfill the solemn compact we have made, to admit the State, with or without slavery, as her constitution might prescribe?

I quite agree with the Senator from Illinois that the constitution must be the act of the people, or it is no constitution; but he and I have different modes of arriving at the will of the people. I maintain that when the day of election comes, and the ballot-box is open, and the people left free to go and vote or not as they please, those who vote carry the election, and not those who stay away and obstinately refuse to vote. The ballot-box has been kept open under the strongest guards. Every legal protection has been given by the President, by all his Governors, and by all who have spoken, that every man should vote who chose to vote; and yet these parties have obstinately stood out and refused to exercise the right guaranteed them by the law; sometimes, we are told, because they were intimidated; and then some more daring friend, a little ashamed of that sort of excuse, says they would not vote because the whole thing was a fraud from the beginning. I care not whether it was done for the one cause or the other, so long as the plain, stubborn fact stands out that there was no intent, no desire, expressed by them to exercise the franchise. Sir, we are falling upon strange times. An election is holden, the ballot-box is closed, and some man has got all the votes polled, but they do not constitute a majority of all the people of the district; and forthwith up starts some fellow, who says: "The election must go for nothing; you have not got a majority of all the voters, and therefore the election is void." That I understand to be substantially the ground taken by the Senator from Illinois; that because a majority were not polled affirmatively, therefore the election is not binding.

I believe the Senator is a native of Vermont, and I think he does great credit to his nativity; for certainly nobody short of a Vermonter ever would have made a discovery so notable as this. Why, sir, it is Yankee all over. See how easily you can dispose of any election according to this theory. All that you have to do is to ascertain that you are pretty certain to be beaten, and then tell your friends not to go into the election, and keep everybody else from voting that you can; and when the election is over, show that a majority of all the votes have not been polled, raise a cry, and have the whole election overturned. That sort of argument will not do. I have, I believe, two colleagues in the other House now who were chosen by minority votes; chosen, I am glad to know, because of their extraordinary popularity. Nobody ran against them. They got each, I suppose, two fifths of all the votes in their districts; nobody else got any votes at all; but according to these modern doctrines they are not elected; the three fifths who did not vote can call a mass meeting, overturn the old election, and have a new election to-morrow! This is what I understand this doctrine to amount to. No, sir; when the time came, and the place was pointed out for holding the election, and it was held in the manner prescribed by law, it was binding; and I care not whether one, or one thousand, or one hundred thousand votes were polled.

Why, sir, if an election were to be held in your district to-morrow, and but two of the fifteen thousand votes were cast, the election would be binding. It would not be in the power of the other fourteen thousand nine hundred and ninety-eight to overturn the election the next day. They allowed the time to pass when they could have expressed their will in the mode prescribed by law; and if they chose to let the favorite moment pass by unimproved, they could not afterwards take advantage of their own error, or wrong, or laches. That is all I claim with reference to Kansas. I simply claim that, at the time, at the place, and in the mode prescribed by law, the people of Kansas have expressed their opinion favorable to this constitution.

But we are told that the constitution is not binding on other grounds; it is said that some of the delegates disregarded the will of their constituents. I do not know how that may be; but I appeal to every man who has read the first horn-book of the law, if this is not true: that, as between you and other parties, you are bound by the act of your representative. We shall fall upon strange times here, if the fact of delegates, representatives, disregarding the will of their constituents, is to vitiate laws and constitutions. I mean to be entirely respectful; but it seems to me that in throwing my eye over this Chamber when it is full, it takes in more than one Senator who does not obey the will of his constituents. Am I to be told that the legislation of Congress is void because the will of our constituents has not been obeyed? If your acts are not invalid when you refuse or fail to carry out the will of your constituents, does not the same principle apply in Kansas? The delegate is responsible to his constituents, and to nobody else. The constituency has not complained. This complaint comes from a different quarter. It is said that General Calhoun and other delegates did not carry out the will of their constituents. Have you ever seen a complaint from any of those who voted for them, that their will had not been executed by them? Has anybody that voted for Calhoun and his associates ever complained that he was cheated—that they did not do what they promised to do? I want to know if it lies in the mouth of the enemy to complain that I do not properly reflect the will of my constituents?

I do not know what my friend from New York, who sits before me, [Mr. KING,] may have promised when he was elected. I dare say he promised to do something wrong: I think that is exceedingly probable. [Laughter.] Suppose he does not do it: have the Democratic members of the New York Legislature any business to complain? They were not cheated; they gave him no votes. If the Senator fulfills the wishes of his own friends; in other words, if, on party questions, they release him from party obligations, nobody else has a right to interpose and complain. I take the ground, and I stand on it, that my obligations on party issues are to the party who have elected me; and if they absolve me from the obligation, no one else has a right to bind me.

Then, sir, taking it on the ground that these men did violate their pledges, which I should undertake to controvert as a matter of fact, what does it amount to? Until it is shown that the men who elected them were deceived, and that they complain, I maintain that the complaint goes for nothing. Suppose a Senator comes here pledged to his party friends as a party man on a party measure to do a particular thing, and they afterwards change their minds, and say to him, "we would rather you would not do it, and he refuses it: have the enemy any business to complain? This was a party question; it was a question between the pro-slavery party on the one hand, and the free-State party on the other; the free-State men did not vote for Mr. Calhoun; they did not vote for his associates; they got their votes of the pro-slavery party, and were chosen; and whenever the pro-slavery party complain that they have violated their pledges to them, the complaint may be listened to; but it would be just as bad for me or my friends to complain if the anti-slavery party had not redeemed their pledges to their friends. I have nothing to do with their pledges, whether they redeem them or not.

Now, sir, I can tell you what I understand to be the facts, and that they are susceptible of proof I have no question. These men did pledge themselves to submit the whole constitution to the people. They did it with the hope of getting the whole population to come out and vote. The anti-slavery people declared that they would take no part in the election; they would have nothing to do with it; they would stay away from the polls. Then the friends of Mr. Calhoun and his associates held meetings, and absolved them from their obligation to fulfill that pledge. They said, and said rightly, "the pledge is to us; we do not want you to fulfill it; we do not ask you to fulfill it; we would rather you would not fulfill it." If they absolved them from the obligation, I maintain that nobody else had a right to complain.

The Senator from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] in addressing himself to this subject, some days ago, took one or two positions to which I beg leave to call attention. He made it a ground of marked objection to the Kansas constitution that it was repugnant, in many of its provisions, to a large portion of the people, and that yet, before they were allowed to vote in regard to it, they were required to take an oath that they would support it. This the Senator considered a monstrous outrage. Sir, it would have been a monstrous outrage if the test oath, as he calls it, had been applied to one party, and not to the other; but it was applied to every voter, whether he belonged to the free-State or to the slave-State organization; to the pro-slavery or the anti-slavery party. If anybody required him to do it, he must take an oath to support that constitution before he could exercise the right of voting for or against it. I do not think there was any great outrage in this. If there had been an oath that they should approve the constitution, there would have been a great outrage in that; but to support a constitution, and to approve it, are two different things. How often has the honorable Senator sworn to support the constitution of Michigan? Does he approve all that is in it? Are there not things in it which he would prefer to have otherwise? When we go to that desk, and swear to support the Constitution of the United States, do we swear that we approve it? If so, I never would have taken an oath to support it. There are many things in it which I do not approve, which I should be glad to see otherwise; but I am simply sworn, as a good, law-abiding citizen, that so long as it is the Constitution, I will support it, whether I believe it to be right or wrong.

These people, as I have shown before, were in open rebellion against the government of Kansas. Disguise the fact as you please, it still stands out at every point that they were in rebellion; and the convention, wisely I think, required them to support the constitution before they should have anything to do with putting it in operation. It was meant for rebels and traitors and for nobody else, and being meant for them it was right. What business has a man in open rebellion against the Government of his country, not meaning to obey its laws or support its constitution, to take part in its elections? If he will do so, ought you not to bind him by oaths, and by all the power that you can throw around him, to cease his rebellion and obey the laws? Even acting under the solemnity of an oath, these men would hardly be held within reasonable bounds or proper restraint. Without some such restraint, it would have been madness to submit the constitution to their hands.

Again, my honorable friend objects to that feature of the constitution which required the president of the convention to appoint the officers who were to hold the election. When people do not mean to be satisfied, they find fault with anything and with everything. What have been the great complaints in reference to Kansas elections? That the sheriffs would not do their duty, that they were partisan men. It is even said, now, that when they were required to take the census and keep the registry of votes, they did it so imperfectly that one half the people were disfranchised. Then the convention takes the matter out of the hands of the sheriffs and puts it in the hands of commissioners, and the Senator is not satisfied. What will satisfy him? I know the Senator from Michigan is too fair-minded to want anything unjust. I am sure he would not want ballot-box stuffers appointed on either side to hold the election; but it seems to me, that in view of all the complaints about the malfeasance and bad conduct in every way of the sheriffs, that it was wise and proper to put the election in the hands of new parties.

Again, the Senator says Kansas is to be admitted into the Union, and he likens the position to bring her in to carrying a convict with shackles upon his arms, and admitting him into the penitentiary. I am sure that the Senator could not well have studied that expression before he uttered it; he could not have reviewed the speech after he made it, or no such comparison would have been allowed to pass into the everlasting records of the country. What, sir, the introduction of a State into this Union, likened to the admission of a shackled convict into the penitentiary! I scarcely know in what language to comment on such a comparison.

Then my friend, (and I am sorry that I have not his speech before me, but I am sure I shall quote his idea correctly,) as though exceedingly anxious to get clear of the slavery question and put it away from him, says "these woolly-heads are eternally floating before my vision; turn which way I may, I am surrounded with these woolly-heads." All I have to say to that is, that if the Senator will let the woolly-heads alone, I will be responsible that the woolly-heads will let him alone. There is not a more amiable people in all the world, let me tell the Senator, than these same woolly-heads. They are as innocent and inoffensive as the sheep that graze upon his own pastures, and never disturb any one.

By the way, talking of the woolly-heads and the sheep, reminds me of a little story that I think will illustrate the Senator's position. I heard somewhere of a man who had been long suspected of not dealing very fairly with his neighbor's property. Away out in an unfrequented wood the owner of a flock came bluff upon him just as he had slaughtered a sheep, and it was lying at his feet. Said the owner of the animal, "I am glad to catch you at last. At last I have caught you in the very act." "Caught me in doing what?" "In the very act of killing my sheep." "Indeed," the man replied, "have a care; be a little cautious, sir, how you charge an innocent man with sheep stealing." "Why, you do not mean to say that you did not kill the sheep?" "Certainly not," was the reply. "I did kill the sheep, and I would kill anybody's sheep that would bite me as I am walking peaceably along the road." [Laughter.]

Now, sir, if the Senator will let our sheep alone, our woolly-heads alone, I dare say he will never be bitten by them while he is peaceably walking along the road, or in any unfrequented part of the country. Just let the negroes alone. If the Senator will take it kindly, I would advise him to attend to Michigan affairs, and let me attend to Mississippi matters; just get all your northern friends to attend to local matters which concern you, and let us down South attend to our own local affairs; and then let us jointly attend to the affairs of the whole country, and we shall get along finely. Our sheep will never bite you, our woolly-heads will never disturb you if you will only act on that principle.

Well, sir, I have got through the greater portion of what I intended to say on the points already alluded to; yet there are other matters connected with the discussion to which I feel that I ought to pay some attention.

Mr. TOOMBS. If the Senator will give way, I will move an adjournment.

Mr. BROWN. Oh, no; unless the Senate desires to adjourn. ["Adjourn."] I understood, when I rose, that there was some disposition to settle the question this evening. ["Oh, no."] Rather than weary the Senate, I indicated in the beginning a purpose not to say anything, but let the question be taken. If I have talked the Senate into the humor to take the vote now, I will stop. ["No, no."] If the Senate is not disposed to have the vote taken, I will go on.

Mr. SEWARD. Though I have no purpose of speaking myself, I am quite sure that it will be a very late hour before the question can be taken to-night; and I hope the Senate is not under any such pressure but that we can be allowed to digest what the honorable Senator has given us to-day, and come back and proceed to-morrow.

Mr. STUART. Will the Senator yield me the floor for an instant? I shall not undertake to reply to the Senator from Mississippi now, because I think it is very improper to put one Senator's speech into the speech of another. I only wish to say, that at the proper time, and on a proper occasion, I will pay my full respects to the Senator's criticism on my speech, anecdote and all.

Mr. IVERSON. If the Senator from Mississippi will yield the floor, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. IVERSON. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 3, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. E. KINGSFORD, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CONTUMACIOUS WITNESS.

Mr. STANTON. The House will recollect that an attachment was issued some days since for a witness who had been subpoenaed and had refused to appear before the select committee of which I am chairman. That witness is now in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and I desire to offer a resolution in relation to the subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had better have the witness brought to the bar of the House.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. The resolution of the gentleman from Ohio proposes to do that.

The SPEAKER. A warrant was issued to bring the witness here. The Sergeant-at-Arms was directed to bring the witness to the bar of the House, and that officer will now report.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House, and said:

Mr. Speaker, in obedience to the order of the House, I have now here J. D. Williamson, a witness whom I was directed to report at the bar of the House.

Mr. STANTON. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That J. D. Williamson, Esq., of the city of New York, now in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, under an attachment for contempt in refusing obedience to a summons requiring him to appear and testify before a committee of this House, be now arraigned at the bar of the House, and that the Speaker propound to him the following interrogatories:

1st. What excuse have you for not appearing before the select committee of this House, in pursuance of the summons served on you on the 27th ultimo?

2d. Are you now ready to appear before said committee, and answer such proper questions as shall be put to you by said committee?

And that said J. D. Williamson be required to answer said questions in writing and under oath.

Mr. LETCHER. Is the return of the Sergeant-at-Arms in writing?

The SPEAKER. The announcement that the witness is in custody was made verbally by the officer of the House, in conformity with the order of the House.

Mr. LETCHER. It seems to me that it ought to be in writing, so as to show the whole proceeding.

Mr. STANTON. I have consulted with all the members of the select committee but one, and this resolution meets their approval. I have followed the precedent set last session in the case of Colonel Chester. I understand that the witness desires further time to prepare his answers. I hope the resolution will be adopted; and then I will move that the witness have until one o'clock to-morrow to prepare his answers.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. STANTON. I now move that the witness be recommitted to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and have until one o'clock to-morrow to make his answers to the interrogatories to be propounded by the Chair.

Mr. HOUSTON. He may prefer to answer now.

Mr. STANTON. I ask that the witness be brought forward, and the interrogatories be propounded to him by the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House that the interrogatories shall be now propounded?

Mr. PHELPS. It seems to me that the proper course would be that the witness should answer in writing, and under oath, and not verbally.

Mr. STANTON. That is the order of the House. I propose that the interrogatories be now propounded to the witness; and that he have until to-morrow at one o'clock to prepare his answers in writing.

The SPEAKER. The resolution just adopted by the House requires the interrogatories to be answered in writing, and under oath.

Mr. PHELPS. That is right.

Mr. STANTON. I suppose there is no necessity of bringing the witness to the bar and having the questions propounded to him. The Clerk will furnish him with a copy of the resolution. I therefore move that he be recommitted to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and allowed until to-morrow to prepare his answers.

Mr. PHELPS. And that a copy of the resolution be furnished him.

Mr. HOUSTON. It may be that the witness would prefer to answer the interrogatories now, or at an earlier hour than the one named by the gentleman from Ohio; and I think that, being in custody, he ought to be allowed to answer at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. STANTON. I have consulted the witness, and he desires until to-morrow to prepare his answers.

Mr. BOCK. I would suggest to the gentleman that he move that the witness have until one o'clock to-morrow to prepare his answers, unless he desires to answer at an earlier hour.

Mr. STANTON. The witness has informed me that the time I have named will suit him.

Mr. FLORENCE. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that he modify his motion as suggested by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Bock], so as to allow the witness to elect whether he will answer now, or at some future time.

Mr. STANTON. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I have consulted the witness, and the time I have named suits him. I move the previous question.

Mr. FLORENCE. I have no objection; but we have had precedents in other cases—

Mr. CLINGMAN. Debate is not in order, the previous question having been called.

Mr. FLORENCE. In the case of Mr. Chester, that gentleman informed the House, through a member, that he would prefer to answer under oath.

The SPEAKER. So the gentleman from Ohio states. To-morrow, at one o'clock, is the time fixed for answering.

Mr. FLORENCE. It is to the case of Mr. Chester that I am referring.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation, the motion was agreed to.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER announced the business first in order to be the consideration of the President's message; the question being on the motion to refer it to the Committee on Territories, on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Grow] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. GOODE. I desire to ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill, of which previous notice has been given, to reimburse the corporation of Georgetown a sum of money which I think is justly due to it.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Is this bill reported from a committee?

Mr. GOODE. It is introduced merely for reference.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I object.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish to make an appeal to the House to postpone for one hour the question now before it, for the purpose of allowing the committees to present their reports. This will give us the benefit of the morning hour. After that the subject before the House can be resumed, and the debate continued. I hope there will be no objection to this.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I have no objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania; but I wish to say that if it is in order I shall move to lay aside the consideration of the President's message, and call up the case of which I gave notice yesterday—the contested-election case of Ohio. I yield to the solicitations of friends around me, who desire that this case shall be presented and considered at this time, although I am entirely willing that the gentleman from Pennsylvania shall succeed with the proposition which he has presented to the House. Still I wish to give notice now that I will make the motion in proper time.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The case mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois will come up in its proper place, after the committees shall have had an opportunity to report. It is a privileged question, which takes precedence of the matters now before the House. The gentleman can call it up just as well after the committees shall have reported as now.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I will, then, to test the sense of the House, move to postpone for one hour the consideration of the question that I have called up, so as to enable the committees to report. If the committees conclude their reports in less time I will call it up.

Mr. GROW. Will the gentleman modify his motion so as to let the committees be called through, provided the call does not consume more than two hours?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I will agree to anything that meets the approbation of the House. I have been spoken to by a large number of gentlemen to allow this to be done, and I will accord it as far as is in my power.

The SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House that the committees be called for reports, and that the call be continued for one hour?

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I object to that, unless all the committees be called through. In that case I will not object.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Let the proposition be so modified.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Do I understand the gentleman from Michigan to object?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood him as objecting unless conditions were annexed which the Chair has no right to annex.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Then I desire to call up the Ohio contested-election case.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Illinois moves to postpone the further consideration of the matter now before the House for one hour, the first business in order will be the call of committees for reports.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Then I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced that reports were in order from the Committee of Elections.

Mr. COBB. Do I understand the Speaker to commence the call again at the head of the list?

I think the Speaker was at a different place when the committees were last called.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] will recollect that the last call was on Friday. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSHALL] was proposing then to make a report, because on that day his committee had special preference.

Mr. COBB. Then the Chair must commence the call where it was last left off.

The SPEAKER. The Chair commences the call now at the head of the list, the call having been completed on the last occasion.

It was so ordered.

NATHANIEL RIDDICK.

Mr. CURRY also, from the same committee, made an adverse report in the case of Nathaniel Riddick, administrator of Richard Taylor; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN K. TEMPLE.

Mr. SANDIDGE, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back Senate bill (No. 38) for the relief of John K. Temple, of Louisiana; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

PIERRE GIGNON.

Mr. SANDIDGE also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Pierre Gignon, of Natchitoches, Louisiana; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

JOHN HUERTAS.

Mr. SANDIDGE. I am instructed by the Committee on Private Land Claims to report a bill to authorize the claimants in the right of John Huertas to enter certain lands in Florida. As I have not troubled the House, I will take the liberty of saying, that this being a case of great hardship, where the rights of the parties have been adjudicated by the Supreme Court of the United States, and where the rights of the parties will be jeopardized unless relief is soon granted, I desire that the bill be put upon its passage.

Mr. SEWARD. I object to debate, and I move that the bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report be printed.

Mr. SANDIDGE. I hope the report will be read, and then I think the bill will be passed without objection.

Mr. RITCHIE objected.

Mr. SANDIDGE. I withdraw the motion, if there is objection to it.

The bill was then read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

CARONDELET.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 133) for the relief of the city of Carondelet; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE DISCHARGED.

Mr. BISHOP, from the Committee on Manufactures, reported back the following memorials, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that they be laid upon the table:

The memorial of citizens of Lynchburg, Virginia, asking for the passage of a law to punish factors and consignees for the misapplication of funds; and

The memorial of citizens of Virginia, asking the passage of a law making penal the counterfeiting of brands for the manufacture of tobacco.

Also, the proceedings of tobacco manufacturers held in the city of Richmond, on the 3d of December, 1857.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIAN AFFAIRS IN OREGON, ETC.

Mr. GREENWOOD, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to furnish to this House all correspondence and documents, if not incompatible with the public interest, relating to Indian affairs in Oregon and Washington Territories, received by the Department of the Interior since March 4, 1837, not already transmitted; and also all papers and correspondence relative to the official conduct of Anson Dodd, late superintendent of Indian affairs in Oregon Territory, not heretofore transmitted.

HEIRS OF MARY JAMISON.

Mr. BURROUGHS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Mary Jamison, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WHITEMARSH B. SEABROOK AND OTHERS.

Mr. QUITMAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back House bill (No. 81) to amend an act for the relief of Whitemarsh B. Seabrook and others.

Mr. QUITMAN. I desire to ask the immediate consideration of that bill. I have but a few words of explanation to make. At the last session of Congress a bill was passed authorizing payments to be made to Whitemarsh B. Seabrook and certain others for some expenses which they had incurred in the last war. That bill directed that these payments should be made to the heirs of the parties, and this bill only proposes to amend that bill by changing the word "heirs" to "executors and administrators." The House will see that this is necessary in order to preserve the rights of creditors as well as to distribute the funds in the proper channels. I hope the bill will be passed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

HEIRS OF JOHN J. BULON, JR.

Mr. BUFFINTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of John J. Bulon, jr., deceased; which was read a first and second time, and referred to a Committee of the Whole House; and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES B. WOOD.

On motion of Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of James B. Wood praying to be paid for mules and oxen captured from him in New Mexico by Indians, and that the same be referred to the Committee of Claims.

WILLIAM HUTCHINSON.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of William Hutchinson; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House; and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

THOMAS PHENIX, JR.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Thomas Phenix, jr., late a paymaster's clerk in the service of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House; and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BAYLEY'S BATTALION.

Mr. CURTIS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, made an adverse report on the petition of officers and soldiers of Major Bayley's battalion for service in the Black Hawk war; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

RETIRED NAVAL OFFICERS.

Mr. SEWARD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, Senate resolution (No. 3) to extend and define the authority of the President under the act approved January 16, 1857, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy in respect to the dropped and retired naval officers,'" which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEWARD. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in order that the House may have control of the resolution hereafter.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table. I object to giving this resolution an unfair advantage over other bills which have been referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SEWARD. I have made the motion to reconsider with a view to accommodate the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, who desires to debate the resolution. The committee were not unanimous in their report. The resolution is an important one, and I desired, as the chairman of the Naval Committee is not present, to place it in such a position that the House can have control of it, and he may give it such direction hereafter as he may think proper, by agreement with the committee. I hope, therefore, that the gentleman from Alabama will withdraw his motion.

Mr. HOUSTON. I could not hear the gentleman's explanation. If his object is to keep the resolution in such a position that the Committee on Naval Affairs may take its own action upon it hereafter, I will not insist on my motion.

Mr. SEWARD. That is my object.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have no objection to that. My objection is to giving this resolution preference over other matters which are equally meritorious.

Mr. SEWARD. I do not desire that.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I withdraw my motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The motion to reconsider was entered upon the Journal.

THOMAS AP CATESBY JONES.

Mr. HAWKINS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, presented an adverse report on the memorial of Commodore Thomas Ap Catesby Jones, and asked that the committee be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that it be laid on the table.

It was so ordered.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would ask the gentleman from Florida if there is a written report accompanying those papers?

Mr. HAWKINS. There is not. If it was necessary, a report would have been made; but the committee thought that, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, it was not necessary to make a report unless asked for. The committee simply asks to be discharged from its further consideration.

Mr. HOUSTON. My object in asking the gentleman is this: cases of the character of this one just returned to the House have been hanging before the committees of the House, from year to year, for probably a quarter of a century. This one is probably not quite so old. It seems to me that committees would advance the interests of the country and the business of the House, and would reduce the labors of committees, if they would present reports in such cases.

EXTRA PAY TO SEAMEN.

Mr. BOCK, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, presented an adverse report on the petition of seamen of the Gulf squadron asking for extra pay; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN G. WILKINSON.

Mr. BOCK, from the same committee, also presented an adverse report in the case of John G. Wilkinson; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

MARINE HOSPITAL AT ALBANY.

On motion of Mr. BOCK, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of a petition of citizens of New York engaged or interested in the navigation of the Hudson river for the establishment of a marine hospital in the city of Albany; and that the same be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ARREST OF WILLIAM WALKER.

Mr. BOCK. I am instructed by a majority of the Committee on Naval Affairs to report to the House a joint resolution, expressive of the opinion of the Congress of the United States in relation to the arrest of General William Walker by Hiram Paulding, a captain of the United States Navy, and to ask that the joint resolution and report be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

I also ask that my friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] shall have an opportunity to put in a minority report. I presume that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SEWARD] will also have a minority report to present. There is a report to accompany this joint resolution, but I have not it with me at this moment.

The joint resolution expressive of the opinion of the Congress of the United States, in relation to the arrest of General William Walker by Hiram Paulding, a captain of the United States Navy, was read a first and second time.

Mr. KELSEY. I ask that the resolution be read in full.

The resolution was reported, as follows:

Resolved, That the act of Hiram Paulding, a captain of the United States Navy, in arresting General William Walker, was not authorized by the instructions which had been given him from the Navy Department.

Resolved, That while we have no reason to believe that the said Paulding acted from any improper motives or intention, yet we regard the act in question as a grave error, and deserving, for the reason already given, the disapproval of the American Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I am instructed by a minority of the Committee on Naval Affairs to submit a minority report, and to offer a substitute for the resolutions just read. I ask that the substitute be read, and that the report of the minority take the same direction as that of the majority.

The SPEAKER. The motion to commit will have to be modified before the substitute is received.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understood the gentleman to modify it.

The substitute was reported, as follows:

Resolved, That Commodore Hiram Paulding, in arresting William Walker and his associates, and returning them to the jurisdiction of the United States, acted within the spirit of his orders, and deserves the approbation of his country.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I think the question should be taken now.

The SPEAKER. The motion submitted by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOCK] is, that the resolutions be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PHELPS. I trust that course will be pursued, so that the other committees may be called to-day.

Mr. SEWARD. While I approve of the resolutions presented by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I had some views of my own which the committee consented I might present. My resolutions are at my room; and I ask leave to present them to-morrow, and that they be committed, with the other papers, as a minority report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks the privilege of filing a minority report and having it printed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I have no objection to the gentleman making his report, but I move to lay all the resolutions on the table; and on that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was not agreed to.

The motion to refer and print was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I am instructed by a majority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to present a report on that part of the President's message having reference to the seizure of Walker. There are some members of the committee who entertain different views, and they will take the opportunity of presenting them in the shape of resolutions, or in some other shape. What I desire is, that this report be printed and its consideration postponed till some future day.

Mr. RITCHIE. I have a resolution which I shall offer as a substitute for those reported by the majority of the committee. But I am not prepared to submit it now.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will then move that the resolutions be printed, and that they be postponed until Tuesday next. If that course is agreeable to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I hope there will be no objection to it.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I object to that. I think we have more important subjects to talk about than filibustering.

Mr. LETCHER. Does that report conclude with a resolution?

Mr. CLINGMAN. It does.

Mr. LETCHER. Let the resolution be read.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The report is a very short one, and will require but two or three minutes to read it. If there be no objection I will read the report and resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. As the other report, upon substantially the same subject, was not read, I shall object to the reading of this. If both can be read, I shall have no objection.

Mr. HOPKINS. Do I understand that this comes before the House as a report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. HOPKINS. I was not aware that that committee had authorized any report to be made upon that subject. My understanding was, that the subject had been postponed to some future day.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I desire to state that at the last meeting of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, it was agreed that no report should be made on the subject until another meeting was held. Since that time, however, I understand there has been a meeting of a majority of the committee, and that the chairman was authorized to make the report which has been now presented.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The Committee on Foreign Affairs, at the instance of my friend from Mississippi [Mr. BARKSDALE], agreed to have the subject postponed. The gentleman from Mississippi, however, and other members of the committee, desired, afterwards, that a report should be submitted. I saw all the members of the committee except, perhaps, the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HOPKINS.] The report was ordered to be made at the instance of the gentleman from Mississippi, and with the consent of the other members of the committee whom I saw informally on the subject. They stated that it was satisfactory to them, if no action was contemplated on it to-day.

Mr. BARKSDALE. It is very true that this morning I authorized, as far as I was concerned, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to make that report; with the understanding, however, that the majority of the committee were willing it should be made. I withdraw whatever objection I might have had to the report. But, sir, I wish to state further, that I did not concur in that report, either in its reasoning or the conclusions to which it arrives; and I shall avail myself of some early opportunity to give to the House my opinions in reference to this whole question.

I hope the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina will be agreed to, and that the further consideration of this question will be postponed until Tuesday next. This report, sir, involves considerations of the gravest importance; and it does seem to me that they ought not to be passed over lightly by this House. I think they ought to be thoroughly investigated.

Mr. KELSEY. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. BARKSDALE. One word more. I ask the House to postpone the further consideration of this report until Tuesday next.

Mr. GROESBECK. I should like to say one word in reference to this matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if the report is regularly before the House, it is open to debate. The Chair desires, however, to call the attention of the House to this paragraph in Jefferson's Manual:

"A committee meet when and where they please, if the House has not ordered a time and place for them; but they can only act when together, and not by separate consultation and consent—nothing being the report of the committee but what has been agreed to in committee actually assembled."

Mr. CLINGMAN. If any member of the committee prefers it, I will ask leave to withdraw the report.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw it.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I withdraw it.

OLIVER P. HOVEY.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER, from the Committee on Territories, reported a bill for the relief of Oliver P. Hovey; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. CLEMENS, leave was granted ed to withdraw from the files of the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, the papers in the case of the heirs of Colonel Benjamin Wilson, deceased, of Harrison county, Virginia, for the purpose of having them referred in the Senate.

JOHN CRININ.

Mr. JEWETT, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made an adverse report in the case of John Crinin, a soldier in the Rogue River war; which was laid on the table, the report ordered to be printed, and the committee discharged from the further consideration thereof.

HENRY E. REAP.

Mr. JEWETT, from the same committee, reported a bill to increase the pension of Henry E. Reap, of the State of Kentucky, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

CLERK TO A COMMITTEE.

Mr. JEWETT also, from the same committee, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions employ a suitable clerk, for the present session of Congress, at four dollars a day.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. FLORENCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AUGUSTUS J. COON.

Mr. ROBBINS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Augustus J. Coon; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

PENSIONS TO OFFICERS AND SOLDIERS.

Mr. SAVAGE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill granting pensions to the officers and soldiers of the war with Great Britain of 1812, and those engaged in the Indian wars during that period.

Mr. SAVAGE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and that its further consideration be postponed until the 24th day of February.

Mr. PHELPS. I must object to the motion to postpone the consideration of this bill; for the effect of it will be to consume the morning hour whenever it comes up, and thereby prevent other committees from reporting. I move that it be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and that the bill and report be printed.

Mr. SAVAGE. My motion has precedence.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It would be right for the House to be aware that this is one of the most important propositions that will be presented for our consideration during the present session of Congress. A similar bill was before the last Congress, introduced by my colleague, who now reports this bill, and it was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I made inquiry at the Pension Office as to what would be the probable amount which would be required to pay the pensioners provided for in this bill.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order. A discussion of the merits of a bill is not in order upon a motion to postpone.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is there not a motion pending to commit and print?

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Tennessee was to recommit and postpone.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Did not he move to print?

The SPEAKER. There was no such motion heard by the Chair.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Which takes precedence?

The SPEAKER. The motion to postpone.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I understood the gentleman from Tennessee to move to recommit, and then to postpone.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Well, I had but one word more to say, and that is that the answer of the Department was that this bill would require $10,000,000 a year.

Mr. SAVAGE. I am ready to go into the merits of this bill at any time; but I do not desire to have the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] prejudice it before I can be heard. I want to assure my colleague and the House that I wish to bring this bill fairly before the country, and that my object is to have the most unlimited range of debate, and to subject the bill to every amendment which friend or foe may propose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would remark that it is in order for the gentleman to state reasons why the bill should or should not be postponed. The pending motion does not open the merits of the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That was all that I was doing when I was ruled out of order; and I think, if that question is debatable, I have the floor.

Mr. SAVAGE. I should much prefer that this bill should be postponed by the House, and that I should not be called upon at the present time to give the various reasons why this bill should become the law of the land.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee cannot, upon a motion to postpone, go into a discussion of the merits of the question. He must confine himself to showing why it should or should not be postponed.

Mr. SAVAGE. Then it will be very difficult for me to say anything in the present state of the question. I did not come here prepared to discuss the bill, yet I am not unprepared to enter into its discussion. The bill, I know, has a good many friends here, and I wish to enlist their attention in its behalf. I have the utmost confidence that, when the fullest intelligence is had upon this question, the views of the Invalid Pension Committee, by which this question has been examined, will be sustained, and the bill become the law of the land.

This is, as my colleague [Mr. JONES] intimates, the most important bill, in my opinion, that will be brought before the present Congress, because it looks, as I think, to the continuation of a great policy which has been followed from the foundation of the Government, but which, unless continued by the means proposed by this bill, will cease to have its influence upon the nation; and this discontinuance will bring along with it evils forever to be dreaded. This bill presents briefly the question of the military organization for this country in all time to come.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot discuss the merits of the bill.

Mr. SAVAGE. I will confine myself to the question, and I will thank the Speaker, or any member, to call me back if I wander away from it, because it is not my object to violate the rules. I am one of those men who profess to be law-abiding, and not to be governed by any higher law particularly, but by laws which have been enacted by man. I submit to all laws that are rightfully enacted, and it is my object and my wish to obey the rules of this House. In the efforts I intend to make, and expect to make, as long as I have the honor of a seat upon this floor, to accomplish the great work I have undertaken, of passing this bill, I do not intend to resort to any trick or device to force it upon the House or upon the country.

Mr. SEWARD. I must call the gentleman from Tennessee to order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia raises the question of order, that the gentleman from Tennessee is not confining himself to the legitimate points of debate.

Mr. SAVAGE. I think I am certainly showing reasons why there is a great necessity for the postponement of the further consideration of this bill.

Mr. SEWARD. I would inquire if the rules do not require that this bill, which appropriates money, shall first be considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will determine the rule upon that point when the question arises.

Mr. SAVAGE. Am I called to order, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia insists that the rule shall be enforced, and that the gentleman shall be restricted, in his remarks, to assigning reasons why the bill should be postponed.

Mr. SAVAGE. I am assigning such reasons, and I hope the gentleman will show that I am not.

Mr. REILLY. I would inquire what the "higher law" has to do with the postponement of this bill? I object to everything out of order. There are other committees waiting to report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes that the gentleman from Tennessee will confine himself strictly to the pending question.

Mr. SAVAGE. I hope the Chair will specify in what respect I am out of order. The gentleman from Georgia calls me to order, but makes no specification. I certainly cannot acknowledge that I have offended against the rules of the House. I was going on to assign, in my way, what reasons I could why the bill should be postponed. I was coming to a very substantial one, and it is this: The friends of the bill did not know until this morning that the bill was coming up. This same question is now under discussion before the Committee on Military Affairs, and it is my object to await the action of that committee which has been delayed by other important matters of legislation.

My object, then, Mr. Speaker, is to postpone this question to a day certain, so that, if there is any merit in the bill, those who feel an interest in it and wish to see it pass may have a fair opportunity to sustain it on the one side, whilst those who are opposed to it may have an opportunity to defeat it on the other. I want nothing but a fair, generous, and manly battle; and if the measure fails, why, its friends must submit. I do not wish to detain the House with a speech, restricted and narrowed down as I am, and prevented from discussing the merits of the bill.

Mr. QUITMAN. Mr. Speaker, I hope that the House will not now postpone this measure to a day certain. The subject is before the Committee on Military Affairs, and much of the time of that committee has been devoted to the investigation of the question. I am not prepared, until a report upon the subject comes in from the Committee on Military Affairs, in which it is being elaborately discussed, to postpone the bill to a day certain, or to fix a day for its consideration. Let it take the same course as other bills; and when the report of the Committee on Military Affairs comes in, we may then be prepared to appoint a time for its consideration.

Mr. READY. As a friend of this bill, I hope that the motion to postpone will prevail, for the reason that I do not consider that the House is in a state of mind at the present time to consider so important a measure as this is; and for the further reason, that I believe there is a lack of information, which will have an important bearing upon the provisions of the bill. The peculiar financial condition of the country has been such that, in my judgment, it must necessarily have produced a fear that the passage of such a measure as this would impose, at the present time, too heavy a burden upon the Treasury. I think there are indications that this financial crisis is rapidly passing away; and the objections to the passage of the bill on that account will have ceased to exist in a very short period; probably by the time the House shall have had an opportunity to examine the provisions of the bill, and determine its merits in all its different bearings. I therefore hope the motion of my colleague will prevail.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. What is the exact question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The motion to postpone.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Well, is there not also a motion pending to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. None.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Well, is it not competent to show why the bill should be committed rather than postponed?

The SPEAKER. Any reasons the gentleman can assign why the bill should not be postponed, the Chair thinks would be entirely in order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Well, sir, I will endeavor to confine myself to that point in the very few remarks which I desire to submit. The reason why I think the bill should not be postponed, is that it is one of very great importance and magnitude—one which proposes, as I am informed, to take the sum of $10,000,000 annually from the Treasury of the United States; and the effect of postponing it to a day certain, and keeping it before the House, will be to prevent a fair discussion of it, and deprive members of the opportunities to amend it which are afforded in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, but from which we should be precluded in this House by the demand for the previous question. For this reason, if for no other, in my opinion, a bill of this importance and magnitude should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where we can have the fullest and freest investigation of it. If it is right, and a majority of the House are of that opinion, they will pass it when they have perfected it. The only reason why I prefer that it should be committed rather than postponed, is that it may have that examination which will enable every gentleman to make up his mind intelligently upon this important question.

Mr. BURNETT. I do not agree in the views expressed by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] and particularly not for the reasons which he has given. I understand the gentleman from Tennessee who reports this bill [Mr. SAVAGE] to say that it is not his object to prevent a full, fair, and rigid investigation of the merits of the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Permit me one word of explanation. I did not refer to the object of my colleague, but I stated what would be the effect of his motion; whenever a majority here think proper, they can call the previous question, and cut off all further discussion or propositions to amend.

Mr. BURNETT. I do not know that I am in favor of the bill as reported by the gentleman, [Mr. SAVAGE,] or that it will receive my vote. Nevertheless I am for giving a pension to the soldiers of the war of 1812. These men, as was remarked by some gentleman, are fast passing away; and if we intend to do anything for them to reward their services, we must do it quickly. Now, is the effect of postponement that which the gentleman [Mr. JONES] says it is? Not at all. The gentleman who reports the bill, and who seems to have it in charge, [Mr. SAVAGE,] says that he will not, by any action of his, ask the House to prevent a full investigation of the merits of the bill. We want to have the bill in a position where this Congress can act upon it. We desire that the House shall come to a vote upon it, and that the country shall know whether or not it is the intention of the House to pass the bill in some form, giving pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812.

Now, as to the amount of $10,000,000 that it is said this bill will take from the Treasury. I do not know whether it will take ten or twenty millions. The amount is not a question that I have investigated; but I am for doing justice to those men who have rendered service to their country, by giving them in their old age some bonus. Yes, sir; I want to at least do them justice. I am for putting this bill in a shape that will allow the House to do that thing. I am unwilling to commit it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where it will never be heard of. I prefer to keep it before the House, in order that, when it shall have received the investigation due to a bill of its magnitude, we may come to a vote upon it, and either pass or reject it.

Mr. COLFAX. The very fact stated by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] that this bill is a bill of importance, requires, as it seems to me, that we should keep it within our control, as is proposed by the gentleman who reported it, [Mr. SAVAGE;] that we should not send it to that "tomb of the Capulets"—the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—where it will be overslaughed, as it was in the last session, by political discussions, by appropriation bills, which take precedence there over every other subject, and thus, perhaps, prevent a test vote being taken on it through the whole Congress.

I believe that if the people of the United States were to be consulted, you would find that public opinion is almost undivided on this matter, and that the great masses of the people would say that it is more patriotic as well as more beneficial to make an appropriation of the public funds for such a purpose than to spend them by the million, as has been done, for water-works for this city, and in reckless expenditures all over the land.

This is a debt of individual justice and of national honor. All of those men who were in the second wave of American independence are now in the evening of their days and in the decline of their lives; and the small pittance proposed by this bill to be given to them would assist at least in smoothing their passage to the grave.

For these reasons, and for the fact that I do not wish to see the bill overslaughed by the appropriation bills, which are always certain to pass, from the many interests involved in them, even if they were postponed till the last week of the session; and because it is due to the numerous petitioners for a bill of this character, and to the persons specially interested in its passage, that it should be decided, in the affirmative or negative, I wish to see a debate had upon its merits, and a vote upon its merits on the yeas and nays. I hope, therefore, that the bill may be kept within the control of the House, and that the motion to postpone it to a specific day will be agreed to.

Mr. WARREN took the floor.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I rise to a question of order. I believe the hour assigned for the call of committees has expired.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Then I call for the regular order.

Mr. SAVAGE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection till this question be disposed of.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I think that the quickest way to dispose of this matter is to call up the regular business.

Mr. SAVAGE. I move to reconsider my motion to postpone.

The SPEAKER. There has been no vote taken. The bill will come up the first thing in order when the committees are called again; and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WARREN] will be entitled to the floor.

OHIO CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the matter for the consideration of the House at this time is the report of the Committee of Elections on the application of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] asking for leave to take supplemental testimony in his case.

Mr. BOCOCK. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield me the floor to make a motion which ought to precede this, and which will take but a few moments? A resolution was submitted the other day by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] to allow the contestant in this case to occupy a seat on the floor during the pendency of this matter. I moved to reconsider it, so that the resolution is not now in effect. I wish to dispose of the motion to reconsider.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I give way for that purpose.

Mr. BOCOCK. I wish to say, in regard to this, that at the time the resolution was submitted by the gentleman from Georgia, it struck me that it was unusual. I was aware that, in cases of contested elections, the right had been frequently yielded to the contestant to appear at the bar of the House and argue the merits of the contest. Contestants had been allowed to make speeches on the issue of the contest itself. It struck me, however, that it was an unusual thing to allow a contestant a seat on the floor for the purpose of debating matters that might arise in the progress of the case. The gentleman from Georgia stated, in answer to a question, that it was the usual resolution. I was perfectly satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Georgia considered it the usual resolution. I desired time, however, to investigate this matter, and to see whether it was the usual resolution; and I therefore made the motion to reconsider. Since that time I have investigated the matter very fully, and I have found a large number of cases, extending through many years of the history of the American Congress, in which nearly similar, or precisely similar, resolutions were adopted.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that if that had not been the case, if this had been the first time that such a resolution had been submitted, if this practice was now to be inaugurated, I, for one, would be opposed to it. I need not give my reasons. I find, however, that it has been the practice of the country for years; and I find this, further, that no such resolution has been submitted at any time and not passed. Whenever the privilege has been asked for the contesting member to have a seat on the floor for the purpose of discussing these matters, that privilege has been allowed. While I have been unwilling, therefore, to yield to the contestant in this case any unusual privilege, I am, at the same time, unwilling to deny, now and for the first time, the contestant any privilege which has been heretofore uniformly granted when asked for. I therefore move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to ask my friend from Virginia [Mr. BOCOCK] a question. I agree with him very fully in the views which he has submitted in reference to the practice of the House on previous occasions. But I desire him to state how long it is since that practice has been departed from? How long is it since a resolution of this sort was adopted by this House, and these privileges granted to a person contesting the seat of a sitting member? And I would ask, too, whether this does not amount to the inauguration of a new policy, as far as our action is concerned?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I stated the other day, in reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MORGAN,] that this resolution was in accordance with the practice of the House. I have an abundance of authorities in support of that position, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOCOCK] was right in saying that the privilege has never been denied by the House. It was said by Mr. Macon, in one of the first contested-election cases in the House of Representatives, that it was a matter of right upon the part of the contestant, and that there was no necessity for the House to grant the privilege. The first time a resolution was offered in the House for that purpose was in 1811.

Mr. HOUSTON. The question I propounded to the gentleman from Virginia was, how long the practice, which it is proposed now to revive, has been discontinued? I do not understand that it has been the practice within the last few years.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I do not know of any case where it has been departed from.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have not examined the matter myself, but I do not remember of any case since I have been in Congress, where a contestant has ever been allowed to come on the floor and participate in the general debate upon all incidental questions growing out of the contested election. I understand that contestants have, in all cases, been allowed to come upon the floor and make a speech directly upon the merits of the case. I understand the gentleman from Virginia to state that this has been the practice for perhaps the last quarter of a century.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. I do not see the propriety of continuing this debate upon this matter. The gentleman from Virginia moves to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; and the motion is not debatable.

Mr. STANTON. I desire to understand the effect of this resolution. We on this side of the House understand it to give the contestant in this case the right to be present on the floor of the House and speak to the merits of the question, but not to speak upon any incidental question that may arise touching the contest.

Mr. BOCOCK. The gentleman, I think, is mistaken.

Mr. STANTON. I ask that the resolution may be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Clement L. Vallandigham have leave to occupy a seat upon the floor of the House, pending the discussion of the report of the Committee of Elections upon the case of his contest for the seat now occupied by Lewis D. Campbell, of the third congressional district in the State of Ohio, and that he have leave to speak to the merits of said contest, and the report thereon.

Mr. STANTON. Now, sir, I understand that gives him the right to speak to the merits of the resolution, and not upon incidental questions.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. There is no misapprehension at all. It allows the contestant to speak upon the merits of his case, upon any issue, or point, or question, as it may arise, whether it be upon the final or any intermediate vote. And, sir, I state further, that the resolution is almost verbatim with the one which I now send to the Clerk's desk. And I state that it is almost identically the same as that which has been adopted in every contested election since 1811. Whether the contestants have availed themselves of the right to speak on incidental questions in every case within the last few years, I do not know. But, sir, the intention was to give them the right to speak upon every material question growing out of the contests.

Mr. STANTON. I should be very glad to hear the resolution read to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. Is this debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The Chair understands the gentleman from Virginia to have moved that the motion to reconsider lie on the table.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I did make that motion; but if there be no objection, I would like to have the proposition in the case of Newton, in the Virginia contested election of 1834, read.

Mr. STANTON. It is perhaps proper, if the House will allow me, to state, that in the objection I have made I have acted without consultation with the sitting member. He will interpose no objection to the contestant having any privilege of debate before the House. I now ask that the case alluded to by the gentleman from Georgia may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Ordered, That Rollin C. Mallary have leave to occupy a seat on the floor of this House pending the discussion of the report of the Committee of Elections upon his petition; and that he have leave to speak to the merits of the petition, and the report thereon."

Mr. STANTON. I should like to know if any gentleman can bring any instance in which the contestant has been allowed to speak upon incidental questions?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I have a number of them.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I object to further debate.

The motion to reconsider was then laid on the table.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I now call up again the report of the Committee of Elections upon the question of granting Mr. CAMPBELL, the sitting member, time to take further testimony.

The report was thereupon taken up for consideration.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The question immediately before the House, Mr. Speaker, is the application of the sitting member of the third congressional district of the State of Ohio, for leave to take supplemental testimony. The law of 1851 provides that, in cases of this character, the time for taking testimony shall be limited to sixty days, and that no testimony shall be taken after sixty days from the day on which the answer of the returned member is served on the contestant.

The sitting member presents some reasons why the rule should not be applied in his case; and as the same section of the act of 1851 provides that the House may grant a further extension of time for reasons shown, he applies to the House, through the Committee of Elections, for that extension. The committee, after hearing the application of the sitting member, and hearing, also, the argument in resistance to that application made by the contestant, instructed me to report a resolution that it was inexpedient to extend the time for taking testimony in this case. With this report, sanctioned by the majority of the committee, was presented also a report from a minority of the committee, differing with the majority in the conclusion at which they arrived.

The report sets forth very succinctly the reasons upon which the sitting member bases his application for leave for further time. They seem to be of a twofold character.

First, the sitting member alleges that during most of the time covered by the sixty days, in which by law he should have taken his testimony, he was a member of the House, engaged in the discharge of arduous and responsible duties connected with a committee of the House; and it was, from that cause, impossible for him to give his personal attention to the taking of that testimony necessary to defend him in his right to a seat in this House. He also, as another reason, sets forth that the contestant occupied all the time of the sixty days in taking testimony in his own behalf, thus excluding the sitting member from any right to occupy any portion of that time in taking testimony in defense.

I shall not go over the whole ground of the reasons which governed the committee in coming to the conclusion which they have arrived at; but will briefly state to the House that the committee were of opinion that it is not an adequate reason for the extension of time that the sitting member was a member of the last Congress. The act of 1851 is not intended to apply to one man and not to apply to another. It is intended to be general in its application, and to meet all cases alike. In fact, if it were not to apply to cases where members of Congress are interested, any member of Congress, where the election occurs prior to the termination of the session of Congress, could claim the advantage of the extension of time, and exemption from the effect of the law. Or if the election immediately preceded the assembling of Congress, his term of service under the election would commence, and he would again claim exemption from the operation of the law, and thus the law would apply to only a small portion of contested-election cases. It cannot, therefore, it seems to me, with any good reason, be claimed that for that reason a member of Congress should be exempt from the operation of the law.

The other reason urged by the sitting member why this time should be extended was, that the contestant, in his notice served upon him, covered the period of sixty days provided by the law; that the contestant gave notice of his intention to take testimony during that whole period; and that he, the sitting member, in consequence thereof, was unable to take testimony on account of the time being preoccupied by the contestant.

Upon this point the committee were of opinion, and I think with good reason, that the law contemplated that either party may go on and take testimony at the same time that it is being taken by the other party. While it limits the taking of testimony by either party at one place alone, it allows each party, by the fair terms of its construction, to go forward and take testimony in his own behalf. If this construction is correct, then it is no good reason for the extension of time, that the contestant covered the whole period with the notices in his own behalf.

Mr. STANTON. I wish to ask the gentleman a question just at this point. I wish to know whether the contestant did not claim, pending the sixty days, the other construction? that is, that he was not bound by notices given at the time covered by his own notices; and whether he did not refuse to recognize the validity of them?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I understand that the sitting member alleges that the contestant did so claim; but I will say that, with what either party claimed, we have nothing to do. We are construing a law of Congress.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the gentleman from Illinois whether the contestant, in his answer before the committee, did not so contend?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I concede that it is stated that the contestant did tell the sitting member that he ought to be aware it was necessary that the testimony should be closed in sixty days. That is the very reason why the sitting member should go forward and take the testimony within the sixty days. So far from its being a reason in support of his not taking the testimony, it was a direct notice to him that his time was limited to sixty days, and that he should be vigilant in watching his rights.

I have endeavored to show the two reasons upon which the sitting member claims this extension of time. I think there were sufficient reasons to govern the committee in coming to the conclusion to which they have arrived, and they submit their decision to the decision of the House.

I may as well say, if there are any gentlemen who desire to discuss this question, as it is somewhat in the nature of a precedent, concerning the effect of this law, I am willing that a fair range of discussion shall take place. I am not disposed to call the previous question upon the resolution reported by the committee, until after a fair expression of the feelings of the House in the discussion.

I do not, myself, propose to occupy any more time at present.

Mr. GILMER. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of discussing this question at length; but being a member of the Committee of Elections, and therefore possessing, perhaps, more information than some other gentlemen, I deem it due to both parties to state this case as fairly and as impartially as I can from my recollection of it.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, if this is not a case in which the discretion of this House can be exercised as to granting means of taking this supplementary testimony, then that portion of the legislation of Congress is entirely nugatory, and not worth anything at all. We are without precedents in this case, so far as I have been able to ascertain, unless you may concede that the decision of our Committee of Elections is sufficiently imposing to be treated as a precedent in guiding this House in the action they may take upon this subject.

Why, sir, we have a case before that committee in which notice was given regularly and according to law, so decided by the committee—I allude to the Nebraska contested-election case—and the answer came in just as it has in this case. In that case the sitting member had no Congress to attend, no court to attend; he went about his own matters of business; he went upon a pleasure trip to visit his friends. Notices were given and left at his house, according to law, and the testimony taken and closed. But hardly without his asking for time, and merely upon stating, that if the committee deemed the testimony so taken as regular, he desired to take additional testimony, his request was granted. I believe it may be said that neither side formally asked for leave. It was the desire of the parties to take the testimony, and the Committee of Elections decided in that case that it was a fair and proper case for giving this leave to take supplementary testimony. I concurred with the committee in that decision.

Well, how is it in this case, Mr. Speaker? Here was a gentleman confined in the discharge of his official duties in the Congress of the United States. The gentleman from Illinois, over the way, [Mr. HARRIS,] thinks that that is no excuse—no reason why he should not have been in Ohio, either in person or by an agent, and have attended to the taking of testimony. Sir, I think there is a vast difference between an ordinary case of being a member of Congress, so far as the excuse is concerned, and this case. The gentleman [Mr. CAMPBELL] was not then holding a seat that was disputed. He was then occupying a seat to which it was conceded he had been legitimately, properly, and constitutionally elected. He was there by virtue of an election which had taken place two years before, when, in a contest between himself and the present contestant, he was elected by a large majority, and I conceive that it was his bounden duty to be here. He had not only been elected then by an overwhelming majority over the present contestant, but even two years before that, he had been elected by the same people, by a very large majority. But now, when it is a matter of doubt whether he ought to be occupying the seat, or whether Mr. Vallandigham ought to occupy the seat, it is a very different case, because we have not yet decided, and this House has not decided, whether the sitting member is properly here, or whether the man who claims his seat is entitled to it. If the occupation of his time by the business of the House under this last election, or a similar one, had been plead as a reason why he could not be in attendance on the taking of testimony, and the proper examination of witnesses, it would have been an entirely different thing.

Now, sir, when was this election announced? I mean officially announced. Never until after the sitting member was bound to be here as a member of the House. The notice that his seat was going to be contested was given in the usual time. The answer was returned in the usual time. The taking of depositions by the contestant was commenced on the 2d day of February, 1857, and the contestant occupied, virtually, the whole time from that date up to the 28th of March, when the sixty days expired. The sitting member was here attending the sessions of Congress; he was chairman of one of the most important committees of this House, the Committee of Ways and Means; two distinguished members of that committee were absent, one from sickness and the other from some other cause; and, sir, in addition to that, his family were sick, and one of his colleagues died. He could not get home earlier than the 19th day of March, thus having only from that day up to the 28th of March. And yet, sir, it is said that that is no reason why we should allow additional testimony to be taken, so that we may learn exactly how the case stands, and what is the truth, each party having a fair chance of presenting their proof.

But the majority of the committee say, in their report, that the sitting member should have gone on after the sixty days had expired, and should have occupied a portion of the summer in the taking of his testimony, and then have relied upon the indulgence of the House, or of the committee, in receiving and acting upon the testimony thus taken. Now, Mr. Speaker, let me just inquire for a moment into that matter. It appears that the sitting member evinced every desire to have the whole testimony taken and here in time. He courted no delay, and desired, if possible, to avoid the necessity that he now feels himself under, of asking this very indulgence from the House. In a letter which he addressed to the contestant, on the 2d of April, 1857, he made use of this language:

"Desirous that all the material facts shall be fairly presented before Congress, I deem it proper to advise you that I will hereafter proceed to take testimony in the case, (of which due notice, according to law, will be given you,) and to suggest my entire willingness to enter into a mutual agreement with you to waive any technical objection which might be made on the point of time in the taking of testimony on either side. I propose, therefore, a mutual agreement to that effect. This would give to both of us, and our friends, a fair opportunity to present all the facts bearing upon the issue, and tend to prevent delay in the final decision of the matter, as well as the increased expense to the Government which would result from a necessity to take testimony after the meeting of Congress."

The contestant, in answer to that letter, positively declined to enter into any such agreement; and yet the majority of the committee present it in their report, as a reason why this privilege should be denied, that the sitting member ought to have gone on and taken testimony, notwithstanding the refusal of the contestant to make any such agreement.

It is true the contestant submitted another proposition, that the sitting member should resign and that they should go before the people. That is what the contestant says should have been done by the sitting member. The majority of the committee say that he should not have done so, but that he ought still to have gone on and taken his testimony.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it is but fair and right, that it is but justice, that time should be allowed for the taking of further testimony. Such is my anxiety to let all the parties be heard, that I voted in committee to give further time to the sitting member in the Nebraska case, as in this. I desire to know the truth of the case. I desire that justice should be done under all the circumstances.

And, Mr. Speaker, let me say further. As I understand it, it was believed by both of these parties, as well the sitting member as the contestant, and both acted under that solemn conviction, that while one had a commission pending the other had no right to take testimony at another place, under a different commission, at the same time. So that this whole case comes within a nut-shell. The contestant takes the initiatory steps, he begins as early as he can, and in the usual time, and substantially occupies all the time allowed for taking testimony, leaving the sitting candidate no time to take testimony on his side. Besides that, the contestant does what is conceded to be wrong; while he has a commission pending at one place, he gives notice that he will take depositions at another place; and actually proceeds and takes testimony under two commissions running at the same time.

My friend from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] says that all men should be treated alike. So say I. But if we refuse, in this case, to follow out the precedent that we have set, in asking the House for an extension of time in the case of Chapman and Ferguson, we will not be carrying out that golden rule of treating all persons alike.

My friend says it makes no sort of difference what either of these parties claim. When the question was asked of my friend, did not the contestant insist, as a rule of law under this statute, that the sitting member had no right to take any testimony while his commission was sitting, what was his answer? That it made no sort of difference what any of the parties claimed. I differ with him. Inasmuch as the contestant refused the extension of time, and held that to be the construction of the law, so far it must affect him as though it was the law. And if that was the correct construction of the law, then he left no time to the sitting candidate to take testimony.

Mr. Speaker, I have been careful to form no opinion in this case. Honestly I have none, and if I had I would not express it now. But, Mr. Speaker, there does arise in this case the decision of a question, which I conceive the taking of additional testimony may avoid; and I think it ought to be avoided if possible. It is one which will introduce before this House a discussion, out of which no good can arise. As the testimony now stands, that question will certainly be involved, and will have to be decided first by the committee, and its decision perhaps reviewed by this House. It is a question dangerous and exciting in its character. It is as to the right of certain persons in the State of Ohio to vote—persons with Indian or with African blood in their veins. As the testimony now stands, this House will have to decide whether inhabitants of the State of Ohio who have voted, who have offered to vote, and who have been denied the right of voting, are entitled to vote as the law now stands. I think, sir, that by the continuing of this case we may possibly have the case so clear as to be able to avoid the decision of this question, and thus to avoid the sacrifice of time here, and save agitation to the country. It is important that that question should be stated here for the consideration of the House, that gentlemen may think of it and investigate it before it comes up.

In 1802 the constitution of Ohio used the words "white inhabitants" in reference to the qualifications of voters. The question went to the court of last resort of Ohio, and that court solemnly decided twice that all persons in the State of Ohio were "white inhabitants" in whose veins there was a preponderance of white blood—where the Indian or African blood was less than the white; and that such persons were, under the constitution, entitled to vote.

In this case we have testimony in relation to a large number of electors of that description who voted, some for the contestant and some for the contestee; and as the matter now stands, a correct decision, according to the evidence, cannot be made by the committee or by the House without first determining that question.

It is insisted, on one side, that such persons are now legal voters of the State of Ohio; and it is insisted on the other side that they are not. The ground on which it is claimed that they are not, is, that in 1851 the people of Ohio reviewed their constitution, and for the words "white inhabitants" they substituted the word "citizens;" and that that has been done after the decisions were made in 1842, declaring that persons in whom the white blood predominated over the Indian or African were entitled to vote. It is insisted, then, inasmuch as in 1851 this change was made by the people in the phraseology of the constitution of Ohio, they intended to exclude all the inhabitants of that State from the exercise of the elective franchise who had any visible trace of Indian or of African blood.

Here is presented to my mind a new and very interesting question—whether, under the decision in the Dred Scott case, we shall have to come to the conclusion, in this case, that individuals in whom there are visible traces of Indian or of African blood are citizens of the United States, or can be so far a citizen of the State of Ohio, or of any State, as to vote for a member of Congress?

I have come to no conclusion upon the subject, but it is one very interesting in its character. I stated to my friends on the committee, that in the southern States they allow such persons to vote, or testify, or hold office, or muster into the militia, who are not within the fourth degree. And, sir, we shall have to carry the Dred Scott decision very far before we decide that when it can be proved by inspection or by admission that a man contains Indian blood, he cannot be considered a citizen of the United States to a sufficient extent to vote for members of a State Legislature, or for members of Congress. And, sir, one fact presents itself to my mind, which I know my friend from Virginia has often seen—that on the hustings it is not considered a disqualification for a man to boast that he has the blood of Pocahontas running in his veins. [Laughter.]

But, sir, I desire only to detain the House long enough to show that this is one of the questions that will come up in this case as the matter now stands; and to submit whether it would not be better to allow more time in this case on the other side, and see if we cannot make out a decision here for the contestant or against him upon some other point, and avoid a discussion upon that point which must consume time, create excitement, and come to no good result. For, Mr. Speaker, in a case of this kind, in a heated election, as this was, where there are nine or ten thousand votes polled on either side, where the contest is very close, and must be decided one way or the other by a few votes, where one party is in a different portion of the Union attending to official duties, during the whole time in which the testimony is being taken under the law, it would be strange if the other party in that time could not find men enough who had voted improperly, who may have been too young, or who may have voted in the wrong place, to overcome the majority. There has never been an election under these circumstances in which the dissatisfied party could not in this manner obtain votes enough to overcome such a majority as is claimed by the sitting member.

Now, sir, without detaining the House longer, I submit that if the House is ever going to indulge any party in taking supplemental testimony; if they are ever going to establish a precedent of that kind, this is a case in which it should be done.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not think the gentleman from North Carolina who has just taken his seat has placed the issue upon the proper grounds between the majority, with which I concur, and the minority. Nobody on the Committee of Elections, as I understand, denies or questions the power of the House to extend the time for taking testimony under the election law of 1837. It is not a question of power, but it is a question which addresses itself to the discretion of the House, whether it will exercise a power which everybody admits is granted under that act.

Now, sir, the majority of the committee thought that Mr. Campbell, the sitting member, did not bring himself within the rule under which further time ought to be granted in which to take further proof in his case. I shall not detain the House long in stating the grounds on which the committee arrived at that conclusion. It will never do to place such a construction upon this act of 1851 as is now claimed by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. GILMER.] If such a construction is placed upon the act, then the act itself becomes a monstrous wrong. It gives safety to the sitting member, but it absolutely denies everything like justice to the contestant for a seat in this House. Why, sir, it is claimed here that the gentleman from Ohio, in consequence of his duties here in Congress, had no time to attend to the taking of that testimony which, by the act of 1851, is required to be taken within sixty days.

Gentlemen are well aware that in nearly all the free States the elections are held the year preceding the Congress in which the members elected are entitled to take their seats. This election took place nearly two years ago, just preceding the last session of the last Congress. Under the law of 1851 this testimony was to be taken in sixty days. Did the framers of this act contemplate the returned member to be present in person to take testimony? or could be present by an attorney? If present in person, he had to be there within the sixty days; and in this case that sixty day was necessarily during the second session of the Thirty-Fourth Congress. But, sir, the act clearly contemplated that if he was to be there in person, he had the right to leave his seat in Congress for that purpose. He could either do that or he could be represented in the taking of testimony by an agent. Mr. Campbell was represented by an agent in taking proof; and yet now, eighteen months after, he comes here and asks that the time may be extended, in consequence of his having been engaged here at the time as a member of the House.

Will the law of 1851 bear such a construction as that? I put it to the legal acumen of the gentleman from North Carolina. Is it consistent with justice, or propriety, that such a construction should be placed upon it? Sir, under that construction, every gentleman who is returned from the free States will be engaged in Congress during the time when testimony must be taken under the law, if his seat is contested. He is presumed to be here; and if that will give him the right to have time allowed to take supplemental testimony, members from the free States, whose seats are contested, will always have that right.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1858.

NEW SERIES... No. 36.

But, sir, our report does not rest upon any such ground as this. We say that Mr. Campbell has not shown due diligence in availing himself of his rights, under the law, for taking testimony, and is not therefore entitled to this privilege. I am glad the gentleman from North Carolina read, and the majority of this committee concur, in support of the proposition that there is nothing in the act of 1851 which precludes the sitting member and contestant from taking proof at the same time. But the gentleman contends that there was a misconstruction; that the majority of the committee are right in their construction, but that Mr. Campbell gave a different construction, and that his erroneous construction entitles him to the indulgence of the House. Now, sir, I think I can show by Mr. Campbell's letter that he did not place any such construction as the gentleman from North Carolina seems to suppose he did. In the very letter to which the gentleman from North Carolina refers, Mr. Campbell says:

"There is, you are doubtless aware, a clause in the act of Congress prescribing the mode of obtaining evidence in cases of contested election, which provides that no testimony shall be taken after the expiration of sixty days from the day on which the answer of the returned member shall be served upon the contestant. I understand, however, that the practice of Congress, under the act, has been to regard this provision as directory only, and to receive and consider testimony taken after the period limited, whenever a just determination of the contest seems to require it.

"Desirous that all the material facts shall be fairly presented before Congress, I deem it proper to advise you that I will hereafter proceed to take testimony in the case, (of which due notice according to law will be given,) and to suggest my entire willingness to enter into a mutual agreement with you to waive any technical objection which might be made on the point of time in the taking of testimony on either side."

He does not say "by your consent." No, sir. "I shall go on and take this testimony;" "I shall bring this testimony before the committee; and then, if you stickle about formalities, I shall show the materiality of the testimony, and I shall appeal to the House;" "If I am cut off by technicalities, let me go and retake this testimony."

Why did not the sitting member do what he proposed to do? Why did he not present to the committee this proof? Then he might have said, "Here is the substance of what I can prove, and from which I am cut off by the technical construction of this act." Although the sitting member said he intended to take that proof, he did not take it; he let two years pass, and does not even now present to the committee the names of half a dozen witnesses by whose evidence he could change this result. Why should he not come up to the rules of diligence applicable to judicial proceedings? A court has always the right to continue a case upon just and reasonable grounds shown, and where due diligence appears to have been exercised. Does this appear? Does the minority report show, even now, by the affidavits, half a dozen, or even five witnesses, by whom this result could be changed? No, sir, nothing of that sort. There is nothing specific, but he comes in and indulges in general statements of a belief that he could show that he was legally entitled to the seat.

Then the naked fact is presented that both these parties had the right to take testimony; that Mr. Campbell's presence here did not deprive him of the opportunity to take it; that he fell within the time prescribed by law, after the time had elapsed, and after he had given notice to the contestant that he should take these depositions. But he failed to take one of them; and now he asks the committee for a continuance of the time to take the affidavits of men, which, if taken, would not be likely to change the result.

Mr. STANTON. I have noticed in the printed report a dozen affidavits in which the names of persons are given who were illegal voters. I ask if the Committee of Elections expect to use these affidavits as competent evidence in the case? The gentleman says that there is no showing where material testimony can be produced to change the result. If the committee desire to use it as competent evidence, it is right; but if it is not the intention to use it, farther evidence is material.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman will find by the affidavits that there are but three witnesses alluded to in them; and as Mr. Vallandigham contests with some eighty or ninety on the other side, I say that, admitting the truth of these affidavits, they could not change the result. But I referred to them only as an illustration. It was Mr. Campbell's duty to have gone on, under that notice, and taken all the proof he could; should have laid it before the committee; and then, if the contesting member objected on a technicality, I grant the argument of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. GILMER] would have applied with full force. But I say, as the sitting member has been guilty of neglect, he does not bring himself within the pale of that sound discretion of this House to grant leave for extending the time for taking this proof. You might extend it. Two months of the session is past; another month of the session is added; and then what time would be left for the investigation of these nice and important questions alluded to by the gentleman from North Carolina? No, Mr. Speaker; we claim that that act authorized both parties to take proof; that Mr. Campbell did not avail himself of that right; that when he went home he gave that construction to the act, and gave notice to the contestant that he intended to take this proof; that he failed to do it; and with affidavits which go to the extent of changing only three or four votes, he comes with the sweeping declaration of a belief on his part that he could change the result. He does not bring himself within the known legal rights of judicial procedure applicable to discontinuance. The gentleman must state not only that he expects to change the result, but he must give the names of the witnesses, and his belief of what he expects to prove by them, before he brings himself within the rule by which a court exercises a sound discretion in granting a discontinuance.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I desire to state to the House some considerations which induce me to join the minority in desiring the House to grant an extension of the time for taking the testimony in this case.

The contestant claims that the House should be governed by the act of 1851. By that act the result of the election is to be declared by the proper authorities of the State; and it further provides that the contestant shall, within a certain specified time, serve notice upon the party to which the certificate of election shall be given. Then the party to whom the certificate shall be awarded is allowed thirty days in which to make his answer. In this case the answer of the sitting member to the notice of the contestant was made on the 27th day of January, 1857, and within the time allowed by law. The sixty days for taking the testimony under the statute would expire on the 28th of March, 1857. On the 22d of January, five days before the sitting member had given his answer, and at a time when it is doubted that the contestant had a right to do so, he gave notice that he would take depositions on a certain day at a certain place; so that he took care to give the first notice that he might be the first in the field, and he afterwards gave additional notices.

These notices covered the entire period of sixty days. The first notice he gave was for taking depositions on the 7th day of February, at Hamilton. That commission, under that notice, was kept open by adjournments from day to day until the 13th day of March. That was at Hamilton. The commission was kept open under that notice and another subsequent notice over the days intervening between February 2 and March 13. Notice was also given that a commission for the taking of testimony would open at Dayton on the 2d of March; and that commission, if I mistake not, was kept open from day to day, the contestant occupying or claiming to occupy all the time, until the 18th of March. Another notice was given to the sitting member, before that time expired, to take testimony at the same place, Dayton, on the 2d day of March; and the time was occupied from day to day by the contestant up to the 28th of March, the very last day upon which testimony could by possibility be taken under the law. So that the contestant had taken especial care to occupy all the time when testimony could be taken, from the commencement, on the 27th day of January, to the 28th of March, when, under the law, the right terminated.

Well, sir, it is manifest, I think, that the understanding of both the sitting member and the contestant was that but one party should be taking testimony at a time. It appears, however, that the sitting member was taking testimony concurrently at Dayton and Hamilton, or, at all events, that the commission was opened in one place, and opened and adjourned from day to day by the magistrate in the other, notice being given to the sitting member to be present in two places at the same time. So that, while at Dayton the magistrate was present in the office, and perhaps adjourning from day to day, the contestant was taking testimony at Hamilton.

But I was saying that, from what I have seen of the case, it appears that both parties acted on the supposition that but one party could occupy the ground at the same time. It is alleged in the memorial of the sitting member, and is not disputed in the answer of the contestant, (and therefore, I suppose, it may be fairly taken to be admitted,) that when the attorney of the sitting member served notice upon the contestant to take depositions, the contestant replied that he had no right to do so, because his (the contestant's) notice, previously served, covered the residue of the sixty days, and refused to appear and cross-examine witnesses. That, then, appears to have been the understanding of both parties, and perhaps there was some show of reason for that understanding; perhaps they had some right to believe that such was the law; because the best lawyers on the Committee of Elections did hesitate as to the construction of the law, although in the end I believe they were unanimously of opinion that the law did not restrict the parties from taking testimony concurrently. This is the language of the law:

"Provided, That neither party shall give notice of taking testimony in different places at the same time, or without allowing an interval of at least five days between the close of taking testimony at one place and its commencement at another."

I think the House will perceive that it is not very strange that these gentlemen, without perhaps examining very closely into the law and ascertaining its purpose, should understand that while one was occupying the time rightfully, under his notice, the other had no power to go on and give notice and occupy the time also. At any rate, I believe that was the judgment of the parties at the time; and so understanding, I believe that it is right, equitable, and just to the sitting member that he should have an opportunity to produce testimony here. It is apparent to me that he has not had that opportunity. He was here, as we all know, as a member of this House, during the whole of the last short session which terminated on the 4th of March. He was chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means—the most important position upon this floor. And, sir, would he have done right—would he have been excused by his constituents and the country if he had deserted his post at that time and run home to Ohio, neglecting his public duties and the interests of his constituents, for the purpose of taking testimony in regard to his election to a future Congress? No, sir. The minority of the Committee of Elections do not hold, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] would intimate, that additional rights ought to be given to a member of Congress. Not so. Every case must stand upon its own merits, and be decided by the particular circumstances surrounding it. And I say that in this case, when all the time allowed the sitting member by the law was during the session of Congress, when he was here occupying the important post he did, it is only reasonable, it is only honest, it is only just, that the House should give him additional time to take testimony in the case.

Sir, I do not believe in the binding authority of the law of 1851 upon this House in all cases. I believe, sir, that it is directory, and not absolutely binding. I do not believe that the Senate of the United States, in conjunction with the House of Representatives in one Congress, can make a law which is to bind future Houses of Representatives. Not so. By the Constitution of the United States, each House is made the judge of the returns, qualifications, and elections of its own members, and each House can and must judge for itself upon those questions. The law of Congress of 1851 is nothing but the advice or suggestion of reasonable and intelligent and just men, as to the proper course to be taken—advice given when no particular case was before them, and which may be presumed to be good and sound advice and counsel in reference to the matter. It is nothing more. The law is not binding upon us; and if in any case it is oppressive, and there is reason for stepping outside of it, I hold that we have a right to do it. I hold that the law was intended to be a shield and not a sword. It was intended to say to gentlemen claiming seats here, that at a certain time and in a certain way they might take testimony, which should be received; but not to say that a member or his constituency should lose their rights upon this floor through any neglect, or inadvertence, or misinformation. No, sir; I will not consent to admit any gentleman claiming a seat upon this floor unless I believe that he has a right to it; that he has been elected; that he was the choice of a majority of the people voting in the district. I am willing to look beyond forms and technicalities, and to ascertain the sense of the people, and who has been rightfully and truly elected and will represent the people.

Now, I think I have shown, Mr. Speaker, by recital of the essential facts in this case, that we cannot act intelligently, that we cannot decide upon this case as we ought to do, unless we give to the sitting member an opportunity to go home and take further testimony. Let it not be said that he has been guilty of laches in this case. The memorial of the contestant was filed here on the 16th of December, and before it could be printed and action had upon it, the House adjourned till the 4th of January. Immediately afterwards the committee heard one of the parties in the absence of the other, such was the anxiety of the contestant that the case should go on, and that a report should be brought in here. Suppose, sir, the granting of this privilege to the sitting member involves a delay of a fortnight, or a month, or even two months; it is more important that we should know who was really elected, and who is entitled to the seat, than that we should decide the question to-day, to-morrow, or at any given time. The question is, who ought to have the seat? Who has been chosen? And I think that the complaint of laches, on the part of the sitting member, does not come with the best possible grace from a gentleman who refused the application of the sitting member, last April, to go on and take the testimony by mutual agreement, and bring it here, so that the matter might be decided as early as the House could be brought to a vote upon it.

I disagree with the gentleman from Kentucky as to the effect of the letter of the sitting member. Let me read it, sir. The sitting member, referring to the law of 1851, says:

"There is, you are doubtless aware, a clause in the act of Congress prescribing the mode of obtaining evidence in cases of contested elections which provides that no testimony shall be taken after the expiration of sixty days from the day on which the answer of the returned member shall be served upon the contestant. I understand, however, that the practice of Congress under the act has been to regard this provision directory only; and to receive and consider testimony taken after the time limited whenever a just determination of the contest seemed to require it."

"Desiring that all the material facts shall be fairly presented before Congress, I deem it proper to advise you, that I will hereafter proceed to take testimony in the case, (of which due notice according to law will be given you,) and to suggest my entire willingness to enter into a mutual agreement with you to waive any technical objection which might be made on the point of time in the taking of testimony on either side. I propose, therefore, a mutual agreement to that effect. This would give to both of us, and our friends, a fair opportunity to present all the facts bearing upon the issue, and tend to prevent delay in the final decision of the matter, as well as the increased expense to the Government which would result from a necessity to take testimony after the meeting of Congress."

The object of this letter was to have that mutual agreement to go on and take testimony. The sitting member, if he was actuated by the motive intimated by the gentleman from Kentucky, would have gone on, served his notices, and said nothing at all about them. But, in the spirit of kindness, in the spirit of fairness, in the proper spirit, he addresses a letter to the contestant, notifying him that he desired to take testimony, and asking him to concur in some mutual agreement by which they could proceed at once to take testimony, and lay it before the House at the commencement of the session. What reply did the contestant make to that? He denied that the act is directory, and says:

"By the statute the period for taking testimony is expressly limited to 'sixty days' from the service of the answer. You were in Congress when the act passed, and are presumed to know that you were equally bound with myself to close the testimony within that period."

"The 'practice' you allege of taking testimony after the sixty days, notwithstanding the statute, cannot be very veterate, since the act was not passed till March, 1851; nor do I think that at so early a day, practice will prevail against the express words of the statute, which declares that 'no testimony shall be taken.'"

"As to your notion that this language is 'directory only,' I have to say that I can well understand how an affirmative provision in a statute may sometimes, under stress of judicial pressure, be held 'directory,' and non-compliance excused; but I have yet to learn how a provision expressly negative, was ever or can be in like manner interpreted. 'Thou shalt not steal,' is, I take it, strictly prohibitory."

"Your intimation, therefore, that you mean to proceed with your testimony in spite of the statute, gives me no concern. You can suit your pleasure and convenience in that respect. I beg to assure you that it will in nowise incommode or cause me expense."

I submit to the candor and intelligence of this House that that was a fair and just proposition, and one to which the contestant ought to have yielded, if he only desired to have the case fairly and fully investigated on the merits. The contestant, however, did not yield his assent; and, therefore, I say that it does not seem very becoming in him or his friends on this floor to try and prevent any further opportunity being given to procure testimony, on the ground that it would operate to postpone the matter till a later period in the session. He might have prevented the necessity for it himself. He might have prevented it when both he and the sitting member were at home, and when both might have taken whatever testimony they required, and brought it here.

I understand, sir, that there is sufficient in the application of the sitting member here for further time, to justify the House in granting that time. It is said that some sixty or seventy votes have been controverted by the contestant, and a similar number by the sitting member. But how many of these votes, which the contestant challenges, will the House say are bad, and how many on the other side, which the sitting member challenges, will the House say are good? Who knows but that this very controversy may be brought within the range of the votes alluded to by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. GILMER,] or of the testimony referred to by the sitting member in his memorial? Who is authorized to state here that the judgment of the House cannot possibly be affected by the votes named by the sitting member, or by the testimony in reference to the other votes, many in number, referred to?

Are we to be told here that we are bound by any narrow, illiberal practice? No, sir. We have a right, and it is our duty, to give to these parties reasonable opportunity, under all the circumstances, as they appear to us, to take testimony. We are not bound hand and foot by this statute. We are bound to do right. We are bound to be just. We are bound, if we believe there is anything in the case on which the parties should be allowed to present additional testimony, to afford them that opportunity; and I have no doubt—I can have no doubt—when the House comes to read the facts and understand the reasons assigned by the sitting member, that the House will very cheerfully yield him the time asked, and allow him to open the testimony on which they can give judgment in this case which will be satisfactory to themselves.

Mr. BOYCE. Mr. Speaker, the law and the facts, so far as they are material to the determination of this application for an extension of time for taking testimony, lie in a narrow compass. By the act of 1851, regulating contested elections, sixty days are allowed for the taking of testimony. These sixty days begin to run from the day that the answer of the sitting member is returned to the notice of contest. During the sixty days each party may examine as many witnesses as he chooses. The only limitation upon the parties, in reference to taking testimony, is, that no one of the parties shall take testimony at different places at the same time. With this limitation each party may consume the whole of the sixty days in taking testimony. Practically, the act permits one hundred and twenty days to be spent in taking testimony. The law presumes that this length of time will be sufficient, and, therefore, limits the taking of testimony to this period; but to provide for any exceptional case, the power is reserved to this House to extend the time of taking testimony. The discretion reserved to the House is not an arbitrary discretion, but a reasonable discretion to be exercised under proper safeguards. The rule which I would lay down upon this point is this: that a party should not be entitled to an extension of time unless, after due diligence upon his own part, he is unable to take his testimony. But whenever, by due diligence, a party could examine his witnesses, but fails to do so, no extension of time should be made. Such are the general principles of law governing this case.

The facts are substantially as follows: the election, under which Mr. Campbell claims his seat, took place October 14, 1856, more than fifteen months ago. The answer of the sitting member was received by the contestant on the 27th of January, 1857, and consequently the sixty days limited by law for taking depositions expired on the 28th of March, 1857. Mr. Campbell was a member of the last Congress, and occupied the position of chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. The contestant commenced taking testimony on the 2d of February and continued so doing, according to his own statement, for fifty-five days. The sitting member also took depositions from the 17th of March for some eight or ten days.

Under this state of facts the sitting member applies, January 22, 1858, for the privilege of taking further evidence. I may remark here, that I do not think he has moved in this matter as promptly as he should have done; but I pass this by.

The main grounds upon which the sitting member makes his application for further time to take testimony are as follows:

1. That having been a member of the last Congress, he was unable to be present at the examination of witnesses until after the 4th of March.

2. That the contestant occupied, or gave notice that he would occupy, the sixty days in examining his witnesses, thus debarring the sitting member from taking testimony.

In reference to the first ground. It is sufficient, it seems to me, to reply that there is no necessity for the personal attendance of the parties claiming the seat, as the law provides for their attendance by their agents. The matters to be proved do not lie peculiarly in the knowledge of the parties themselves, and the examination of witnesses can just as well be conducted by their agents as themselves. The important matter is the preparation of the case before the examination of the witnesses. This the sitting member might have done from October, when he knew his seat would be contested, until he left for Washington in December. This he neglected to do. It may further be insisted that the law having made no special exception in the case where the sitting member was in attendance on the session of the House, though, from the periods at which the elections take place in many of the States, nothing could be more probable than the occurrence of such a case, it intended such a case as this to take the ordinary course. A strong objection to the extension of time on this ground arises from the fact that the sitting member is now a member, and could not now be personally in attendance on the examination of the witnesses.

In regard to the second ground. The evident meaning of the act of 1851 is, that any one of the parties shall not examine witnesses at the same time at different places. But the law does not prevent either party from examining his witnesses, because the other party is examining his witnesses at the same time. It was perfectly competent for Mr. Campbell to examine his witnesses for the whole period of the sixty days; that he did not do so is his own fault. That he knew that he could do so, is evident from the fact that he did examine his witnesses a portion of the time, some eight or ten days. I see nothing whatever in this ground for granting the extension of time.

Mr. TRIPPE. Will the gentleman from South Carolina allow me to ask him a question which occurs to my mind?

Mr. BOYCE. Certainly.

Mr. TRIPPE. It is stated in the report of the minority of the committee that the sitting member not only so construed the law himself, and therefore did not proceed to take testimony, but that the same construction was given to it by the contestant also. Not only did the contestant so construe it, but he actually protested against the right of the sitting member to overreach his time. Is that statement, made by the minority of the committee, true—that both parties did so construe the law?

Mr. BOYCE. I am informed by the contestant that he denies that statement.

Mr. TRIPPE. There is this fact further stated—as a matter of fact, not of opinion—that when the sitting member proposed to take testimony at a certain period, the contestant protested against his right to do so, because he, the contestant, already covered that time.

Mr. BOYCE. That is denied by the committee.

Mr. TRIPPE. Well, sir, it is stated in the report of the minority; and it is a point on which I would like to have information as to what is the real fact. That is a controlling consideration with me.

Mr. BOYCE. The sitting member does not, as I understand, make that assertion on his own knowledge. He says that somebody says so. The contestant says he never did take that ground; so that we have his positive testimony against what somebody said.

Mr. TRIPPE. That may be perfectly right; but I beg leave to call the gentleman's attention to a sentence in the minority report:

"Whilst the sitting member—from the construction (in which, however, we do not concur) which it is clear to us both the parties gave to the law—was only able to take testimony from the 17th to the 27th of March, 1857; and that, at the time of the sitting member's notice to take his testimony, as aforesaid, was served, the contestant refused to attend, and claimed that he had already covered this time with his notices; and which latter statement is not denied by the contestant."

The point which I am at, is the authority for this statement in the minority report. Is it true, or is it not, that the contestant did so claim?

Mr. BOYCE. I read from Mr. Vallandigham's answer to Mr. Campbell, page 14:

"It is asserted, or insinuated, upon the authority cujusdam ignoti, that my purpose in serving the notice in this contest was to prevent the returned member from taking any testimony at all.

"I meet this by a flat denial. But five notices in all, to take testimony, were served; one of them he refused to accept; another was simply a list of witnesses, as required by the statute; and two of them were abandoned—leaving just two under which testimony was fully taken.

"The construction of the statute is obvious, and the returned member acted upon it as construed by the committee, but a few days ago. I add that, in this as in other instances, there would seem to be a studied effort to represent me as unfair and disingenuous throughout this contest. Of the justice of these insinuations and the delicacy of introducing them here, I leave the committee and those who know me best, to judge."

But, in the view that I take of the case, it is immaterial what construction the contestant may have contended for. There was the law, about which the understanding of both the minority and the majority of the committee is, so far as I know, harmonious. Both parties could have gone on and taken testimony. If the contestant set up an erroneous construction of the law, that is not material. But it appears that he did not.

There are other matters suggested by the sitting member, but they do not seem to me to have any force in them. For instance, he says some of the notices of testimony to be taken by the contestant were left at his residence, which was in charge of only a colored servant. This fact, if it had any effect, would go simply to invalidate the testimony taken against him, but it is no excuse for his not taking testimony. As regards the further facts, that the sitting member was detained in Washington a few days, by the illness of one of his children, and the duty devolved upon him in reference to accompanying to Ohio the remains of the Hon. Mr. Disney, they do not seem to me, in themselves, of much weight, inasmuch as the testimony could very well be taken without the personal attendance of the sitting member.

The sitting member further states, that at the expiration of the sixty days, he proposed to the contestant to go on and take testimony by consent, which was declined. This suggestion does not vary the case. The only question in the case, as I conceive it, is simply this: did the sitting member have an opportunity to take testimony? I think there can be but one answer to this. The election had taken place in October, 1856; he was promptly informed of the intention to contest. He could, I think, very easily have, between the time of the election and the assembling of Congress, examined into his case, ascertained what he could prove, got the names of his witnesses, and had the testimony taken in his absence by his agents. Not having done this, I do not think he used due diligence, and therefore has no claim for the extension of the time of taking testimony.

It is a matter of the first importance that these contested-election cases should be promptly decided. Fifteen months have elapsed since the election; the sitting member has had the opportunity of taking testimony, and now to reopen the case for new testimony would involve considerable delay, and unnecessarily protract the case. I conclude, therefore, against the extension of time asked for. It rests, however, with the House in their discretion to grant the application; in their decision I acquiesce.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to go back to the majority and minority reports in this case to show to the House the reasons which controlled the minority in making the report which they have presented. This election took place in the State of Ohio, on the second Tuesday in October. The board of canvassers met to determine the election on the 6th day of December. The answer of the sitting member is dated, "City of Washington, 19th January, 1857."

Mr. Speaker, I wish now to bring before the House, as clearly as I can, the course of the contestant in this case, and show reasons why the sitting member should have additional time to take testimony. In the first place, as to the notice. Here are six notices upon the part of the contestant. The first is dated five days before the answer of the sitting member was given to him. It is dated January 14, 1857. He closed the commission under it, at Hamilton, on the 13th of March—having occupied forty days out of the sixty days in which he could take testimony under the law. Another notice was issued on the 16th of February, stating that he would commence taking testimony at Dayton, on the 2d of March. This commission was opened and continued from that day until the 18th day of March, embracing twelve days of the time covered by the commission under the first notice. And right here I wish to call attention to the fact that the law of 1851 requires that five days shall elapse, from the closing of one commission, before another shall be opened. But, sir, in violation of that law, you find that the contestant in this case, before one commission was closed, gave notice of another; and that the taking of testimony under the second notice was commenced before five days had elapsed from the close of the first; so that you find that he has gone outside and over the law of 1851, if that is to govern in this case.

What, sir, are the facts further? The commissions under these five notices cover the entire sixty days, as you see by referring to the minority report, and if you include the five days' interval, they covered seventy-one days. So much for the notices.

The next question is, did the contestant consider that all the evidence should be included and completed within the sixty days. I say that he did. I read from his answer or reply before the committee, to show that he considered the law of 1851 as imperative, and that the entire evidence should be taken within the sixty days; at the same time, he having by his notices and his commissions covered seventy-one days, as is shown by the report and by the evidence in the case. He says:

"By the statute the period for the taking testimony is expressly limited to sixty days from the service of the answer. You were in Congress when the act passed and are presumed to know that you were equally bound with myself to close the testimony within that period."

Within what period? Sixty days. How did the contestant occupy these sixty days? By these notices and by taking testimony, which notices and testimony occupied not only the entire time allowed by the law of 1851, but seventy-three days; thirteen days beyond the law. He goes on:

"The 'practice' you allege, of taking testimony after sixty days, notwithstanding the statute, cannot be very inveterate, since the act was not passed till March, 1851; nor do I think that at so early a day, practice will prevail against the express words of the statute, which declares that 'no testimony shall be taken.'"

That no testimony shall be taken after the sixty days, which shows that the contestant understood well the law, and acted upon it, intending to take testimony covering the entire sixty days. Now, another question for us to consider, is this: did the contestant so construe the law as to limit the taking of testimony to within sixty days; and did he also construe it, that the sitting member and contestant could not both take testimony at the same time.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. If the gentleman from Indiana will allow me to have the reply of the contestant read at the Clerk's desk, it will answer his question.

Mr. WILSON. I will read the reply to which the gentleman refers, before I take my seat.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I want it read right at this point.

Mr. WILSON. I will read it before I am through. Now, sir, let us look at the law of 1851, and if the House does not wish to do injustice between these parties claiming the right to a seat upon this floor, let us see how they regarded this statute, and what construction they (the sitting member and the contestant) gave to it. I find in the application of the sitting member for additional time in which to take testimony, filed before the committee, the following language:

"I was detained in Washington several days after the adjournment by the sickness of one of my children, and by the subsequent demise of one of my former colleagues—the Hon. David T. Disney. At a meeting of the friends of the deceased from Ohio, then in this city, I was appointed chairman of a committee to accompany his remains to the residence of his family in Cincinnati; and in the discharge of this melancholy duty I was unable to reach my home until the 19th of March, a few days prior to the expiration of the 'sixty days.' I then found that my attorney had taken steps to secure testimony in my behalf in one of the counties composing the district. He occupied ten days, (pp. 147 to 155.) I am informed by him that when he served notice, (p. 138,) contestant claimed that he had no right to do so, because his notices previously served, covered the residue of the 'sixty days,' and refused to appear and cross-examine witnesses."

Now, sir, here is a material fact, as important, perhaps, as any one presented in the case. Yet never once does the contestant, in his reply, deny, or even refer to this statement upon the part of the applicant for additional time to take testimony. If it is not true, why did he not deny it in his reply? This was the construction clearly given to the law not only by the contestant but by the sitting member.

Now, then, let us take one step further in this case. What is that? The time allowed by law closed, evidence had been taken upon one side and no evidence scarcely upon the other side. I understood the gentleman upon the other side of the House to say that eighteen months had elapsed, and that it was time this case was determined. Let us see what steps the sitting member took to determine this question between him and the contestant. Let us see who has been in "laches." On the 2d of April, 1857, at Hamilton, the sitting member forwarded to the contestant a letter, it being a part of the papers in this case, in which I find this language:

"Desirous that all the material facts shall be fairly presented before Congress, I deem it proper to advise you that I shall hereafter proceed to take testimony in the case, (of which due notice according to law will be given,) and to suggest my entire willingness to enter into a mutual agreement with you to waive any technical objection which might be made on the point of time in the taking of testimony on either side. I propose, therefore, a mutual agreement to that effect. This would give to both of us and to our friends a fair opportunity to present all the facts bearing upon the issue, and tend to prevent delay in the final decision of the matter."

Here was the offer made. The sixty days had elapsed. What did the sitting member say? I will go with you and take evidence notwithstanding; present that evidence before the House; that shall determine between us. What was the answer of the contestant? Here it is:

"Your intimation, therefore, that you mean to proceed with your testimony, in spite of the statute, gives me no concern. You can suit your pleasure and convenience in that respect. I beg to assure you that it will in nowise incommode or cause me expense."

He refused the offer, and declined to take the evidence. And why should the sitting member be held responsible now before the House on account of lapse of time, when the contestant himself refused to go outside of the law of 1851; contended that the law was imperative; had covered the whole time with his own commission; and declined to permit evidence to be taken after the "sixty days," so far as he was concerned.

Again I state a fact which does not appear upon the face of the papers, but which I believe to be true. The law requires that so soon as the depositions are taken they shall be sealed and immediately forwarded to this House. These depositions were never forwarded until after the meeting of this Congress. They remained unsealed in Ohio until about the first week of Congress, when they were forwarded here, so I have been informed. Had not the sitting member then a right to consider that the party himself did not consider the testimony closed, and that time would be extended?

But the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BOYCE] says that the application of the sitting member was not made promptly before the committee. What are the facts? When the memorial was referred to the committee, it was ordered to be printed. At the time it was printed and laid before the members of the committee, the sitting member was necessarily absent in Ohio. In his absence, the case was taken up, and the first moment after his return, after the contestant had been heard upon the merits, he made his application for time to take supplementary evidence. The application was made at the very first moment it could be made. Now, then, under all these facts, I ask, will the House refuse to grant further time? Why, sir, the Committee of Elections, a day or two ago, reported to this House a resolution granting further time to take evidence in the Nebraska contested-election case. Why make a distinction between a Territory and a State? I know no good reason why a distinction should be made. I was in favor of giving time in both cases, so that this House may have all the facts before them, and decide correctly.

Mr. BOYCE. I understand the gentleman to refer to the Nebraska case. That action of the committee was upon peculiar grounds. In that case the contestant had taken all the evidence under a notice, the validity of which was very doubtful if strictly construed, and not to have given further time would have been at once to have prejudged that case. In order, therefore, to give any showing whatever to the sitting member, who had left the Territory of Nebraska at the time the notice was served, I consented with a majority of the committee to extend the time.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the gentleman if the notice was a valid one?

Mr. BOYCE. It was given under very peculiar circumstances. I was willing to allow further time and give each side fair play. If I had been compelled to decide exclusively upon the evidence taken under such circumstances, I should have had doubts as to the validity of the notice.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman says the Nebraska case was surrounded by peculiar circumstances. What are they? Simply whether a notice was valid or not. This was all. But here, where the commission on one side has consumed the entire sixty days; where the party refused to go outside of that commission; where he considered the law imperative, it is not considered a peculiar case; even when it may overthrow the expressed will of the people of the third congressional district of Ohio. Sir, if "peculiar circumstances" surround either case, it is the Ohio, and not the Nebraska case.

But again, sir, I cannot understand why a rule is applied to one case and not to another. In the Nebraska case, the committee, and I presume the House, wished to hear the entire evidence, to have all the testimony before them, and then to determine between the two gentlemen claiming the seat as Delegate from that Territory. I wish the same rule to be applied in this case.

But the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] says that there is no evidence before the committee, or before the House, that the sitting member would be able to refute the evidence which has been presented by the contestant. That, sir, depends entirely on another question, which we have yet to decide upon. The question whether hearsay evidence is admissible or not will have to be passed on by the House and by the committee. But here are statements very material and to the point in the application of the sitting member for further time. What does he say? He says:

"I verily believe that, if this application is granted, I shall be able to show to the entire satisfaction of the House, by legal testimony, that my election was a fair and valid election, and that if illegal votes may have been cast, more illegal votes were cast for the contestant than for myself. Having had no fair opportunity of vindicating my rights and the rights of my constituents in the premises, this application is respectfully submitted."

He here claims that if the time of forty days is allowed him, he can show that his election was fair and legal; and that, if illegal votes were cast, more illegal votes were cast for the contestant than for him.

Mr. Speaker, there is but one other point to which I desire to allude. Sir, when this evidence was taken, the sitting member was a member of this House; he was chairman of an important committee; you, sir, remember that his duties upon that committee were arduous during the last session of Congress, and you know how well and faithfully he attended to the interests committed to his charge. I ask, then, is it fair, without having his voice heard before this House, or his evidence completed, so that every man, no matter what his political opinions, can determine fairly for himself upon the merits of the case—is it fair to strike him down as it is proposed to do by the majority of the Committee of Elections? I think not. Let, then, the time be given by the House.

Mr. PHILLIPS. As one of the majority of the Committee of Elections, I desire to state to the House the reasons which govern me in my course upon this question. They are, to my mind, clear and conclusive. I think the House will find that there has been as clear a case of neglect, upon the part of the sitting member, as has ever been shown in any Congress. If he has not taken his testimony, and if there has been any fault, it was his own. From the hour when the contestant served notice upon the sitting member, down to the time when his application was made, there seems to have been a desire for delay. I will not charge it to have been intentional; nor will I say that he supposed there was more strength in a member of an old Congress than in a mere contestant for a seat; but I promise to show the House, in a very few words, that abundant opportunity was afforded to the sitting member to prove his case, if he had a case; and it was not until after the Committee of Elections were ready to decide the case as presented, that this application was ever interposed. The application, Mr. Speaker, was not made in the regular way—as a request of the committee; but it was interposed with a demand—respectfully made, I admit—that whether the committee favored it or not, it should be submitted for the action of the House.

Mr. Speaker, this election took place on the 14th of October, 1856. I do not know how the returns are made in Ohio, but I have been informed this morning that, immediately after the election, the returns are counted by the county officers, and I suppose they are made public records. They are then sent, I am told, to the Secretary of State, and are kept in his office, open to the inspection of every citizen. Ten days after that election, on the 24th of October, 1856, the contestant, in compliance with what he believed to be the law, served upon the sitting member notice of his intention to contest the right of that gentleman to the seat. Whether that notice was in time, or whether it was premature, it is not worth while to consider. There may be doubts about that. The act of Congress of 1851, which, in my opinion, is very little more than suggestive, and hardly rises to the dignity of being directory—the act of 1851 provides that notice shall be given within thirty days after the result of the election shall have been determined by the officers or board of canvassers authorized to determine the same.

I am not prepared to say whether we can consider the returning officers as canvassers under this law, or the Governor of the Commonwealth as the canvasser; but I do know—it has never been denied—that on the 24th day of October, 1856, within ten days after the election, the contestant, Mr. Vallandigham, served notice on the Hon. L. D. Campbell that he intended to contest his right to a seat in the House of Representatives of the Thirty-Fifth Congress; and he specified therein the frauds or mistakes which he alleged, as the ground on which he would ask that the return should be set aside. Mr. Campbell knew then that he had to take his seat in the Thirty-Fourth Congress, at the second session, within six weeks thereafter. The notice may have been premature; but the contestant having waived that point, the sitting member had time and opportunity to take testimony, while the testimony was fresh, to establish his right to the seat. But how was this action of the contestant met? On the 31st of October, 1856, a week after the notice had been given, the Hon. Lewis D. Campbell, then a member of the Thirty-Fourth Congress, wrote to Mr. Vallandigham, the contestant, a note, which put it beyond his power to ask for any favors from that gentleman. That note is short, and I will read it:

HAMILTON, OHIO, October 31, 1856.
SIR: I received your written communication touching that "nigger business" some time after it appeared in the "naze papers."

No official information of my election to a seat in the Thirty-Fifth Congress of the United States has yet been furnished me, and you will pardon me for suggesting that perhaps your deep anxiety on this subject has occasioned premature action.

In December next I shall probably receive, under the "broad seal" of the State of Ohio, a certificate that the honor of representing the third district in the next Congress has been conferred on me by the people. In that event please observe that you and the corrupt minions of the present condemned Administration are not only invited but dared to contest my right to the seat. Should you or they attempt to carry out your vaunted designs, I promise the country a record of one of the most corrupt and disgraceful outrages that has ever been perpetrated upon the American ballot-box.
LEWIS D. CAMPBELL.

Col. C. L. VALLANDIGHAM.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when the contestant gave this notice to the returned member, if the latter was in possession of the facts which he asserted in his notice—and I suppose that he would assert nothing unless he had, or supposed that he had, some evidence to support it—it was a duty which he owed to himself, to the citizens of his district, to the country, and to the party at least to which he belonged here, to proceed to the investigation with all possible dispatch, and to give notice of taking testimony in accordance with the law.

But this answer of Mr. Campbell effectually stopped all prospect of an investigation till after he had taken his seat at the last session of Congress.

Now I agree that the fact of a man being detained here by public business has weight; but when you find, as you do here, that the opportunity was afforded him of attending to this case without any sacrifice of the public interests confided to his case, when you find from the start that there was no disposition on his part to do anything except under whip and spur, except under the coercion of law and of the House, then I say it comes with bad grace for him now to ask that further time be allowed him. The only effect of granting it would be to deprive the contestant, if really entitled to the seat—of which I know nothing—of any chance to take his seat in this House at the present session.

Mr. Vallandigham, on the 29th of December, having ascertained that the commission had been issued by the Governor of Ohio to the Hon. Mr. Campbell, the sitting member, repeated his notice of contest. Mr. Campbell was then a member of the Thirty-Fourth Congress. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the sitting member had been inclined to act fairly and promptly, he might have made use of the five or six weeks that elapsed between the first notice and the commencement of the session in taking testimony. Under the act of 1851 the answer to the notice could have been given the same day; his notice to take testimony could have been served the same day, and testimony could have been taken at the expiration of ten days.

On the 27th of January, 1857, twenty-nine days afterwards, nearly all the time allowed by law, Mr. Campbell returned his answer to Mr. Vallandigham's notice, and, in his own language, gave him twenty-three specifications of the proof which it was his purpose to make during the proposed contest, when he said that he knew exactly what he had to prove, and, of course, he knew the sources from which the proof was to be had. The contestant goes on and takes testimony. Mr. Campbell also proceeds to take testimony, and gives notice of the names of many witnesses. And it is a remarkable thing that it should be forgotten, by gentlemen on the other side, that Mr. Campbell did examine thirty-seven witnesses.

The question now is, whether, after an experiment is made, and the testimony referred to this House, and compared with the testimony in support of the contestant's claim, the sitting member should now be allowed to go on and try and improve his case? He gave notice that he would take the testimony of certain witnesses, and he actually did take the testimony of thirty-seven of them.

And there is one fact to which I would call the attention of gentlemen over the way; and that is, that not one of the witnesses on whose testimony Mr. Campbell now proposes to rely is named in the notice given to Mr. Vallandigham. The witnesses on whom he first intended to rely were examined, thirty-seven in number; and now, for the first time, there is an allegation that other witnesses are to be examined, whose testimony he was not prevented from taking for want of time, by whom certain facts are to be proved.

Without saying anything further, this closes the case, so far as compliance with law is concerned. But it is further said, why did not Mr. Vallandigham waive his technical objection when Mr. Campbell proposed this "mutual arrangement?" I answer, that after that letter of Mr. Campbell to Mr. Vallandigham, that gentleman could not enter into any agreement with him. He (Mr. Vallandigham) would stand by the law; and as he stood by the law, so he would require the sitting member to stand or fall by the law.

But let me turn to Mr. Campbell's letter. He says:

"There is, you are doubtless aware, a clause in the act of Congress prescribing the mode of obtaining evidence in cases of contested elections which provides that no testimony shall be taken after the expiration of sixty days from the day on which the answer of the returned member shall be served upon the contestant. I understand, however, that the practice of Congress under the act has been to regard this provision directory only; and to receive and consider testimony taken after the time limited, whenever a just determination of the contest seemed to require it."

If that was his opinion, Mr. Speaker, why did he not go on and take the testimony? It will not do to answer us that the contestant refused to appear. The contestant had refused to appear before that. All the sitting member's depositions were taken ex parte, and without cross-examination. If that was the opinion that he entertained of that clause of the law, why did he not go on, take the testimony, and appeal to the House to admit it, since he had not been able to take it within the time strictly limited by law?

I hold that when a member of Congress is engaged in public business, and especially when he is engaged as chairman of an important committee, he may claim fairly some consideration beyond that allowed to others. But he must at least show himself entitled to it by a course of conduct evincing desire and design on his part, not only to comply with the law, but to lay before the House the facts of the case.

Mr. WILSON. I will ask the gentleman if Mr. Campbell was not absent, and did not apply for an extension of time to take testimony the moment the committee met after his return?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I will answer the gentleman by saying that I understand he was absent some portion of the time; and that when he returned, (which was, I believe, on Saturday, the 16th day of January,) he appeared before the committee on the next Monday, the 18th; and without then asking any extension of time, he consented to go into a reply to the argument that had been made by the counsel for the contestant the week before; and he fixed upon Thursday, the 21st, for that reply. On that day he appeared with his counsel, who went into the argument upon certain objections urged against the testimony taken by contestant; and before concluding the argument, the committee adjourned to the next day, (January 22,) when the sitting member, for the first time, presented his application for further time; and then only in the alternative that the committee should overrule the objections presented the day before. This the committee refused to decide, but required the sitting member to determine for himself upon the sufficiency of the evidence. But the committee were also of opinion that it was his duty to have indicated his desire to them at the earliest opportunity in the session.

Mr. WILSON. I will ask the gentleman if the testimony in the case was printed at that time?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I do not know; and I do not care. I am told that it was printed about the 15th of December. But it is a matter of no consequence whether the testimony was printed or not. The sitting member knew what was the substance of it. I hold that when a returned member's seat is contested, he shall not be privileged to hold on just as long as he can prevent an examination from taking place. If he desired additional time in which to take testimony, it was his duty to present his application on the very first day the committee was organized. I say that was the time he should have made the application.

When did he present it? After the case had been examined, after the argument in behalf of the contestant had been heard, and after the argument in his own behalf had been partly heard. It was not until then that his claim was presented, and it was presented then in alternative. If the committee decided against him on the merits, then he wanted more time, and this application was first presented on the 22d of January, as I have already stated. If the sitting member has had experience and has more accurate knowledge of the rules of this House and parliamentary law than almost any other member, as he is said to have, he must have known that it was competent for him to present the application before the committee at any time, and that the proper time was as early in the session as the committee had organized. He must have known that was the right time, and why did he wait until the 22d of January, when six or seven weeks of the session had passed, and when the case had been partially argued by the committee?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the sitting member could have made his application for further time in which to take testimony before the memorial had been presented and come before the Committee of Elections in a printed form; and whether he did not present it within two or three days of that time, which was the earliest possible period when he could have presented it?

Mr. PHILLIPS. The answer to that question does not at all embarrass me. His application was not made for weeks after the memorial and testimony had been printed. I would have had him make the application at the time the memorial was presented to the House. He knew that the memorial was to be presented; that it would be referred to the Committee of Elections, and ordered to be printed. He did not need to read the memorial to know what it contained. He knew what it was, and to him it was a matter of very little consequence whether it was printed or not. Justice to the contestant, and justice to every member of the House, demands that this question should be settled without further delay. If there is to be any precedent drawn from this case, I hope it will be a good precedent. I hope the House will give an expression of their opinion, that these cases of contested elections should be settled at the earliest possible period of time. It is not fair to the contestant, it is not fair to the constituency of the district, and it is not fair to this House, that the case should go undecided through the whole session, or the whole Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I have seen in this discussion no good reason presented for this delay which is asked for. I do not present it as a party question. I will raise the same question upon my friends. I am advocating a principle which I am willing to have applied to myself, if I shall be placed in the condition of the sitting member. I would grant every reasonable indulgence to a member of Congress thus situated. But, I ask again, has the sitting member shown any good reason for this delay in taking his testimony? He knew the facts he expected to prove, and where he expected to obtain proof; for he did proceed to take the testimony of thirty-seven or thirty-eight witnesses, and had given notice that he would take the testimony of others; but he abandoned the idea of taking their testimony, and he does not now express a desire to have the testimony of those other witnesses. But he comes here with an alternative proposition, that if the committee decide in his favor, he desires no more testimony; but if they decide against him, then he desires to take other testimony. Sir, I say that it is hardly fair for the House to prolong this contest until the 15th of March, upon such an application, and yet that is the time at which the new testimony is to be returned; after the return, it is to be investigated by the committee, and by the House, giving a fair promise that the contest will outlast the present session.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to say anything about the merits of this contest. I can say, in truth and sincerity, that I have made up no opinion as to its merits; but, sir, I claim that this is a matter of moment. It is a question of high importance to the contestant; it is a question of quite as high importance to ourselves, and to the constituency of the district, that it should be determined speedily. I do not care for the propositions made by these parties. I would treat them both alike. While, on the one hand, I think the sitting member had no right to ask for, nor expect, any special indulgence from the contestant, at the same time I cannot censure him for not accepting the challenge of the contestant to refer the matter again to the people. [Laughter.]

But, sir, both these offers are outside the law, and therefore not worthy of our consideration; and this question should be decided at once and properly, and the application of the sitting member should not be granted.

Under ordinary circumstances a failure to secure all the testimony would be the sitting member's misfortune; in the present instance, if there is such a failure, it is clearly his fault.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, obtained the floor.

Mr. GROW. I desire to know whether the message of the President of the United States will come up next in order after this question has been decided?

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair it will.

On motion of Mr. PHELPS, the House (at four o'clock) adjourned.

On motion of Mr. ALLEN, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GWIN presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying that the public lands may be laid off in farms or lots, and granted free of cost to actual settlers only, who are not possessed of other lands; which was ordered to lie on the table, the appropriate standing committee having already reported on that subject.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, it was Ordered, That the petition of J. S. Devlin, and the petition of Sarah S. Hine, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

CALL FOR PAPERS.

Mr. WADE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior cause to be transmitted to the Senate the papers of Richard Fitch, of Ohio, in the Pension Office, on his application, Nos. 260, 565, for bounty land for his services during the war of 1812.

DEPARTMENTAL PRINTING.

Mr. STUART submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire and report to the Senate what amount has been paid annually, during the last five years, to each of the printing establishments in the city of Washington for printing of any kind for the United States other than that ordered by either House of Congress, whether done by the direction of any Department, or civil or military officer thereof. Also, whether the same has been paid under the provisions of the existing law, and whether any amendment of existing laws is necessary in order to secure proper economy in the printing expenditures of the Government, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HAMLIN. I suggest to the Senator from Michigan to incorporate in this resolution after the word "printing," the words "and advertising."

Mr. STUART. I agree to that.

The resolution as modified was adopted.

COAL TRANSPORTS.

Mr. GREEN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to communicate to the Senate the number and tonnage of the Government vessels employed in the Pacific ocean, as well as Government vessels proper, as private vessels employed by Government in transporting coal or other supplies for the United States, and the annual expense thereof, with specifications in detail.

DATE OF IMPORTS.

Mr. SLIDELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of defining more precisely by law, whether, by the date of shipment at, or that of departure from, foreign ports, the value of merchandise imported into the United States shall be fixed for the purpose of estimating the duties thereon.

NEUTRALITY LAWS.

Mr. YULEE. I submit the following:

Ordered, That one thousand five hundred additional copies of the Senate Report No. 20 be printed for the use of the Senate.

The report referred to is the report from the Committee on Foreign Relations on the subject of the neutrality laws. Although I shall probably take occasion to express a difference of opinion with the committee on one or two points in their report, yet, as the subject is one of considerable interest, and has been discussed by the committee with ability, I think it desirable that a larger number than that which has been furnished should be printed for the use of the Senate.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing, under the rules.

NAVAL OFFICER FROM TURKEY.

Mr. MASON. I offer the following resolution of inquiry; and I ask that it may be considered at this time:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire whether it is in the contemplation of the Government of Turkey to send to this country an officer of rank in their Navy, with a view to obtain information concerning American improvement in naval architecture and equipment, and to superintend the construction of one or more vessels of war for the Turkish Navy at the ship-yards of this country; and, in such case, whether any, and what steps should be taken by this Government to manifest its good will towards the Government of Turkey by giving to such officer an appropriate reception, and otherwise to further the object of his mission.

I will say to the Senate that the resolution is of course offered after conference with the Secretary of State. It is understood there by correspondence with our Minister at Constantinople, that such a minister, I think of the highest rank in the Turkish Navy, is on his way to this country, the immediate object of his mission being to have a vessel, a three-decker, a first-class ship, constructed at one of the ship-yards of the United States; and the inquiry is, whether it will not become this Government to further her relations with Turkey, by giving to that officer such reception as the Executive may think proper. The resolution is one of inquiry, and I trust it may now be considered.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the select committee to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 45) to provide for the ascertainment and satisfaction of claims of American citizens for spoliation committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report, which was ordered to be printed. On his motion, it was made the special order for Thursday, the 18th of February, instant, at one o'clock.

Mr. DURKEE, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of the legal representatives of James Bell, deceased, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 115) for the relief of the legal representatives of James Bell, deceased. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. PUGH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 124) to provide for the holding of the stated terms of the circuit and district courts of the northern and southern districts of the State of Ohio, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the Speaker of the House had signed an enrolled bill (H. R. No. 63) to supply an omission in the enrollment of a certain act therein named; which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President.

LEGISLATURE OF IOWA ON KANSAS.

Mr. JONES. I desire to present certain resolutions of the Legislature of Iowa; and I ask that they may be read and printed.

The Secretary read them, as follows:

Preamble and Joint Resolution of instruction concerning the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton Constitution.

Whereas, application has been made, or is about to be made, to the Congress of the United States for the admission of the present Territory of Kansas into the Union under the instrument known as the Lecompton constitution: and whereas, among other grave questions arising from said application is that presented by the fact that the convention which framed said instrument refused to submit it fairly to the people of said Territory for ratification or rejection: and whereas, the question thus presented involves one of the fundamental principles upon which our Governments, State and National, are all based: and whereas, it is eminently right and proper that the several States should, through their General Assemblies, clearly express to their Senators and Representatives in Congress their opinions upon such questions: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives be requested, to oppose the admission of Kansas as one of the States of our Union under the so-called Lecompton constitution, because among other reasons said constitution was not submitted by the convention which framed it to a fair and honest vote of the people of the Territory of Kansas for ratification or rejection.

Resolved, That we condemn the President of the United States, Senators in Congress, and all others in authority under the Constitution of the United States, who have advised or consented to the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution.

Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be requested to resign unless they can support the foregoing resolves, and vote as therein indicated.

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be instructed to forward a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

STEPHEN B. SHELLEDY,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
ORAN FAVILLE,
President of the Senate.

Approved, January 23, 1858. RALPH P. LOWE.

OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE,
DES MOINES, January 23, 1858.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy from the original roll on file in my office.

ELIJAH SELLS, Secretary of State.

The resolutions were ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES. I present these resolutions as a matter of respect to the State Legislature of Iowa, which has sent them to me; but not because I intend, or have the most remote idea that I shall hereafter obey these instructions. I know that the people of Iowa, when they elected the present Legislature, had not the question of the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution before them. I believe that the people of Kansas have had opportunities of expressing their views at the ballot-box; that they have refused to do so; that perhaps a majority of them—the Republican party almost unanimously—refused to express any opinion on the subject. My own opinions are made up, I think, irrevocably, to vote for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution; and unless some stronger arguments are made against it than any that I have heard heretofore, I shall continue of this opinion.

These resolutions, I understand, were adopted by a strict party vote in my Legislature. I am happy to say every member of the Democratic party voted against them, whilst every member of the Republican party voted for them. I have heretofore been similarly instructed by my Legislature, and I then determined to pay the same respect to their instructions that I do now to these. It was then done by a Republican Legislature, and by a strict party vote. It is probable that a majority of the people of Iowa would now obey these instructions, but I do not believe, when they come to understand the question as I understand it, that they would refuse to admit Kansas into the Union under the constitution which she has sent here.

These resolutions condemn the President of the United States, Senators, and all others in authority, who propose to sustain the views of the Administration, and to admit Kansas under the Lecompton constitution. I am not one of those who intend to condemn the Administration, but, on the contrary, I intend to do everything in my power to sustain them on this question. I made up my mind before I left home, as soon as I heard the subject broached, that I should, as the surest means of settling this vexed question which has almost brought civil war into the country, to vote to admit Kansas into the Union as soon as I could possibly do so, if my vote would do it, so as to settle the difficulty. My own opinion is, that we ought to admit Kansas and Minnesota now in the same way that Iowa and Florida were admitted, as twin children into the Union. I shall do all that I can to effect that end, and I hope that Congress will do it at an early day, and so give quiet to the country, and put an end to the question of slavery, which has so long agitated the Congress of the United States, as well as the Legislatures of the States, and the people themselves, in the North as well as in the South.

RULES OF THE SENATE.

Mr. FOOT. I propose the following amendment to the rules of the Senate: To add to the 11th rule, and to constitute, as a part of that rule, the following words:

And all motions to take up any business for consideration, or to postpone any question pending before the Senate with a view to take up some other question indicated by the mover, shall be put to the Senate by the Chair, and shall be decided without debate.

This, of course, lies over one day for consideration.

Mr. PUGH. I should like to propose an amendment to the Senator, that he may incorporate it in his rule, of which I am in favor: it is, that all motions to print a document, or refer it to a standing committee, shall be likewise decided without debate. If he will not accept it, I give notice I shall offer that amendment.

Mr. FOOT. It lies over one day before it can be taken up.

INDIANA SENATORIAL ELECTION.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, in regard to the seats of the Senators from Indiana. That matter, I suppose, is before the Senate on being called up by any Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the question which the Senator from Illinois has called up is a question of privilege; and that it is in the power of the Senate to make what disposition they may choose of it. The Chair thinks, as it is a question of privilege, it may be called up, as it has now been, by the Senator from Illinois; but the subject is under the control of the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The report, then, being before the Senate, I will state what I suppose to be the facts of the case.

Mr. PUGH. The Senator will permit me. Do I understand the Chair to say that the question is taken up at the instance of a Senator, or merely that it is in order to move to take it up?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the decision of the Chair that it is in order for the Senator to call it up as a question of privilege.

Mr. PUGH. Does it come up without a motion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No, sir.

Mr. TRUMBULL. My motion to call it up, I understand, brings it before the Senate; and then the Senate can do whatever it pleases with it, as a matter of course. It being now before the Senate, called up on my motion, I suppose I have a right to state what the question is?

The VICE PRESIDENT. I suppose the Senator from Illinois moves to take up this matter as a question of privilege?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that is the motion before the Senate.

Mr. COLLAMER. I will inquire whether the calling up of a question of privilege is not the bringing of it before the Senate without a vote; whether that does not place it before the Senate of itself? The Senate may postpone it, of course; but when it is called up, being a question of privilege, does it not stand before the Senate as a matter of course?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair, upon reflection, considers—

Mr. PUGH. The Chair will pardon me for a moment, as I wanted to make the objection, if the Senator from Illinois had persevered in his proposition. I understand a question of privilege to be a question that any Senator may call for, but it is in the power of the Senate to say whether they will take it up; otherwise it is the privilege of one Senator to insist that a question shall be heard against all the rest of the Senate. I never heard before of such a question of privilege as that. I understand that it is in order to move to take up this subject, and that then it will have priority over every other subject, if the Senate choose to consider it; but I do not understand that one Senator has the right to insist that the Senate shall consider a subject against its will.

Mr. COLLAMER. There would be, if the gentleman's view were correct, no sort of difference between a question of privilege, or a privileged question, and any other question; because you can move to take up any question. To my mind, there is a distinction. It is privileged here—not that the Senate is obliged to consider it, because that is subject to their own order; they may fix a day for its consideration; they may postpone it; but it is not to be disposed of as an ordinary matter; that is, we are not to have the question put on a motion to take it up. It comes up without a motion, if any Senator requires that it shall. It may be a question when and how they will dispose of it: that is another matter.

Mr. BAYARD. I cannot doubt that any Senator has a right to call up a question of privilege without reference to other business; but after it is called up, it is in the disposition of the Senate like any other question. That has been our universal practice. We may postpone it if the exigency of the public business requires; we may lay it on the table. I gave, yesterday, the reasons why I supposed this case ought not now to be taken up until the Kansas message shall be referred, as it will give rise to debate. That is the basis on which I went. I think so still. I was somewhat misapprehended by Senators on the other side as regards the view which I took of the relative importance of the two questions. I admitted, unhesitatingly, that if I did not consider the reference of the Kansas message as an essential and vital question, I should not be disposed to give precedence to any other subject over this question of privilege. But I do consider a question which, in my judgment, involves the future of this Union, as of higher importance, by far, than the mere question of whether a Senator is, or is not, entitled, by regular election, to a seat on this floor, where he has presented his credentials and been admitted. I consider the Union of more importance. As I look at the reference of the Kansas message, it presents itself to me in this attitude: the debate which is going on is without any practical question before the Senate; it is debate on the merits of the admission of Kansas before it has been referred to a committee, or come practically before us for our action. It is a debate for the purpose of agitation, and agitation alone—agitation which I consider perilous to the Federal Union; and therefore, if I can, by staying here any length of time, or by waiving every other question, succeed in having that referred to the appropriate committee, in order that it may be brought properly before us, I, for one, am disposed to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not perceive any very essential difference between the views which are suggested on this point. It is in the power, as the Chair understands it, of any member to say that he rises to a question of privilege. If the Chair decides that it is a question of privilege, he calls the attention of the Senate to it, and the whole matter is under the control of that body. He will, therefore, state, that on the call of the Senator from Illinois, the report and resolution of the Committee on the Judiciary, being a question of privilege, come before the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It being before the Senate—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator pause while the Secretary reads the resolution, and also the report, if desired by any Senator?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the Chair have the report read? I should like to hear it.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the protest against the election of the Hon. GRAHAM N. FITCH and the Hon. JESSE D. BRIGHT, as Senators in Congress from the State of Indiana, report:

The committee find that the protests against the election of the Hon. GRAHAM N. FITCH, as a Senator in Congress from the State of Indiana, were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary on the 10th of February, 1857; and on the 26th of the same month a resolution was reported by the committee, authorizing testimony to be taken, both by the protesters and the sitting member. The resolution not being acted upon by the Senate at that session, from the pressure of other business, the protests were again referred to the committee on the 9th of March last, at the special session of the Senate, and the same resolution, with a slight amendment, reported by the committee on the 13th of the same month, which being taken up on the day it was reported, a debate ensued upon an amendment offered by the Hon. Mr. TRUMBULL, of Illinois, and the Senate having on the previous day resolved to adjourn, sine die, on the 14th of March, at one o'clock, the resolution reported by the committee was ordered to lie on the table.

The protests against the election of the Hon. JESSE D. BRIGHT, as well as against the election of the Hon. GRAHAM N. FITCH, having been referred at the present session, and the objections of the protesters and allegations of the sitting members being identical in both cases, the committee have adopted and recommended the passage of the resolution reported to the Senate by the committee at the special session on the 13th day of March last, with such variation as is requisite to make it apply to the cases of both the sitting members, as follows:

Resolved, That in the case of the contested election of the Hon. GRAHAM N. FITCH, and the Hon. JESSE D. BRIGHT, Senators returned and admitted to their seats from the State of Indiana, the sitting members, and all persons protesting against their election, or any of them, by themselves, or their agents or attorneys, be permitted to take testimony on the allegations of the protesters and the sitting members touching all matters of fact therein contained, before any judge of the district court of the United States, or any judge of the supreme or circuit courts of the State of Indiana, by first giving ten days' notice of the time and place of such proceeding in some public gazette printed at Indianapolis.

Mr. HALE. Let the minority report be read also. It is very short.

The Secretary read the following report:

Views of the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the protests against the right of Graham N. Fitch and Jesse D. Bright to seats as Senators from the State of Indiana.

The Legislature of Indiana, called the General Assembly, is composed of a Senate of fifty members, and a House of Representatives of one hundred members, and two thirds of each house is, by the constitution, required to constitute a quorum thereof. Each House is declared to be judge of the election and qualification of its members, and required to keep a journal of its proceedings. No regulation exists by law in Indiana as to the manner in which members of the State Senate are to be inducted into office. No law or regulation is there existing providing the time, place, or manner of electing United States Senators.

It appears by the journal of the Senate of Indiana, that on the opening of the Senate at the meeting of the Legislature, January 8, 1857, forty-nine of the Senators were present, and that all the newly-elected members were duly sworn, took their seats, and continued thereafter to act with the other Senators till the close of the session. The only absentee Senator took his seat January 13, 1857. Protests were filed contesting the seats of three of the newly-elected members, which were afterwards examined and considered by the Senate, and they were each found and declared to be entitled to seats, respectively, by majorities more or less numerous, all which is entered upon and appears by the journal of said Senate.

The State constitution makes it the duty of the Speaker of the House of Representatives to open and publish the votes for Governor and Lieutenant Governor in the presence of both Houses of the General Assembly. No provision exists by the constitution making such meeting or presence of the two Houses a convention, or providing any officers therefor, or authorizing or empowering the same to transact any business whatever, except by joint vote, forthwith to proceed to elect a Governor or Lieutenant Governor in case of a tie vote.

Both Houses being in session, the Speaker notified them that he should proceed to open and publish the votes for Governor and Lieutenant Governor, on Monday, the 12th day of January, at half past two o'clock, p. m., in the Hall of the House. Shortly before the hour arrived the President of the Senate announced that he would proceed immediately to the Hall of the House of Representatives; and thereupon, together with such Senators as chose to go, being a minority of the whole number thereof, he repaired to the Hall of the House of Representatives, and there, in their presence, and in the presence of the members of the House, the votes for Governor and Lieutenant Governor were duly counted and published by the Speaker, and A. P. Willard, the then President of the Senate, was declared duly elected Governor, and A. A. Hammon, Lieutenant Governor, of said State.

At the close of this business, a Senator present, without any vote for that purpose, declared the meeting (by him then called a convention) adjourned to the 2d of February, 1857, at two o'clock.

The Senate, hearing of this proceeding, on the 29th day of January, 1857, as appears by its journal, passed a resolution protesting against the proceedings of said so-called convention, disclaiming all connection therewith, or recognition thereof, and protesting against any election of United States Senators or other officer thereby. On the 2d of February, 1857, the President of the Senate, with a minority of its members, again attended in the Hall of the House, and, without proceeding to any business, and without any vote, declared the meeting (by him called a convention) adjourned until the 4th day of February, 1857, at which time the President of the Senate, with twenty-four of its members, went to the Hall of the House of Representatives, and there they, together with sixty-two members of the House, proceeded to elect two Senators of the United States, to wit: GRAHAM N. FITCH and JESSE D. BRIGHT, they each receiving eighty-three votes, and no more, at their respective elections, twenty-three of which votes were by members of the Senate.

Against these elections so made, protests by twenty-seven members of the Senate of Indiana, and thirty-five members of the House of Representatives of said State, have been duly presented, alleging that, in the absence of any law, joint resolution, or regulation of any kind by the two Houses composing the Legislature of Indiana, providing for holding a joint convention, it is not competent for a minority of the members of the Senate, and a majority, but less than a quorum, of the members of the House of Representatives of said State, to assemble together and make an election of United States Senators.

Of the facts as herein stated there is no dispute, as we understand.

It is now alleged by the sitting Senators, respectively, as we understand the substance of their allegations, in contradiction of the Senate journal, that the three State Senators whose seats were contested were not legally elected and qualified; that they were without the expressly required credentials, the certificate of the proper and only returning officer; and that they were, notwithstanding, directed to be sworn in by a presiding officer chosen for the purpose by the members of the Senate designated as Republicans, for the clear purpose—illegal and fraudulent, in fact—of defeating an election of Senators of the United States.

Under these circumstances, we object to the adoption of the resolution for the taking of testimony to sustain these allegations, because the said election of United States Senators, so conducted, is obviously illegal and insufficient, and cannot be cured by any proof of these allegations; and we insist that the Senate should now proceed to a definite decision of the question.

J. COLLAMER.

L. TRUMBULL.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suppose that before the Senate adopt the resolution reported by the ma-majority of the Judiciary Committee, they would wish to understand what testimony it is that is to be taken, and the points about which it is to be taken. I know that it is exceedingly difficult to get the attention of Senators to a question of this character, and yet it is a question of very great importance, vital to the organization of this body, and vital to the preservation of the Constitution and the Union. I disagree entirely with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] who says that some other question is more important than that of the organization of the two Houses of Congress. I ask him how long he supposes this Government can last, if the two Houses of Congress are made up, not of representatives legally and properly elected, but of any persons who may think proper to intrude into these Halls? I do not say that here is an improper intrusion; I am replying to the remark of the Senator from Delaware, who says some other question is higher and of more importance than that of deciding who constitute the Congress of the United States. I say it is the most important question that can be called up at any time, to determine who constitute the rightful members of this body.

If I can get the attention of Senators for a few moments to a statement of the facts of this case, it seems to me that it can be speedily decided. The minority report presents in a concise form the facts, as we understand them, about which there is no controversy; I wish to put this question to each individual Senator: "Do you propose to vote for the resolution reported by the majority of this committee?" If you do, you have some reason for it. Will you be good enough, any one of you, to tell me what it is? I ask any Senator on this floor, why will you vote for the resolution to send to Indiana to take testimony? Can you tell me what it is about which you seek to take testimony? You have the reports before you, lying on your tables, and I challenge any one to show what it is that you ask to take testimony about. The resolution says, "on the allegations of the protestants, and the sitting members." The allegations of the protestants and the sitting members are not before you. The Committee on the Judiciary have not reported them to you. Is any Senator prepared to vote for a commission to take testimony to ascertain who are the members of this body, simply because it is asked, and upon allegations about which they know nothing? The chairman of the Judiciary Committee, who has brought in this report, has not thought proper to state what the allegations are, nor what the issue is between these parties?

The whole substance of this report is simply a history of the transactions which have taken place in the Senate, since the matter was first brought to its consideration, and shows that the question has been pending here nearly a year; that a question which should be the very first to be decided by a legislative body has been left undecided for almost a year, and during three different sessions of the Senate. It was here at the regular session of the last Congress. The Legislature of Indiana was then in session; and after protesting against the right of the individuals acting as Senators here to their seats, through one of its legislative bodies, they also sent on a petition asking the Senate of the United States to settle this question, for it was then pending as to one of the Senators, and it is admitted to be identical as to both, before the Legislature of Indiana adjourned, so that in case it should be settled adversely to the sitting members, the Legislature might proceed to make a valid election. But, sir, the Senate disregarded the petition, and although I struggled to get action on it, and it seems, struggled to such an extent as to subject myself, in the opinion of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. BRIGHT,] to an undue pressing of the case, I was unable to procure the action of the Senate on that question.

A resolution was then introduced by the Judiciary Committee, recommending the taking of testimony, but the Senate declined acting on it either one way or the other. Now a similar resolution comes here, and, before it is adopted, all I would ask of Senators, is to look into the facts and see what it is about which testimony is sought to be taken. The facts being before the Senate in the minority report, let me ask, is it possible that any parol of testimony, can change or vary the state of facts as therein set forth.

A Senator of the United States, as we all know, is elected by the Legislature of a State. In the language of the Constitution, "the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof." They can be elected in no other way. Have the Senators who present themselves here been elected by the Legislature of Indiana? That is the fact to be inquired into. They say they have. We say they have not. How shall we determine that fact? Is there any other possible way to ascertain it than by going to the records of the Legislature of Indiana, and seeing what they have done? We go to Indiana. We look into her constitution. We find that her constitution provides that her Legislature shall be composed of two branches, one called the Senate and the other the House of Representatives. We find that the Senate consists by law of fifty members, the House of Representatives of one hundred members. These are matters to be learned from reading the constitution and the statutes of Indiana. No parol proof can change them. We examine the statutes of Indiana and the constitution of Indiana, and we find there is no provision in either for the election of a United States Senator. The Constitution of the United States provides that—

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations except as to the place of choosing Senators."

Congress not having done so we must look to the Legislature of Indiana to see if it has prescribed a mode for the election of Senators. It is admitted by the sitting members, and not controverted anywhere, that no provision of law exists, and that the Legislature of Indiana never has made any provision for the election of Senators. Then how is it possible, by parol proof, to show that the persons claiming the seats are entitled to them? They must be elected by the Legislature. The Legislature has prescribed no mode by law. We ascertain that by looking into the law; no mode by joint resolution; we ascertain that by looking into the journals of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Indiana, which we have before us. The constitution of that State, like the constitution of most States, requires each House to keep a journal of its proceedings. The two Houses of Indiana kept such a journal, and those journals do not show any resolution, any joint action of the two Houses; or, I may say, any action of either House for going into an election of United States Senators. How, then, can it be possible that an election has taken place? We think this transaction cannot be varied by any testimony that may be offered. But how was the election effected? I suppose, from the facts, as set forth in the minority report, which is made up from the documents which were before the Committee on the Judiciary, every one can see how this election was effected. A majority of the members of one House, that is, sixty-two out of the one hundred members of the House of Representatives, and a minority of the members of the other House; twenty-four out of the fifty members of the Senate met together, and these eighty-six men—without any resolution of the Legislature authorizing them to meet together, without any action of either branch authorizing it—proceeded to make the election. Now, can such an election be good? If the Senate of the United States is prepared to assume that a minority of one House of a Legislature, and a majority of the other, can get together on their own mere motion, and elect a Senator, then the election of these Senators is valid, and it may be settled now. If they cannot do it, it is impossible to make it valid by any testimony which can be furnished.

The Judiciary Committee admit, by sending in this report, that the title to the seats of the Senators is not good unless they can make it good by parol evidence. They have decided, by submitting this report, that some sort of evidence is material to a decision of this case. I should like to know what that evidence is. What evidence can there be material to the decision of the right of a member of the Senate to his seat; what other evidence, I mean, than that furnished by the constitution and the laws of the State, and the action of the Legislature, as exhibited by its records which it is bound, under its constitution, to keep? There can be no other evidence, as I conceive; and, therefore, it is the duty of the Senate to proceed to decide this case at once, it seems to me, without sending out a commission to take testimony which can have no effect on it.

I may imagine what is sought to be proven by parol; and if I were to imagine it, I should suppose an attempt is to be made to prove who constituted the Legislature of Indiana. Senators, are you prepared to go into that investigation? Are you prepared to go into an investigation of the title to seats of members in the State Legislatures of this Union? Will any one of you treat your States with such disrespect as to say that the Congress of the United States shall supervise the organization of your Legislatures? Are you prepared to do that? The Legislature of Indiana passed upon the title to seats of all its members. They were judges of the qualification and election of the members of their respective bodies, and from their decision there is no appeal. The Senate of the United States cannot revise that decision. It is no matter whether they were legally or illegally elected; it is enough that the proper House in Indiana determined that they were legally elected. That made their election legal, so far as their action was concerned. It matters not whether they did it fraudulently, or whether they did it rightly; we cannot investigate the motives by which they were governed in arriving at their conclusion.

What is it, then, that is sought to be proved? The committee have not informed the Senate what it is, and no man who votes for this resolution, with this report before him, can state what the point is upon which testimony is sought to be taken. We have endeavored in the minority report to show what we suppose is the point; that is, that some three State Senators were not legally elected and qualified; but that question, subsequent to the election of the sitting members here, was tried and passed upon by the Senate of Indiana. That body which met and set for some three months and published a journal of its proceedings of nearly a thousand pages, during the latter days of its session passed upon the contested seats, and by majorities varying from six to eight, decided that every Senator whose seat was contested, and who protests against the right of these members to their seats, was legally elected. Can you controvert that?

There is an allegation that they were illegally qualified. The journal of the Senate of Indiana states upon its face that they were duly qualified. Can you introduce testimony to controvert that fact? If not, for what purpose is this case to be delayed, except it be for a purpose which the Senator from Delaware has had the candor to avow, and I thank him for it—a purpose of settling by the votes of the Senators from Indiana some other question, before deciding on their title to seats. He assumes that they represent the public sentiment of Indiana. Whether that be so or not, I cannot tell. It certainly is a matter of very great question whether they represent the public sentiment of their own party to-day on this vital question threatening, as he tells us, the existence of the Union. At most, they represent but the sentiment of that party. They do not represent the hundreds of thousands of voters who are totally opposed to them, even if they represent a majority of their own party. But is that the test of the title to a seat in the Senate of the United States, whether the individual who comes here represents the popular feeling of his State, or not? Has it come to this, that this body is to be composed of men who come here with no other title than a claim not manifested by an election in the legal mode, to represent the popular feeling of their State? Why, sir, this assumption implies that it is better to have a misrepresentation of the State than no representation at all.

The Senator tells us that there will be no representatives from that State if the sitting members are denied their right to seats. Whether that will be so or not, I shall not now stop to inquire. It is enough for me to know that, if they are not entitled to seats, they ought not to occupy them; and if they are, the cloud which rests over their right should be dispelled, and they should occupy seats here undisputed. The Senate of Indiana, as a legislative body, has passed resolutions protesting against this action of a minority of its members. Twenty-seven Senators have signed a paper stating that they never have participated in this election, declaring it to be void, without the authority of law, without the concurrence of the Senate; and asking you to determine whether persons who claim seats here without their concurrence shall be entitled to hold them. That is the question.

Now, why postpone this case, which has been delayed for nearly a year, until time can be given to send out a commission to take testimony, about you know not what? When is the testimony to be taken? The resolution is as illimitable in that respect as any other. They are to have authority to take testimony. When? Until their term expires, so far as the resolution goes. It contains no limitation; it is as unbounded as to time as it is in regard to the subject-matter about which the testimony is to be taken.

In the minority report, which I believe represents fairly the statements as they were before the committee, it is stated that certain members of the Senate of Indiana were sworn in by a presiding officer chosen for the purpose by the members of the Senate designated as Republicans. What of it? Had not the members of the Senate designated as Republicans a right to swear in members? Did the fact that they were Republican members of the Senate alter the right? I suppose not. It is not said that the Republican members were not a majority. I suppose if they were, they could control the proceedings.

But, sir, there is a pretense that a joint convention was authorized to be held by the constitution of Indiana. What are the facts about that? We need no commission to take testimony to inform us what the constitution of Indiana is. That constitution contains a single provision on the subject of the two Houses meeting together, and what do you suppose it is? Here it is:

"That the returns of every election for Governor and Lieutenant Governor shall be sealed up and transmitted to the seat of Government, directed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who shall open and publish them in the presence of both Houses of the General Assembly."

Does that authorize both Houses of the General Assembly which are convened to see that publication, or which may attend to see it, to elect a Senator? Can there be any pretense for such an authority? The Speaker of the House of Representatives of Indiana did publish the votes for Governor and Lieutenant Governor, I think, on the 12th of January, 1857; and after he had published those votes, and declared them in the presence of the House of Representatives and such members of the Senate as thought proper to attend, was not that assembly to witness this counting ended? Could anything further be done by that body? What was done? A Senator, without any authority whatever, steps upon the stand and says, I adjourn this convention until the 2d day of February. He had no authority for it. He called it a convention, but he had no more authority to call it a convention in order to adjourn it, than you had, sir; and none can be shown. On the 2d day of February a minority of the Senate and a majority of the House of Representatives met together, and the presiding officer of the Senate, the Lieutenant Governor, says, I adjourn this convention to a subsequent day—I think the 4th of February. On the 4th of February the same parties met again, a majority of the Senate still being in session, protesting against this action. A minority of the Senate then go in and unite with a majority, but less than a quorum, of the House of Representatives, for it takes two thirds of each body to make a quorum, and there they proceeded to elect two gentlemen as Senators to this body.

Can any man pretend that that is an election by the Legislature of Indiana; that this was a joint convention assembled according to the authority of the Legislature or the constitution of Indiana? Why, sir, it is as far from possessing the authority to elect Senators to this body, as would be an assemblage of eighty-six persons upon the avenue who should meet there to-day and undertake to elect Senators from the State of Indiana, or the State of Illinois, or any other State. It is utterly without authority; it was not the Legislature of Indiana. Tell me, sir, that less than a quorum of the House of Representatives, and less than half the Senate of Indiana, is a Legislature upon which the Constitution of the United States has devolved the high duty of electing members of this body; and you propose by parol evidence to show that it was a Legislature! The constitution and the laws of Indiana determine what its Legislature shall be, and to them we may appeal from all your outside testimony.

For these considerations—and I wish not to detain the Senate longer than to make, if I can, a clear statement of this matter—it does seem to me that there can be no object in adopting the resolution reported by the committee. If I am correct in that, no Senator will vote for it who entertains that view, and it is our duty to proceed at once to the consideration of the right to seats, of the members whose seats are questioned, and determine it. I move, sir, to strike out of the resolution reported by the majority of the committee, all after the word "resolved," and insert,

That the Senate do now proceed to a final determination of the right to seats, of the Hon. GRAHAM N. FITCH, and the Hon. JESSE D. BRIGGS, claiming seats in this body.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Illinois may attach far less importance to the perpetuity of the Federal Union than I do. He may consider that that is a very trivial question compared with the disposition and determination of a contested seat on this floor. I do not agree with him. It may even be, for aught I know, that the honorable Senator from Illinois may consider such a consummation even a desirable event. There, too, I do not agree with him. I can conceive no evil of any kind as great and as wide-spread in its influence as the dissolution of the Federal Union. I can conceive no question equivalent in importance to the immediate disposition of one which brings that Union into hazard.

It is not my intention to enter into the assumed facts of the honorable Senator from Illinois, or to controvert his positions now for one moment. It will be time enough to do so when I consider that they properly come before the Senate. I do not mean even now to enter into the question of whether the resolution reported by the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary ought to be entertained, or the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Illinois; because I consider the disposition by reference, of the message of the President in regard to Kansas, of too high importance to give precedence to any other question whatever. Without any practical question for action before us, in regard to that message, except the mere question of reference, which must inevitably come, there is a debate going on for the purpose of agitation, and agitation perilous to the Union. I desire to see that debate ended as soon as may be, and I think no other question should interfere to prevent it.

The honorable Senator from Illinois seems to have an extreme care over the interests of the State of Indiana, to take a peculiar interest in the welfare of the people of that State; and yet all the delay that has occurred in the disposition of this question can fairly be attributed to him. At the last session of Congress, the committee reported a resolution precisely similar to this, except that it applied to but one of the sitting members, instead of both. The pressure of business at the date of the report prevented its disposition. At the special session of the Senate, on the 12th of March, the Senate, having got through with its executive business, determined to adjourn on the 14th. On the 13th, when there could be nothing more done, and no evil could arise from the Senators from Indiana remaining in their places till the commencement of this session, the resolution was again reported by the Judiciary Committee. These facts I found when I became its chairman at this session; and on the motion of the honorable Senator from Illinois to amend that resolution leading to debate, knowing that the session was to be terminated on the succeeding day, of necessity the case went over, and that evidence which might have been acquired in the course of the vacation, the sitting members were precluded from obtaining. Can it be that the honorable Senator desires to deprive any member of this body of testimony which he deems important as affecting his right to a seat in this body? Can it be that there is anything in that testimony which may make developments awkward or unpleasant to any gentleman? Can it be that there is anything in that testimony which may show a very irregular interference on the part of the Representatives of one State for the purpose of disorganizing the Legislature of another State? Can such things be; or from what motive can it be, that the honorable Senator from Illinois prevented the taking of testimony by interposing an amendment which was utterly useless, when, but for his interposition, we should have had all the facts before us at the commencement of this session; and now urges us to go on and decide this case without taking the same testimony, without regard to any other question whatever?

Mr. President the honorable Senator from Illinois has been pleased, no doubt unwillingly, to pervert very much a remark of mine made in the debate of yesterday. He speaks of my having avowed the purpose of settling the admission of Kansas by the votes of the Senators from Indiana. I avowed no such purpose. My position is reported in the debates of yesterday. Take it altogether, and to my mind it is apparent enough. I am willing to abide by it. I will not trouble the Senate now by any disquisition on that, further than to say that I made no such declaration as the Senator attributes to me; I referred to the fact that there was no contesting member, and endeavored by a collateral argument to show that it was not so important to deprive a State of her delegation in this body, where they came here with the prima facie evidence of title to their seats, and where, as a well-known fact outside of any proof, they certainly represented the public sentiment of Indiana, as that, in consideration of important questions, we might not postpone it with more propriety than if there had been a contesting member in the case. This is the substance of what I said.

Now, sir, I am perfectly willing, whenever it is the desire of the Senate, to have this question disposed of. As regards my own vote, however, I adhere to the position I took, that I considered the first subject which the Senate ought to dispose of, and I trust a majority of the Senators will concur with me, is the reference of the message of the President as to the Kansas constitution to its appropriate committee, in order that we may have that question brought before us at the earliest possible day. Until that reference is made I am indisposed to take up debatable questions. If there were to be no debate here, if it were a mere question whether the resolution should pass or not, without debate, I should not be disposed to interfere; but my honorable friend from Vermont, if he will allow me so to style him, differs with me as to the propriety of our resolution, and desires to discuss the question. I also do, and my colleagues on the Judiciary Committee entertain the same desire. Under these circumstances, for effecting the purpose I have in view—the disposition of the question which I think ought first to be disposed of—I move to lay these proceedings on the table.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to read what he did say yesterday, without comment, to show whether I misstated it or not?

Mr. BAYARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will read from the remarks of the Senator from Delaware yesterday on this subject, as reported in the Globe:

"I am perfectly aware that there are questions which must be decided by the Senate ultimately as to the legality of the election; but of the broad, general fact, which I can look at outside of that, that these Senators represent the public sentiment of the State of Indiana, I can entertain no doubt. Under these circumstances, when a question is to arise important to the destinies of this Union, why should not a sovereign State of the Union be represented, even though it be that it may turn out ultimately that the election was not in that form which the Constitution of the United States requires, and therefore invalid?"

Mr. BAYARD. It matters very little, of course, whether I have in the heat of debate used an expression broadly or not. I still say that the purpose attributed to me by the honorable Senator from Illinois, as charged by him, is not sustained by what he has read. His language was that I had avowed the purpose of retaining them here in order to settle the Kansas question. In the course of debate I simply stated exactly what is said there, as he has read it. I made use of it as a subsequent argument, that I did not consider it an objection that a sovereign State, where I knew her sentiments, stood in that position that we should be hurried to dispose of it, when we had important questions before us. Is that the avowal of a determination to keep them here for that purpose? Far from it; but that I did not consider it a reason for proceeding at once to the decision.

Besides, in order to understand a man's views in the course of debate, I rather think that all he has said ought to be taken together. It is very easy to quote a part of the context from any paper or book whatever, and give to it a meaning from the looseness of the spoken language which would not otherwise be attributed to it when the whole sense is taken together; but I think that, even taking the mere extract which the honorable Senator has seen fit to read, he has not sustained his allegation, which he made to-day, that I had avowed that my object or purpose in delaying these proceedings was to enable these Senators to vote on this floor on the Kansas question. I renew the motion to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. TRUMBULL called for the yeas and nays on the motion; and they were ordered.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I wish to interpose no delay to a decision of the question which has been under discussion, of the right to seats on this floor. Considering its question of privilege, and that it is very important to decide it, I shall be ready to coöperate in deciding it at an early day; but I am unwilling to take up any question now to the exclusion of the reference of the President's message to the Committee on Territories, believing that it is important to have that reference at as early a day as practicable. I shall therefore vote against giving any subject priority over the question of reference.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 28, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Broderick, Cameron, Clay, Davis, Douglas, Evans, Green, Gwin, Houston, Hunter, Iversen, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Stuart, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—18.

So the report and resolution were ordered to lie on the table.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I desire to offer a resolution, calling for information which will hasten our action on the Kansas question. I will read it for information; but if it gives rise to debate, of course it will go over:

Resolved, That the President be requested to furnish all the information within his possession or control on the following points:

1. The returns and votes for and against a convention at an election held in the Territory of Kansas, in October, 1856.
2. The census and registration of votes in the Territory of Kansas, under the provisions of the act of said Legislature, passed in February, 1857, providing for the election of delegates and assembling a convention to frame a constitution.
3. The returns of an election held in said Territory, on the 21st of December, 1857, under the schedule of the Lecompton constitution, upon the question of "constitution with slavery" or "constitution without slavery."
4. The returns of an election held in the Territory of Kansas, on the 4th day of January, 1858, under the authority of a law passed by the Legislature of said Territory, submitting the constitution formed by the Lecompton convention to a vote of the people for ratification or rejection.
5. The returns of the election held in said Territory, on the 4th day of January, 1858, under the schedule of the Lecompton constitution, for Governor and other State officers, and for members of the Legislature, specifying the names of each officer to whom a certificate of election has been accorded, and the number of votes cast and counted for each candidate, and distinguishing between the votes returned within the time and in the mode provided in said schedule, and those returned subsequently and in other modes, and stating whether at either of said elections any returns of votes were rejected in consequence of not having been returned in time, or to the right officer, or in proper form, or for any other cause, stating specifically for what cause.
6. All correspondence between any of the Executive Departments and Secretary or Governor Denver relating to Kansas affairs, and which has not been communicated to the Senate.

Resolved, That in the event all the information desired in the foregoing resolution is not now in the possession of the President, or of any of the Executive Departments, he be respectfully requested to give the proper orders and take the necessary steps to procure the same for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foot in the chair.) The Senator from Illinois asks the unanimous consent of the Senate for the consideration of these resolutions.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Of course, if objection is made, I shall waive it; but I must say I deem this information essential before we can proceed with the consideration of the subject.

Mr. SLIDELL. Let them lie over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It requires unanimous consent to consider the resolutions. If no member objects, they will be considered now.

Mr. SLIDELL. There is objection.

Mr. MASON. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the resolutions will lie over under the rules.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. BIGLER to refer the message of the President, communicating the Lecompton constitution, to the Committee on Territories, the pending question being on the instructions proposed by Mr. WILSON.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] in opening the discussion on the Kansas question at this session, took the position that the President of the United States had committed a "fundamental error" in stating that the Lecompton convention was bound to submit the slavery clause to the people of Kansas, but was not bound to submit any other portion of the constitution. I am not going to discuss with the Senator the point whether this was a fundamental or a superficial error, and yet I think it was an error. I take the ground that the Lecompton convention was not bound to submit the whole constitution, or any part of it; and that the error into which the President fell was not that stated by the Senator from Illinois, but the one indicated by myself—to wit, in assuming that the convention was under obligation to refer any part of the constitution to the people. It might refer the whole, if it chose; it might refer any part, if it chose; or it might not refer either the whole or a part.

If this be not so, it seems to me that the whole doctrine of non-intervention passes for nothing. What, sir, lay down the broad principle that the people of the Territory are to regulate their domestic affairs in their own way, and then interpose your authority at every step—tell them what they shall and what they shall not do; that they must submit this clause of the constitution and that they need not submit others; or that they must submit the whole constitution, or that they shall not submit any part of it! I apprehend that the true doctrine is—not only upon sound original principles, but on the principles embodied in the Kansas bill itself—that you have no right to interpose your authority; but the people of Kansas, or the convention speaking for the people, might either submit the constitution or not, as they chose, or submit the whole of it or any part of it. This must be so if you leave them free to regulate their own affairs in their own way.

I think the President erred. I think he fell into an error in his instructions to Mr. Walker originally on the subject of submitting the constitution to the people. In the instructions he says:

"When such a constitution shall be submitted to the people of the Territory, they must be protected in the exercise of their right of voting for or against that instrument, and the fair expression of the popular will must not be interrupted by fraud or violence."

This, I think, was an error; yet it was not so grave an error as has been charged. Mark you, the President did not say to Governor Walker, as the Governor afterwards very adroitly assumed he had said, that "the constitution must be submitted;" "it shall be submitted;" or "it ought to be submitted." He authorized him to employ no such language, but he assumed that it was to be done as a matter of course. I should have preferred that the President had assumed no such thing; but rather that, in the language of the law itself, he should have left the people of the Territory perfectly free, either to submit it or not, without any suggestion from the executive power of this Government. But if you will scrutinize the language, it will be seen that there is a vast difference between that employed by the President and that attributed to him by those who choose to criticize his instructions. While I say that I think the President committed an error in this point, I must also declare that it was an error into which he might very easily have fallen; for the reason that there had been an assumption in the debates here on the Minnesota question that these constitutions must be submitted; and in the Minnesota case, Congress determined that it should be done. The President, therefore, might very easily have fallen into that error; and seeing that he did it, innocently, in all probability, and that it amounted to very little after he had fallen into it, I have never felt disposed to criticize his instructions to Mr. Walker. My criticism has always been on the manner in which the instructions were carried out. When the President assumed that the thing was to be done, Mr. Walker had no right to conclude that he had been ordered to have it done. There is a great deal of difference between assuming that a thing is to be done as a matter of course, and ordering it by authority to be done, whether the people like to have it done or not.

The instructions to which the sentence I have quoted was a prelude, went to a different point. The instructions were—and strangely enough, the Republican Senators overlook them—that the election should be a fair one; that the Governor should, if necessary, use the military power of the Government to prevent disturbances at the polls. Assuming that the constitution was to be submitted, not directing that it should be done, the President gave the very proper direction that the election should be fair; and that, if the military power should be necessary, the Governor should employ it to prevent either fraud or violence at the polls. Overlooking these proper instructions, the President is constantly criticised as having given a specific instruction to do that which he assumed would be done without instruction, or without invitation.

If this constitution be rejected, the fact can never be disguised from the great American public that it owes its rejection solely and entirely to the slavery clause. Gentlemen may resort to all manner of sophistry; they may resort to all manner of argument; but still, at last, the broad fact stands out staring the world in the face, that the constitution is to be rejected because it tolerates slavery. It is true that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. STUART] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] speak of what strike them as objectionable features in the constitution, with reference to banks, railroads, and schools, and all that; but will one of them get up now and say, "I would vote to reject the constitution solely on these grounds?"

Mr. DOUGLAS. I desire to respond to that interrogatory now. If the Lecompton constitution was a free-State constitution, I would vote to reject it. To show the Senator from Mississippi that he ought to have so inferred from my former action, I will remind him that my speech against it was made before the vote was taken on the 21st of December, on the slavery clause, and at a time when it was almost universally conceded that the pro-slavery clause was to be voted out; and that the constitution was to come here with a provision for "no slavery." My speech was made against it under the probability that Kansas under it was to be a free State. I took the ground then, that you had no more right to force a free-State constitution on the people against their will, than you had to force a slave-State constitution on them against their wishes. I now say to the Senator that my vote is given without any reference, directly or indirectly, to the slavery question. It is predicated on the great fact that a majority of that people are utterly opposed to this instrument as their fundamental law, and that you have no right to force it upon them either as a slave-State or a free-State constitution against their will. If they want a slave State, let them have it. I will give them every chance to express an opinion for a slave or a free State as they choose, and I will take them into the Union whichever way they decide that question.

Mr. STUART. I intimated yesterday my disinclination to interfere with the speech of the Senator from Mississippi, and stated that at the proper time I should take occasion to reply to all that he had said of me, in full; and I had hoped that the Senator would not find it necessary, in the further discussion of this question, to refer again to me. He has done it, however, and done it in such a manner that my silence might authorize him, and authorize his constituents, for whom, he informed us yesterday, he was speaking, to infer that I should have voted for the admission of Kansas with this constitution, if it had been a free-State constitution. Now, sir, I stated distinctly in my speech, and, if the Senator will take the trouble to look at it he will find it there, that it made no difference with me whether the constitution with slavery or the constitution without slavery were presented. And I stated then, show me that the constitution embodies the will of the people of that Territory, and I shall vote for it, whether I like its provisions or not; but, believing that this instrument is decidedly against the will and wishes of a large majority of that people, and being convinced that this is no longer a debatable point, but one which has been demonstrated by that people at the polls, I stated that there was no power under the Constitution to admit them as a State. The Constitution, in my judgment, authorizes the admission of a State when requested by a majority of its people; but not the coercion of a State into the Union against a majority of its people.

Mr. BROWN. Neither of the Senators has answered my question. I was advertised before that they were resisting the admission of Kansas on the ground that her constitution was not acceptable to the people of Kansas; and yesterday I answered that objection, and shall probably have to repeat some of the arguments to-day: especially if this colloquy goes on. But the point to which I was calling the attention of the Senators was this: they have criticised the railroad policy, the banking policy, the school policy, and other features embodied in this constitution. Will they vote to reject the constitution on one or all of these grounds?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will answer again that I should not vote to reject the constitution because I did not like its railroad policy; or because I did not like its revenue policy; or because I did not like its system of elective franchise; or because I did not like its slavery policy. I should not vote against it on any or all of these grounds; but I vote against it upon this ground: I do not care what provision the people of Kansas insert in their constitution on each, all, or any of these subjects. Whatever they want to put there they may have; but I vote against it because this constitution does not meet their will—because they are opposed to it. If they are opposed to it only because they do not like the elective franchise, you have no right to force it on them. You have no right—it is not your province—to judge of the sufficiency of their objection. So with the slavery question. My opposition, I repeat, has no connection with the slavery question. I stand on the principle that the people of Kansas have a right to make their own constitution, and have it embody their own will; and I will stand by that right, whether the result be to make Kansas a slave State or a free State, and any other motive attributed to me is unjust, and proven to be unjust by the fact that I denounced this as a fraud at a time when it was universally conceded here that the pro-slavery clause was to be stricken out. Mr. GREEN. You say "universally conceded." I say, no, sir.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Perhaps there may have been here and there an exception, but I made the objection at a time when the President of the United States told all his friends that he was perfectly sure the pro-slavery clause would be voted down. I did it at a time when all or nearly all the Senators on this floor supposed the pro-slavery clause would be stricken out. I assumed in my speech that it was to be returned out, and that the constitution was to come here with that article rejected. I made my speech against it therefore as a free-State constitution. The whole speech proceeded on that ground. Now I submit whether it is candid or just to intimate that my objection is on account of the slavery clause? I stand here prepared to prove, and intend to prove, that this constitution is not the act of the people of Kansas; that it does not embody their will, and that there is no lawful authority to put it in operation against their wishes.

Mr. BROWN. We have heard very often from the Senator from Illinois that his objection to the Lecompton constitution is chiefly and mainly that it is not the act of the people. When, however, I heard him elaborately criticise the banking policy, the railroad, school, and other policies indicated in the constitution, I took it for granted that they had made some lodgment on his mind. I was endeavoring to ascertain to what extent—whether to a sufficient extent to induce him to vote for a rejection of the constitution. I now understand him to say distinctly that he would not vote to reject the constitution on account of any policy of that sort, either bank, railroad, school, or any other.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Or slavery.

Mr. BROWN. Or slavery, or all combined.

Mr. DOUGLAS. All combined would not induce me to vote against it, provided it was the will of the people.

Mr. BROWN. Then I come to discuss the question with the Senator again, and very briefly to recapitulate what I said yesterday on the point of this constitution being the act of the people. I said then, and now repeat, that unless it is the act of the people it is no constitution, and ought not to be accepted; but I have one mode of ascertaining what is the will of the people, and the Senator has another, and a different mode of ascertaining it. If the will of the people has been ascertained at the time and place, and in accordance with the mode appointed by law, that is all I require. If, as I undertook to show yesterday, the ballot-box was thrown wide open, a free and unrestricted invitation given to all men of all parties to come forward and vote, and the time was allowed to pass by, the opportunity to vote was suffered to go unimproved, those who did not vote cannot claim that they carried the election as against those who voted. I undertook to illustrate that idea by showing that, if in a congressional district on the day appointed by law, when the ballot-boxes are all opened, the judges, and superintendents, and clerks all there, but one third, nay, if but one tenth of all the votes are polled for a particular candidate, he is elected, and it is not competent for the other nine tenths to hold a mass meeting on the next day, and declare the election void. I said, yesterday, that I have two honored colleagues in the other House of Congress, who received at the election in Mississippi about two fifths of all the votes in their districts. They had no opponents. The opposition did not vote because voting would be fruitless. A large portion of their friends seeing that there was no contest, did not vote, and but a small vote was polled. I submit to Senators whether it would be competent for the other three fifths, who did not vote, to call a mass meeting, and declare that my venerable friend, General QUITMAN, was not elected a member of Congress, because he only got two fifths of the votes of his district. He got about five thousand votes out of some fourteen thousand. The remainder were presumed, as in all such cases, to have acquiesced in the result; but, whether they did or not, I take the ground that they could not hold an election the next day, and determine that General QUITMAN was not elected. When the time came, when the polls were opened at the right place, and the people had an opportunity to vote, if they did not do it, it was their own fault.

The Senator from Illinois says he agrees with me there. If he does, I ask whether, in the manner of submitting this constitution, all was not done which those who had taken part in the election required to be done? That takes us back to the election of delegates. I discussed yesterday, and do not care to repeat it all to-day, the question whether, in the matter of disregarding instructions, as was charged upon Mr. Calhoun and his associates, they had violated any public sentiment in the Territory to which they were in any wise amenable. I do not discuss the question whether they violated pledges or instructions or not; I simply say that there is no complaint from those who voted for them.

Mr. SPURGEON. If the Senator will allow me to interpose now, as I am about to go out, I will only say this: so far as I am concerned, I have no disposition to interrupt him, or raise any dispute with him at this time in regard to his effort to prove that this constitution is the will and the wish of the people of Kansas. I should not have interrupted him at all, if he had not indicated at least a design to charge me with an intention to vote against the constitution because it was now a pro-slavery constitution, when I otherwise would not have done so. That I thought was unfair, when I had entirely shut the door against that conclusion in the very speech I made. I desire to take as little of the time of the Senator as possible; and, therefore, shall say nothing further at present.

Mr. BROWN. I am sure I am very glad to hear the Senator say so; but unless he intended to control his vote by his speech, I really cannot see much use in making the speech. The greater portion of the Senator's speech was taken up with criticisms on the bank policy, the railroad policy, the land policy, and the school policy of Kansas. If he was not going to vote to reject the constitution on these grounds, I certainly do not see any reason for assigning them as objections to the constitution; however, our tastes differ on that subject.

On the point to which I was addressing myself a few moments ago, a friend has handed me a speech, pronounced by a very distinguished statesman of this country in 1843, which is so apposite that I will take the liberty, with the indulgence of the Senate, of having read one or two short paragraphs. It is a speech pronounced by Mr. Webster, and published on the 19th of February, 1843, in Niles's Register.

Mr. GREEN read, as follows:

"Is it not obvious enough that men cannot get together, and count themselves, and say they are so many hundreds and so many thousands, and judge of their own qualifications, and call themselves the people, and set up a government? Why, another set of men, for miles off, on the same day, with the same propriety, with as good qualifications and in as large numbers, may meet and set up a government for themselves—one may meet at Newport, and another at Chepachet, and both may call themselves the people. What is this but anarchy? What liberty is there here but a tumultuary, tempestuous, violent, stormy liberty—a sort of South American liberty, without power, except in spasms—a liberty supported by arms to-day, crushed by arms to-morrow. Is that our liberty?"

"This regular action of popular power, on the other hand, places upon public liberty the most beautiful face that ever adorned that angel form. All is regular and harmonious in its features, and gentle in its operation. The stream of public authority, under American liberty, running in this channel, has the strength of the Missouri, while its waters are as transparent as those of a crystal lake. It is powerful for good. It produces no tumult, no violence, and no wrong. Its well enough described in those lines of Sir Thomas Denman—it is a stream

"Though deep yet clear, though gentle yet not full, Strong without rage, without overflowing full."

Mr. DOUGLAS. I endorse heartily every word there is in that beautiful passage from Mr. Webster's speech. I should like to know on what question it was made.

Mr. BROWN. On the Rhode Island question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. So I supposed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I thought so.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Then it was a speech against the right to change an existing constitution in opposition to the constituted government in existence, and is a beautiful authority against the right under the Lecompton constitution to change it in any mode except that authorized by the Constitution, and I am very much obliged to the Senator for having quoted it on this occasion.

Mr. BROWN. I quote the sentiment for what it says, that public opinion is to be ascertained under the forms of law, and not through mob meetings; I did not allude to the subject on which it was made, though that subject lies in the line of my speech, and I shall come to it by-and-by, if I can only be permitted to proceed without interruption.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I beg the Senator's pardon for interrupting him.

Mr. BROWN. Not at all.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I wish to state that I would not have interrupted him if he had not specially invited me. He said many things before in his speech to which I wished to reply; but I permitted them to pass in silence, because I did not wish to interrupt him. I will say to him now, while I am obliged to him for his courtesy, that I will not interrupt him any more.

Mr. BROWN. I have no objection to being interrupted on a point which I have reached in the progress of my speech; but bringing in outside matters, gentlemen must see, takes a Senator outside of the line of his argument, and when he comes to publish it, it makes it cumbersome and unwieldy.

When these interruptions were interposed, I was about commenting on the charge (and I am doing it for the second time in answer to the Senator's suggestion, because I feel it necessary to put it in juxtaposition with what he has said on the oft-repeated charge) that the delegates to the convention disregarded the instructions and will of their constituents. I said yesterday, I say again to-day, that there is no charge coming up from those who supported Mr. Calhoun and his associates, that their will has been violated. Those persons in Kansas who are denounced by the Senator from Illinois, by Governor Walker, and by those who have watched their course and conduct most critically, as traitors to the country, and who did not take any part in the elections, now come forward and complain that the delegates, not chosen by themselves, and at elections in which they took no part, have not fulfilled their pledges.

I undertake to say, as I said yesterday, as a Democratic Senator, that I am responsible on party questions to the Democratic sentiment of my State, and to no other sentiment; and if I stand to-day under a pledge to my party to do a particular thing, and to-morrow they hold meetings and absolve me from the obligation to redeem the pledge, then I am free, and no one else has the right to complain. Sir, it is a pretty business if the enemy may force a man to redeem pledges to his own friends, when his friends do not want the pledges redeemed. Now, I undertake to say that Mr. Calhoun and his associates were released in public meetings, by their friends, from any real or supposed obligations to redeem their pledges, and they never have complained. The complaint comes from a different quarter. It comes from men who are in open rebellion against the government there; who refused to take any part in the election; who trampled the authority of Congress under foot, and could only be kept down by the presence of an armed soldiery in their midst. I simply protest that they have no right to make complaints. If they have not, and if the constitution was made in accordance with the will of those who triumphed in the election, and was submitted so far as they required that it should be submitted, who else has a right to complain? I shall not go over all these points again.

Mr. President, if Congress has the right to reject this whole constitution, has it not a right to reject any part of it? Does not the major proposition include the minor? If you have the right to reject the constitution for any other reason than that reserved in the Constitution of the United States, to wit, that it is not republican, where are you to stop? If you reject the whole, cannot you simply reject the pro-slavery clause, or the bank clause, or the railroad clause, or anything else that may be objectionable to you? If you can, what becomes of the doctrine of non-intervention—this boasted doctrine that the people may form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only—not, mark you, to your authority; subject not to the authority of Congress or the President; but subject only to the authority of the Constitution of the United States—that Constitution which affixes but one condition, that the constitution of the State asking admission shall be republican in form.

I have asked what becomes of the doctrine of non-intervention? and I would ask, again, what becomes of this boasted doctrine that the people are to be allowed, in the name of popular sovereignty, to regulate their domestic affairs in their own way, if you are to interpose at every point to tell them what they shall do and what they shall not do, and not only what they shall do, but when and how they shall do it? It is well known that I have very little respect for the doctrine of "popular sovereignty." I always regarded it as a catch-word of politicians. I always believed that it would lead to mischief. It has led to mischief. What gives you your disturbance in Utah to-day but this clap-trap about popular sovereignty? You told Brigham Young and his deluded followers that they were popular sovereigns: that they had the right to do as they pleased; and they very naturally inquired, "if we have, by what authority do you assume to appoint a Governor to rule us, judges to expound our laws, and marshals and sheriffs to execute them. We are popular sovereigns; these things belong to us." The President told them that they were popular sovereigns; the Secretary of State told them so; all the great men in the land told them so; and all the little ones, too, except myself and one or two others. They believed it, and because they believed it and acted on their convictions, you are going to do—what? Send an army there to shoot them, every one. I am not interposing any apology for Brigham. I think he was a great fool ever to believe politicians, but I would not shoot him because he is a fool. I simply say that his course is a legitimate and fair consequence from the doctrines which you gave him. You told him that he and his people were sovereigns of the land, and he acted like a sovereign. He will not give up the office of Governor to the President or anybody else, and he has turned your judges out of the Territory. The same doctrine prevails in Kansas. Jim Lane and his followers think that they are popular sovereigns; that they have a right to do as they please; to overturn the lawful government if they are in a majority, and do it without going through the forms of law; that they have nothing to do but call a mass meeting at Topeka, resolve that they are a majority, then act on their resolves, and overturn the government. It is a very convenient way of solving a difficulty, I grant you; something like the old resolves in New England, when the people resolved that the earth and the fullness thereof was the Lord's and his saints, and then they resolved that they were the saints of the Lord; and so took possession of the land.

I said to the Senator from Illinois, a short time ago, that the Rhode Island matter lay in the course of my remarks, and that I would come to it presently. I will take it up here. The difficulty as to the Rhode Island case, I apprehend, was that by the election laws of that State, a very large portion of the people were disfranchised; that is, they were not allowed to vote. They had property and other qualifications there which disfranchised a large portion of the people. These who were disfranchised, together with their friends who had the right to vote, had a majority; but of the voting population, a majority was opposed to changing the constitution. They appealed and appealed again for the privilege of voting, so as to show that the whole adult population of the State would change the constitution if the privilege was given them; but the Legislature refused.

Mr. SIMMONS. If it is of any consequence at all to have the facts in the argument, I will tell the Senator he is mistaken about the facts.

Mr. BROWN. Very well.

Mr. SIMMONS. If it is of no consequence I will not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. BROWN. If I am mistaken in the facts as far as I have gone, of course I wish to be corrected.

Mr. SIMMONS. I stated the facts the other day, in the little allusion I had occasion to make to them. At the time those meetings were being held and before they began to be held, the government of Rhode Island had authorized a convention for the purpose of framing a constitution with the view of altering this matter; but in order to prevent that or to prevent another party from having the credit of it, these people began to roast oxen and have the sort of meetings which I described the other day. These are the facts, if they are of any consequence.

Mr. BROWN. Of course I shall make no point with the Senator from Rhode Island as to the facts of that controversy. I was only stating them briefly as I understood them, by way of showing the ground for the position I was going to take; but I can do it as well without a recapitulation of the facts of that case. It is sufficient for me that the Dorr party in Rhode Island undertook to change the constitution of the State, or to make a new constitution, without going through the forms of law, and without legal sanction; and Mr. Webster, on that proposition, whatever may have been the precise facts of the case, pronounced the speech which has been read here to-day. Now, if the doctrine of popular sovereignty is to prevail, law or no law, then Dorr was right, because he and his friends constituted, as I understand, a majority of all the people, though they were not a majority of the voters of Rhode Island. If they could have voted, I dare say they would have appealed to the ballot-box. I always understood that to be the fact. Very many of them, as I said before, had the privilege of voting, but many of them had not. I do not pretend to say that Dorr did right. I think he did very wrong. I never sympathized with his movements, but I thought his party were an oppressed party. That was my opinion; but I saw only one way of changing the organic law or laws of any kind, and that was to do it in the mode pointed out by the law—through the peaceful agency of the ballot-box; and anything else is revolution.

But if the popular-sovereignty doctrine is to prevail, Dorr was right if he had the majority on his side. If he had the majority on his side, he had the right to control the government, law or no law, precisely as Brigham Young is trying to control the Government of Utah, law or no law; precisely as Lane and his Topeka followers are undertaking to control Kansas, law or no law. They claim to be the majority, and it was to that point I wished to invite the attention of the Senator from Illinois. It was to the point that these movements in Kansas were without sanction of any binding or valid law; that the law, so far as the constitution was concerned, had fulfilled its entire mission when the election was held and the votes returned, and by no subsequent act of the Legislature could the constitution thus formed be overturned, and much less could it be done through the agency of mass meetings or popular clamor. Therefore it was that I said to the Senator that I choose to gather public opinion through the agencies appointed by law, through the ballot-box, and at the time and in the manner prescribed by the statutes. The Lecompton constitution has been adopted, if that be the rule. If, on the other hand, we are to take the Dorr rule, or the Brigham Young rule, or the Jim Lane rule, and appeal to the masses without law, then it may be that the constitution has not been adopted.

I have said, and I repeat, that the Senator from Illinois brought forward the Kansas bill originally, and he, of all men, is called upon to make the greatest sacrifice to sustain it according to the letter of the law as drafted by himself. Whatever other men might do, it does not lie in the mouth of the Senator from Illinois to avoid the force of the contract by any resort to special pleading. He, at least, ought to give it a fair and full and liberal construction, and mete out to us all that it gives, knowing, as he does, that his Democratic friends at the South accepted it with extreme reluctance. There is more than one Senator in my eye who will bear me witness that I voted for his bill with extreme reluctance. I had seen how compromises had been construed away before; how compacts, into which we had entered, had been kept with Punic faith, and I was slow to go into it. I went for it as much because I thought I was following a gallant leader who, come what might, would adhere to the law, and see that we had justice under it, as for any other reason; but when, as I think, he abandons it, my feeling of regret for ever having gone for it, is greatly quickened. For a long time I thought the Senator did mean to give us the Kansas-Nebraska law in its purity. I recollect that when Senators on the other side first raised the cry against the fraudulent Territorial Legislature, as they termed it—first denounced it as a bogus Legislature, forced on Kansas by the people of Missouri—with what indignation the Senator from Illinois rose to repel the charge; how stoutly he stood up for the legitimacy of that Legislature; how he hurled the firebrands back into the teeth of gentlemen. Still they make these charges; still they make it as the ground work of all their speeches, that the Legislature was a bogus Legislature. The junior Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] in commencing his speech on this subject the other day, laid the foundation of it in the charge that this was a fraudulent and bogus Legislature; that the laws which it had passed were no laws at all; and the charge yesterday was reiterated with greater earnestness by the Senator from Massachusetts. Why was not the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] then as quick as in days gone by to rise and repel these charges against this Legislature? He had reported to Congress, he had time and again spoken to us, he had satisfied me at least, that it was as fair a Legislature as ever was chosen, and as much entitled to make laws.

The principles of the Kansas bill were carried into the Cincinnati platform. There again they received the cordial approbation of the Senator from Illinois. It was never until this constitution had been formed, and was upon the eve of being sent to us, (for nothing was to be gone through with but the mere form of an election before the people on the slavery clause,) that we heard the first complaint from the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS.] Then it was that he interposed objection; and I beg leave to say to the honorable Senator that while I accept as true all he has said to-day, still I think the facts justify me, and justify his southern friends, in believing that slavery has something to do with resistance even on his part. Mark you, I do not charge that it is so, because the Senator denies it, and what an honorable Senator asserts I will not deny where I have no proof; and I can have none in a case of this sort. I only state the facts as reasons for my own conclusions.

The Senator complains, and has complained heretofore—perhaps it was not exactly a complaint, but he has said—that there was a disposition among some of his Democratic brethren to read him out of the party. I have no such disposition. I should part with him with extreme regret. I am sure there is not a Democrat in all the land who would not make any reasonable sacrifice to secure the fidelity of the Senator, not only on this question, but on all other questions. But, Mr. President, this is a vital question; it is a question of vast magnitude; and even at the risk of being lectured again by the venerable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] for whose judgment I have the profoundest regard on this and all other subjects, I will venture again to suggest that there are wrapt up in the destinies of this question the perpetuity of the Union itself. How do parties stand on this question? The National Democrats, North and South, are for the admission of Kansas, with here and there an exception. The President is at our head, backed by a united Cabinet. The Democratic presses throughout all the country thunder in our ears that a bill for that purpose ought to pass. Mass meetings being held in New York, Charleston, New Orleans, North and South, almost everywhere, urging the passage of it. Legislatures resolve in favor of its being passed—the whole party, in a word, North and South, is sustaining the measure, and the whole sectional Republican party on the other side opposing it. Sir, the spectacle which you have in this Senate is seen all over the country—the great mass of the Democratic party is on the one side, and the great mass of the Republican party on the other. The American party, what little there is of it, I believe is somewhat divided. It is a pity, too, for there is hardly enough of it to divide. [Laughter.]

Well, sir, this being the state and magnitude of the question—a question which involves the integrity of the Democratic party certainly, and which involves, in all probability, the perpetuity of the Union, the Democratic party standing arrayed on one side, and the Republican party on the other—where is the Senator from Illinois? Is he on the Democratic side? Does he stand where he stood three years ago? Are his consultations with us? No, sir, he stands on this question with the Republican members. On this vital question—vital to the integrity and to the perpetuity of the party; vital, as I believe before God and angels, to the safety of the Union itself—the Senator from Illinois has taken sides with the Republicans against the Democrats. If he is out of the party, it is not because he has been turned out, but because he has voluntarily walked out.

Mr. President, the constitution of Kansas is here, and, but for this debate, it would probably have been reported from the committee, and we should be called on, each and all and every one of us, to vote either to accept or reject it. I shall vote for its acceptance. I should vote for it just as freely if it were an anti-slavery constitution. If there was a total want of any word, sign, or syllable in it, from the beginning to the end, looking to the protection of slave property; nay, sir, if there were a total prohibition against slavery, I would vote for it. Why? Because that was the compact into which the Senator from Illinois invited me, and into which I entered. I vote for it; I think he ought to do so; but if he will not, let it be otherwise.

Now as to whether the people of Kansas are to live under this constitution after it is made: they are to live under it just so long as they choose; but when they choose to throw it off and make a new constitution and go to work according to the forms of law as it is written, they have the right to do it, in my opinion, without the slightest regard to anything that may be inside or outside of the constitution. I understand that the constitution secures the universal exercise of the elective franchise in the State of Kansas, that all men are allowed to vote. The Senator has told us to-day—he has told us with equal emphasis on other occasions—that a vast majority of the people of Kansas are opposed to this constitution. If they are, let them manifest that opposition in some legal form. When the election comes on for Governor and members of the Legislature, if they have not already secured those officers, let them secure them; let a new convention be called; let the constitution be changed; let it be made a free constitution as you call it, and I have not one word to say against it here or elsewhere. Let it be so.

Mr. PUGH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question at this point?

Mr. BROWN. Certainly.

Mr. PUGH. I wish to ask the Senator whether he admits the right to amend this constitution as well previous to 1864 as subsequently?

Mr. BROWN. I do. I would not care if it had declared on every page of it that it should be unalterable. I believe that the right to alter, and amend, and abolish forms of government is inherent in the people. All I demand is that the right shall be exercised under the forms of law, and not through mob violence—not in the mode of Dorr, and Brigham Young, and Jim Lane; but in the orderly, peaceable, and quiet mode in which constitutions have been changed in other States—New York, Massachusetts, Ohio, and everywhere else.

Mr. PUGH. I did not interrupt the Senator to make a controversy with him. I fully agree with him on the point; but I only wished to ascertain his opinion.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROWN. Certainly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understand him to say that he believes the people may change the constitution before 1864, provided they do it according to the forms of law.

Mr. BROWN. Exactly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish now to ask him if any law passed by the Legislature contravening that provision of the Lecompton constitution would have any force whatever? Would not that be in violation of the law, and would not every court be bound so to hold.

Mr. BROWN. I did not expect to be asked to point out to the Republicans precisely how they could change the constitution; but still, if they ask me I will tell them. They can do it precisely in this way: if they have not already secured the Governor and Legislature, which I believe is a disputed question, and have that four fifths or nineteen twentieths about which the Senator from Illinois is constantly talking, if they have that strength, when the next election comes on, just go to the polls like peaceable, orderly, quiet citizens, and exercise the right of voting, elect a Legislature, and elect a Governor. Then let your Legislature, being instructed as they would be by your people, that they wanted to change the constitution, appoint a day, not when they (the Legislature) will change it, or when they will remodel it, or do anything with it, but when the people themselves can elect a convention which shall change it. The Legislature has no power to change a line, word, or syllable in the constitution; but the Legislature can appoint a day when the people may assemble, and under the forms of law elect a convention, which convention can change the constitution, even against the words of the constitution itself. I say again, when it shall be done I will defend it here and elsewhere, all over the land. I will stand by the President, who has already announced to the country that the constitution may be changed in this mode.

Gentlemen, you try to fan the flames of discord in the North in this wise: you say to your people there—some Senator stated it the other day, and I do not know but that it was the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE]—he is always saying something out of the way [laughter]—that whenever your friends undertake to change the constitution, party lines will be drawn, the party lash will be applied, you will be declared to be in the wrong, and the Army will be sent to put you down. Sent by whom? Has not James Buchanan already announced to you in the message we are now discussing, that you have the right to make the change? Have you ever heard a southern man, in position here or elsewhere, declare that you had not the right to do it? Then why say the party lash will be applied and armies sent to put you down in Kansas?

Gentlemen, I am respectful towards my brother Senators. I dare say you believe what you say, but you do make the greatest sacrifice of common sense to your candor that I have ever heard from any set of sensible men, when you profess to believe that the President of the nation would deliberately, in the face of his pledge to the contrary, send an army to prevent that very thing being done which he himself declares in his message can be done. If you have the power, exercise it. If you have the votes, put them in the ballot-box; take possession of the government, and God knows you are welcome to it; but so long as I have a tongue to speak or an arm to strike, you shall take possession neither of that government nor of any other through mass meetings held at Lawrence, Topeka, or anywhere else. Do it through the peaceable agency of the ballot-box, and I am content. Attempt it by any other agency, and I will stand by the President in sending an army to crush out your rebellion.

We have heard a great deal said in the course of this debate about apprehension of civil war, and bloodshed, and dissolving the union, and all that. Sir, there is a sovereign remedy for all such apprehended evils. Obey the law, respect the Constitution, fulfill your contracts, and there will be no civil war; there will be no bloodshed; there will be no dissolution of the Union. Fulfill all your obligations to the laws and the Constitution and to the contracts between the sections of the Union on the subject of slavery, and all other subjects, and I guaranty that your Union will stand for ever. Trample upon these obligations, and soon your Union will pass away as "the baseless fabric of a vision." In the future I see the Union standing upon pillars as firm as the eternal rock of ages; but I see it only through those paths which lead to the law, the Constitution, and the fulfillment of obligations: In a different direction I see it a dissolving Union; I see the stars of our galaxy being blotted out, and the sun of our glory running away as it were in rivulets of blood; and all this is seen over the traces of violated laws, prostrate constitutions, disregarded compacts.

Let me say, Mr. President, to the Senator from Illinois, that on him rests a fearful responsibility. He is the author of this measure. He has stood by it until he has brought it to its present condition. He sees a whole united South arrayed on the one side, and he has thrown himself into the northern scale. Does he mean to array a whole united North against a whole united South? If this result shall ever be accomplished, it will be done, in my opinion, over laws violated, constitutions trampled under foot, and compacts flagrantly outraged. I will not be responsible for the consequences when this state of things shall be brought about. Let not the Senator from Illinois suppose that I have meant to assail him; that I have meant to join in any cry against him. Let him not suppose that I am pursuing him with any of the instincts of a bloodhound. Heaven knows I would to-day much rather embrace him as a friend than regard him for a solitary instant as an enemy. He knows how much I have loved him in the past. He knows with what fidelity I have followed his flag, and with what joy I have witnessed the rising star of his glory. But it is not in the name of these that I would appeal to the honorable Senator. We have a country, a common country, a country dear to him and to me; to you, sir; to one and to all of us. That country is in peril. The hearts of stout men begin to quail. Thousands and hundreds of thousands of our people believe that the Union is even now rocking beneath our feet. The Senator has it in his power to put a stop to all this agitation. If he will but say to the angry waves, "Peace, be still," calmness will settle on the great deep of public sentiment. Whether he thinks so or not, he is the very life and soul of this agitation. If he stood now where he stood at the passage of this bill, with his Democratic friends, supporting the strong arm of a President who dares to do his duty in defiance of all danger, there would not have been a ripple on the surface, or if there had been, it would have subsided and died away in the great ocean of oblivion where other ripples have gone, and we should almost without an effort introduce Kansas into the Union. Sir, the Senator from Illinois gives life, he gives vitality, he gives energy, he lends the aid of his mighty genius and his powerful will to the Opposition on this question. If ruin come upon the country, he, more than any other and all other men, will be to blame for it. If freedom shall be lost—if the Union shall fail—if the rights of man shall perish on earth—if desolation shall spread her mantle over this our glorious country—let not the Senator ask who is the author of all this, lest expiring Liberty, with a death-rattle in her throat, shall answer to him as Nathan answered David, "Thou art the man."

Mr. HALE. I do not intend to occupy the time of the Senate more than a few minutes; but if the honorable Senator from Mississippi will give me his ear, as he thinks I am always saying things out of the way, I want to put a question, so that I may be able to keep in the way hereafter. I wish to ask him whether or not, if the constitution of Kansas, or any other State, comes here correct in all its forms, so far as paper and ink are concerned, it is competent for the Senate or Congress to look behind the forms to facts that are not patent upon the papers which are presented? That is the simple question I wish to ask, and I believe it is pertinent to the train of argument in which the Senator has been indulging. If a State comes here applying for admission with everything, so far as paper and ink are concerned, so far as is shown on the face of the papers, all correct, and it is contended and admitted that there has been a fraud, is it competent for Congress to look behind and beyond the returns, to that fraud, on the question of admission?

Mr. BROWN. Unquestionably, if it is a clear and palpable case of fraud. If one man, for instance, should to-day make out a constitution for Nebraska, or make out a constitution for Oregon, and should present it here, and the charge should be distinctly made, it would be competent to inquire whether it was not a fraud of that sort. Unquestionably it would.

Mr. HALE. I do not wish to be left in doubt. The Senator says it would be competent to inquire, if the fraud were clear and palpable. A thing that is clear and palpable, exists on the face of the papers. My question is not as to a patent fraud that is palpable on the face of the paper; but where the allegation is that there is fraud behind the paper, and though the figures are well enough. It is said that "figures cannot lie;" but it is forgotten that those who make them can. My question is, whether the paper and figures, being right, yet there being a suggestion that there is a fraud behind—not patent, not palpable—in that case the Senate can go behind it? That is the question.

Mr. BROWN. I am not prepared to answer a question which has such latitude as that. I dare say a case could be supposed where I should say they could; but I think they should proceed behind the presentation of the constitution with exceeding caution, and never to the point of inquiring into the validity of an election. I do not think that proper. The convention must necessarily be the judge of the qualification and election of its own members; and, except in a case of very extreme and outrageous fraud, palpable and clear, we ought not to go behind that. I am not prepared to say that, in such a case, you cannot inquire into such an election; but an ordinary inquiry into the validity of an election, I hold is beyond our power.

Mr. HALE. I am satisfied.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi has told the Senate and the country that he loves old wine better than old speeches. The Senator and myself differ in our tastes. I love old truths better than old wine. I was led to suppose, from the declarations of the Senator, that we were to have nothing old, stale, or threadbare in his speech; that we were to have something original, fresh, racy, brilliant—something that was to thrill the Senate, charm the galleries, electrify the nation, and carry the Senator's name all over the country to receive the admiration and applause of the people. I have listened to his speech, to his declarations, to his assertions, to his iteration of old errors oft refuted in this Chamber and in the other. There is one declaration, however, which seems to me to have something of originality about it. He told us that he did not expect to make any converts on this side of the Chamber. This avowal of his expectations brings to mind a couplet of Pope's, that we should

"In every work regard the writer's end,
For none can compass more than they intend."

After listening to the Senator's long and labored speech, I am sure we shall all admit that he has not, in this case, compassed more than he intended. The Senator could hardly expect to win any converts on this side of the Chamber to his principles or to his sentiments by logic so often refuted, or by the iteration of palpable historical facts.

The Senator assured us that he approved of the President's message, but that he did not expect us on this side of the Chamber to approve it. I did expect him to approve it, and I am not disappointed; for the message is a complete and absolute public surrender by the President of the United States to the principles, the doctrines, the policy, and the sentiments of the slaveholding propagandists of this country—of men who are now, and have been during the past, pursuing a policy looking to the ultimate triumph of the slaveholding interest in this country, or the dissolution of this Republic and the establishment of a southern confederacy based on military principles.

The Senator supposed that we would not indorse these doctrines because we were sectionalists—we were the sectional Republican party! Sir, what principle have we avowed that is not incorporated into the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution of the United States, and the grand old ordinance of 1787, which received the sanction of the framers of the Constitution, and the great national men of the Republic? What policy have we avowed that has not received the sanction of Washington, of Jefferson, and of the great men of this country, North and South? I say to-day that we have not avowed a principle, declared a policy, or pronounced a sentiment, here or in the country, that has not received the sanction of the mightiest men of this Republic from 1775 up to within the last few years. We have declared everywhere that freedom is national; that the doctrines of human rights underlie our free democratic institutions; that all our institutions grow out of the absolute recognition of the equal rights of all men. We have maintained that in the Territories under the national authority, under the protecting folds of the national flag, freedom and free institutions for all men go where the flag of the Republic goes. We have acknowledged that the system of slavery is nothing but a municipal institution, founded on State law, and limited to State lines. This was the doctrine of all the fathers of the Republic—of all the great statesmen who have associated their names with the liberty, honor, and renown of the Republic.

These are national doctrines. Standing upon these ideas, we have not assumed to control the slaveholding States of this Union; we have recognized State rights, but we have claimed authority to save the Territories of this Republic forever to free men and to free institutions. Do you call this sectional? If it was sectional, Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe—all the great men of the past, were sectionalists. This charge of sectionalism comes with an ill grace especially from the Senator from Mississippi. Eight years ago, in the other House, when California had framed a constitution that had received the sanction of her whole people, and organized a State government, and came here and asked for admission, the Senator from Mississippi took the floor, and resisted her admission, because it would disturb the equilibrium between the free and slave States of this Union!

Mr. BROWN. I have no objection to the Senator's stating his position, but I do object to his giving my reasons for it. I would rather do that myself. I did object to the admission of California into the Union, and I did it because her constitution was not formed through any legal agency proceeding from Congress or anywhere else, because the convention which made the constitution was assembled upon the motion of a military Governor, not authorized to exercise over the country even civil control. He appointed the time, place, and manner of holding the election. I thought it an irregularity so gross as not to be overlooked. I thought that was very much like the Dorr case, or the Brigham Young case.

Mr. WILSON. I will call the Senator's attention to one of his old speeches; and I commend him to the study of old speeches, especially his own old speeches. I like my old speeches because I always intend they shall be so sound in principle, correct in sentiment, and accurate in fact, that I can refer to them with safety. In the speech before me, the Senator from Mississippi, while he opposed the admission of California on the grounds he now states, opposed it also avowedly on the ground that it would destroy the balance between the free and the slave States. This doctrine of the balance between the North and the South came from the brain of Mr. John C. Calhoun. There is nothing national in it. It is a sectional idea, proclaimed in support of a sectional interest, and a sectional institution. A balance between the North and the South! A balance between the seventeen millions of northern freemen and the seven millions of southern freemen! A balance between the minority and majority of the country! The whole doctrine is anti-democratic, is local, is sectional in all its aspects, and should be scouted from this Chamber and from this country, as at war with our republican institutions and our republican ideas. But, sir, about the old speech of the Senator from Mississippi, and I commend him to the reading of his old speeches. He said:

"What, Mr. Chairman, is to be the effect of admitting California into the Union as a State? Independent, sir, of all the objections I have been pointing out, it will effectually unbalance that sectional balance which has so long and happily existed between the two ends of the Union, and at once give to the North that dangerous preponderance in the Senate, which ambitious politicians have so earnestly desired. The admission of one such State as California opens the way for, and renders easy, the admission of another. The President already prompts New Mexico to a like course. The two will reach out their hands to a third, and they to a fourth, fifth, and sixth. Thus precedent follows precedent with a locomotive velocity and power, until the North has the two thirds required to change the Constitution. WHEN THIS IS DONE THE CONSTITUTION WILL BE CHANGED. That public opinion, to which Senator SEWARD so significantly alludes, will be seen, and its power will be felt—universal emancipation will become your rallying cry."

"My own opinion is this: that we should resist the introduction of California as a State, and resist it successfully; resist it by our votes first, and lastly by other means. We can, at least, force an adjournment without her admission. This being done, we are safe. The southern States, in convention at Nashville, will devise means for vindicating their rights."

That disunion convention, which met, as Mr. Webster said, over the grave of Andrew Jackson, were to settle it. The Senator who taunts me with being actuated by a sectional spirit, would throw California out of Congress, and appeal to the sectional, disunion Nashville convention.

"I do not know what these means will be, but I know what they may be, and with propriety and safety. They may be to carry slaves into all of southern California, the property of sovereign States, and there hold them, as we have a right to do so; and if molested, defend them, as is both our right and duty."

"We ask you to give us our rights by NON-INTERVENTION; if you refuse, I am for taking them by ARMED OCCUPATION."

Yes, sir, the Senator then was for keeping California out of the Union, going to a disunion sectional convention, and sending slaves to populate California, and defending them by force if the people there objected!

Now the Senator says that I and those who act with me are sectionalists. I have referred to our principles and our policy, and I appeal to the Senators on the other side of this Chamber to say if the Senators on this side, from the time they came here to this hour, have not, in all our legislation connected with the affairs of this country, looked over this broad land and given our votes for your interests, for the interests of the South, as much as we have given them for the interests of the North? Senators know it. The records of the country prove it; and they contain, too, their confessions and admissions that it is so.

But the Senator from Mississippi says our policy tends to build up two great interests in the country; that we are to have a united North and a united South, and that that is to lead to a dissolution of the Union. The Senator makes professions of devotion to the Union. In the very speech from which I have before quoted, the Senator says that—

"Our people have been calculating the value of the Union. I tell you candidly we have calculated the value of the Union. 'Love for the Union will not keep us in the Union.'"

The whole tone, temper, and sentiment look not to the support of the Union as our fathers made it, but to the triumph of a sectional southern policy, to the expansion of slavery, or to the ultimate overthrow of the Government of this country.

I think there will soon be a general union in the North, as there is now in the South. We are fast coming to it; and let me tell the Senators on the Administration side of this Chamber, that if they consummate, if they support—whether they succeed or fail—the bringing of Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution, with a knowledge of all these monstrous frauds scattered over the land, comprehended by the whole country, they will do more to unite all honest, liberty-loving, God-fearing men in the North than has been accomplished by any act ever adopted by this Government. Your Kansas-Nebraska policy of 1854 shivered to atoms that great Whig party which had battled, sometimes successfully, for power here, under the lead of some of the most accomplished statesmen of the country. Another party sprang up—the American party. It paused, it faltered, and it went down under the general judgment of the people of the free States. The Republican party rose in one year from a few thousand men, and gave at the last presidential election one million three hundred and forty thousand votes. It came much nearer than you wished taking the control of this Government—of this country.

The opinions they entertain, the policy they avow, the sentiments which swell their bosoms, are deepening and spreading all over this land. Those opinions and sentiments will unite the northern people. They will spread over the slave line as they have done, for they have gone into Missouri; they have brought into the other House one of the ablest and most accomplished members of that body from the southern State of Missouri. Sir, they are to pass over southern lines. These sentiments and opinions cannot be hemmed in by lines of latitude or of longitude. They will yet be adopted by fair-minded and honorable men everywhere, who love their country, who love justice and liberty; and whenever anybody shall raise the black flag of slavery and disunion in the South, he will find, leaping from the ranks of the people, thousands of patriotic men who will stand by this Government and defend it.

The Senator from Mississippi tells us that the first troubles in Kansas grew out of the formation of the Emigrant Aid Society. That society, he tells us, came from a secret congressional organization. The Senator is mistaken in his facts. The secret congressional circular to which he refers was issued in the summer days, after the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. The bill incorporating the Emigrant Aid Society, was introduced into the Legislature of Massachusetts in March, 1854—more than sixty days before your Kansas-Nebraska act passed. It passed the Legislature of the State, and received the sanction of the Governor, in April, forty days before the Kansas-Nebraska act passed Congress. Instead of this secret circular being the father of the emigration movement, you might turn it around the other way, and say the emigration movement created this secret congressional movement. The Senator is mistaken in this assertion. I commend him to the study of old facts.

Then the Senator dwells on the fact that the Emigrant Aid Company was incorporated with a capital of $5,000,000, only $20,000 of which could be used in the State. Does not the Senator know that the Emigrant Aid Society was never organized under that act at all? No organization under it took place, but the corporators went to the next Legislature and got a new charter with a capital of $1,000,000. That $1,000,000 of capital is mostly on paper. The company have a capital of $110,000 paid in, and it has been invested mostly in mills and churches and school-houses and lands. They never, from the days of their organization to this hour, sent a man into the Territory of Kansas—not one; no sir, not one to vote. They have sent no arms into the Territory; theirs has been a mission of peaceful industry. I tell the Senator here now, that this company organized emigration; that it reduced the expenses of going there thirty or forty per cent.; and that is all it did. They have never asked whether a man was for or against slavery. The first company that went to that Territory got there on the 9th day of August, 1854. It was a company of thirty men with Mr. Thayer, who originated the movement. They sent during the autumn of 1854, or rather a few hundred persons availed themselves of this organization to go to that Territory, as emigrants, to live there.

The Senator from Mississippi tells us that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Douglas] charged that they committed misdeeds on going there. We denied it then. He did not prove it. Those who make charges of that kind against men are bound to prove those charges true. These men are presumed to be innocent until they are shown to be guilty. I say there is no evidence before this country that any man who went there under the auspices of the Emigrant Aid Society, ever performed any illegal act on his way there or in that Territory. They were as law-abiding, upright, conscientious men as can be found in any part of New England or of this country. They were the picked men of New England. Those emigrants who went out under the auspices of that Emigrant Aid Society averaged better than the people who remained at home. They were the intelligent, upright, law-abiding young men of Massachusetts and of New England. From the time they went there to this moment, you can find no record, in or out of the Territory, that they have violated laws of the United States—that they have ever committed any offense, or ever been arrested or punished for any offense. They stand before the country as those old Pilgrim Fathers stood, who landed at Plymouth in 1620, and they are animated and guided by as elevated motives, and as lofty aims and purposes.

But the Senator from Mississippi would have us understand that those irregularities which transpired in that Territory in regard to the election of 1855 were brought on by these men. Does not the Senator from Mississippi know, (or if he does not know it, he ought to know,) that the House of Representatives sent a commission to that Territory; that they went there; that they thoroughly investigated the whole subject; that they examined the names of the two thousand nine hundred voters residing in the Territory; that they found how many of those men voted; that they saw the names of four thousand nine hundred men who went there from Missouri; that there is no mistake about these Missourians voting on the 30th of March, 1855; that this fact is as clear as mathematical demonstration? Senators may smile; but this fact has been proved, absolutely proved, and no man can deny it. This fact is also proved: that from the closing of navigation, in the autumn of 1854, up to the day of election, on March 30, 1855, there went into that Territory but one hundred and sixty-six men, women, and children, under the auspices of the Emigrant Aid Society. Ninety-seven of these were men, and thirty-seven only of all of them voted at that election. Thirty-seven men, under the auspices of the Emigrant Aid Society, voted on that day. From the time of the organization of that society up to this hour, no men have gone out under its auspices to vote. Those persons went to that Territory as emigrants, and not for the purpose of voting.

The Senator from Mississippi seems to think there was nothing very wrong in the election of the 30th of March. Why, sir, it has been proved that only fourteen hundred actual residents of the Territory voted, and over seven hundred of them voted for free-State men, and that the free-State men had a majority in sixteen out of eighteen districts of the actual voters that day. Even the town of Lawrence gave eight or nine hundred votes! They were cast mostly by the slave-State men who went there from Missouri. There were but two or three slave-State men in that city; one was the postmaster, but he could not go for these crimes, and the Administration found it out and turned him out of office. These facts stand on the records; they have been proved to the country. They were first denied, then apologized for. These frauds did take place, and they vitiated everything in that Territory from that time to this; and they have been the prolific source of all the strifes which have marked the history of the Territory.

The free-State men, overborne by this invasion, felt that their rights had been taken from them, that they were outraged, and they saw that a government was organized which put them all under the ban—a government that required a test-oath. They saw a government organized by fraud, and sustained by force—they saw they had no power, that they were as absolutely powerless as were the people of the tyrant of Naples. The doctrines of the fathers had taught them that the people were the source of power; that, in the language of Alexander Hamilton, "the streams of power came from the pure, original fountain of the people." They believed in your Kansas-Nebraska act, and I suppose they were the only people in America who had any abiding faith in it; for it appears that the Senator from Mississippi and most of his associates, have none, and I do not know anybody on this side of the Chamber that was ever deceived about that act. They, by an act of original inherent sovereignty, called a convention; they framed a constitution; they had it indorsed; they have been denounced as rebels for that act, and for passing laws enough to keep up the organization, so that if they were ever driven to it they might use that organization to defend their lives, their liberty, and their property. They have never attempted to enforce one of those laws, and yet the Senator from Mississippi denounces their acts as rebellion! Rebellion! Why, sir, did Michigan rebel in 1836? Did not her people establish a government? Did they not drive out, or rather turn out, by the expression of the popular will, the Governor sent there by Andrew Jackson? Did not Andrew Jackson sustain them? And did not James Buchanan, in this Chamber, defend them? Did he call it rebellion then? The State of California formed a constitution without authority. Were they rebels? Minnesota has framed a constitution with your leave. She is framing laws under this constitution, before her admission into the Union. Are her people rebels? This charge of rebellion against the people of Kansas has nothing of truth in it. It is a libel, a slander, come from what source it may.

The Senator tells us that the people ordered this constitutional convention. The first Legislature chosen by the men from Missouri passed a law that in October, 1856, the sense of the people should be taken. In October, 1856, a vote was taken, and about two thousand men voted on that occasion—two thousand three hundred, says the Senator from New York. On the day on which that vote was taken, laws were on the statute-book requiring a test oath, an oath to support the fugitive slave law, and no freeman could vote. Do you suppose liberty-loving, God-fearing men would take that infamous oath? Then every ballot-box was in the hands of men appointed by this Territorial Legislature. The people had been to the polls once, and they met an armed invasion; they were cheated, overborne, and defrauded. Laws had been passed requiring a test oath to be taken, and taxes to be paid, and the votes were to be given into the hands of men who had cheated and robbed them of their rights. Of course, the people of the Territory did not vote. They would have been craven spirits if they had.

Then, Mr. President, the Legislature assembled in January, 1857, and they passed an act calling a convention. If Senators will examine this act they will find that it was intended to cut off the spring emigration into the Territory. They knew they had possession of the government, and that they could control the Territory, and shape its future. They refused to provide for the submission of the constitution to the people; and Governor Geary tells us that, when he said to these men, "I will sign this bill if you will submit the constitution to the people," they said they had been advised by their southern friends not to submit it to the people, because, if they did not, it would secure Kansas as a slave State.

Who were to take the census? Who were to register the voters? The officials appointed under this territorial bogus Legislature—yes, sir, bogus in every sense—were to take the census and register the voters. Governor Stanton and Governor Walker tell us that in nineteen counties no census was taken, and in fifteen counties no registration. There was a paper read the other day, headed by Henry Clay Pate, undertaking to get over the force of that charge. I have examined this paper signed by Henry Clay Pate, and in eleven lines there are twelve absolute lies; and the law book of the Territory shows it. Do not Senators know that in some of these counties there was a large population, that they gave more votes at the October election than were given for the election of delegates to the constitutional convention in June?

The Senator from Mississippi thinks this cannot be true, and he quotes the appeals of Governor Walker when he first went into the Territory against Governor Walker after he had spent months in the Territory. He went there as Saul went to Tarsus—he did not understand the affairs of that Territory. Mr. Stanton is frank enough in the admirable address he has just published to the people of the United States—an address marked by truth, by candor, and by everything that should win for him the respect of fair-minded men—to declare that when he went to that Territory he did not understand its affairs. The honorable Senator from Mississippi would display more fairness if he would quote to us the words of Governor Walker after months of residence in the Territory had made him familiar with the condition of affairs. The time and conditions fixed upon by the Legislature were intended to cut off the population that would pour into the Territory from March to the third Monday of June. The machinery and the carrying into effect the whole arrangement, were intended expressly to take possession of that Territory and make it a slave State.

Mr. PUGH. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. PUGH. I understand the Senator complains of the convention act of 1857, because it was designed to cut off the spring emigration of that year. Am I right in that?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. PUGH. Then why does the Senator complain that the spring emigration of 1855 voted? It is as long as it is broad.

Mr. WILSON. I will state the difference. This act provided for taking the census; and I think it was to be closed in March or April. Then the names were to be placed in the hands of officials, who were to make up the registration. This was to be done early in May; a residence of six months was required to entitle a man to vote. It cut off the thousands who went there as actual residents in March, April, May, and the first three weeks of June—men who were to cast their fortunes in that Territory. The four thousand nine hundred men who went over from Missouri in 1855, went back the next day; marched back with banners and music; they were not, and did not intend to be residents. That is the difference. I hope the Senator from Ohio sees it. I complain that the men who go there to live are cut off. I do not complain that the men who go there to vote should be cut off, whether they go from the North or the South.

The Senator from Mississippi quotes Governor Walker as saying on the 27th of July, that there was no longer any fear of invasion from Missouri, and the people could vote.

Why, sir, they were called to vote for delegates on the third Monday in June, and this letter was written on the 27th of July. The Senator from Mississippi ought to be a little more accurate in his facts, and I commend him to the study of old speeches, to listen to old speeches with patience, until he is better posted in his facts.

This letter has reference to the October election, to the election of the Legislature under the Territorial laws, and not the election of delegates to the convention. The people voted in October, because in their 9th of June convention, before the delegates were elected, the people assembled in the largest convention ever held in Kansas; they discussed the questions connected with the interests of that Territory for two days, and voted with only one exception to go into the October election. They voted to elect their officers under the Topeka constitution in the first week of August. They did elect officers under the Topeka constitution, and they went into the territorial election in October, and carried that election.

But the Senator from Mississippi has great doubts about frauds. Does he not know that the people were nearly being cheated out of their Legislature? If Governor Walker had not assumed the responsibility of throwing out some fraudulent votes, the people who triumphed by five thousand majority, who cast nine thousand votes against four thousand for the pro-slavery candidate for Congress, would have been cheated out of the Legislature. The frauds at Kickapoo, at Oxford, and in McGee county, if allowed to pass uncorrected, would have lost them the Legislature. Governor Walker saw that these frauds were so great that he must reject them, and he did reject the McGee and the Oxford frauds.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He rejected them for informality.

Mr. WILSON. He rejected them, as the Senator from Maine suggests, for informality; but he went down to Oxford and found "six houses" and only a few people there. He found that over fifteen hundred fraudulent votes had been returned, and he threw out the returns.

In answer to questions of the Senator from New Hampshire, the Senator from Mississippi said there might be occasion to go behind the instrument, and investigate the frauds. Now what are the charges? That there were frauds in the elections of the 21st of December and 4th of January everybody knows. The convention which framed the Lecompton constitution was elected in June. It met and adjourned to a period after the October election. When they saw that the Territory was taken possession of by the free-State men, they changed their tactics. It is true, meetings were got up, asking Calhoun and his associates not to submit the constitution to the people. Calhoun and those men had pledged themselves to do it. On the demand of the President, on the promise of Governor Walker, and the declarations of the Washington Union, they had promised the people of Kansas that they would submit the constitution to the people. They provided for its submission in such a way that Governor Walker could not correct frauds as he had done in the case of Oxford and McGee county, and so that Calhoun could have the matter in his hands—a man who would not only permit the frauds, but, if necessary, make the frauds himself. He was just the man to do it; for God never allowed to walk the green earth any man who more richly deserves to die a traitor's death, and leave a traitor's name, than John Calhoun.

Mr. GREEN. Say it to his face.

Mr. WILSON. I have said it here, and it goes on the record. I have no fear of the tools of border ruffianism in Washington or in Kansas. I am able to take care of myself. I will try to do so, at any rate. Sir, this John Calhoun has cheated and defrauded the people of Kansas out of their sacred rights. He has committed a crime against the liberties of the people which will associate his name with tyranny and tyrants while the history of Kansas shall be read and remembered by mankind.

The Senator from Mississippi justifies the refusal to submit the constitution. Why, sir, it has been the policy to ascertain the popular will. These men knew that if they submitted the constitution to the people it would be voted down, four or five to one. The President says they would have voted it down because they did not like it. What business was it to John Calhoun, or to that convention, or to the President of the United States, whether the people of Kansas would vote down the constitution or not? That was their business. It does not belong to the President or his Cabinet to pronounce on their motives for doing it. It is an insult to a free people to talk to them in this language, whether it comes from the executive mansion or that class of men who formed the convention that assembled in Kansas.

The vote was taken on that provision of the constitution, whether Kansas should be a slave State with the slave trade, or whether Kansas should be a slave State without the slave trade. That was the whole of it. Kansas was to be a slave State anyhow. In order to make it a slave State without the slave trade, the voter had to vote for the constitution. No one could vote against it. It was one of the most stupendous insults to a free people that a body of usurpers ever offered. They took their votes. They have returned six thousand seven hundred votes at that election—thirteen hundred down at this little township of Oxford. The town of Kickapoo gave nearly eleven hundred votes—a town that cannot have legally more than four hundred voters. Four or five towns make up three thousand fraudulent votes given on that day. No man who knows anything of Kansas believes that there were more than twenty-five hundred, at the utmost, legal votes given in Kansas on that constitution. The Legislature have sent a commission to Kickapoo to examine into the frauds.

The St. Louis Republican publishes a letter in regard to this investigation; and I wish to call the attention of Senators to it, especially the Senator from Missouri. The St. Louis Democrat makes an abstract of this correspondence:

"On the original poll-book of the vote on the constitution, December 21, 1857, which book is now on file in the county recorder's office in Leavenworth, it was discovered that James Buchanan, President of the United States, cast the two hundred and seventieth vote."

Mr. SEWARD. What day was that?

Mr. WILSON. On the 21st of December.

Mr. GREEN. For or against slavery?

Mr. WILSON. "For the constitution with slavery," of course. The Senator need give himself no anxiety what vote James Buchanan would give in Kansas or out of it. I wish the President would go to Kansas. He has sent out his Governors there; and they went as men sent out of old to curse the people, and they come back blessing the people. If the President was there a few weeks he would become a wiser and better man. Instead of denouncing these people as rebels, I think he would come back and say that he found a people loving liberty, law, and order, who had been oppressed by a class of corrupt and unprincipled officials.

"Next on the list of distinguished names appears, as the two hundred and seventy-sixth voter, William H. Seward of New York." [Laughter.]

They do not say how William H. Seward voted on that day, but we all know how William H. Seward would have voted if he had been there.

"323d. Thos. F. Marshall, of Kentucky. 714th. George W. Brown, Editor Herald of Freedom. Then, 859th. John C. Fremont." [Laughter.]

Mr. GREEN. How did he vote?

Mr. WILSON. It does not tell how any of them voted except Buchanan.

"Then comes the eight hundred and seventy-sixth voter, J. W. Denver, Governor of Kansas, who had only taken his place the day before, and was then in Leecompton, fifty miles distant. Thomas H. Benton appears as the nine hundred and fiftieth voter. And now it was dark, the polls being kept open till half past six o'clock, when, alas! for frail humanity, for the compunctious visitings of conscience, in slips Horace Greeley, [laughter,] and stealthily deposits his ballot as the nine hundred and eightieth voter. It is now half past six o'clock, and the curtain rises on the last act of the drama, and in steps, in all his majestic proportions, Edwin Forrest, as the one thousand and twenty-sixth voter. This is Mr. Forrest's first appearance on a Kansas stage."

Mr. PUGH. What is that you are reading?

Mr. WILSON. It is an abstract of the correspondence of the St. Louis Republican.

Mr. PUGH. What is the paper you have in your hand?

Mr. WILSON. The St. Louis Democrat.

"It is further stated by the correspondent that 'one of the Kickapoo judges who was before the commission refused to answer the question whether a majority of the names on the poll-books were fictitious or not, for fear of criminating himself.'"

I do not vouch for the correctness of these statements.

Now, are not Senators prepared to adopt the amendment I have proposed, or the resolution proposed by the Senator from Illinois, and examine these charges before they hurry this State into the Union against the manifest hostility of the people?

At the 4th of January election, Delaware Crossing gave, it is said, forty-three votes. These votes had not got in when Governor Denver, and Mr. Deitzler, and Mr. Babcock, counted the votes. It now turns out that the returns have come in from that Crossing where forty-three votes were given, and they have returned three hundred and seventy-nine majority for the slave ticket, and that ticket is elected by that vote, being eight representatives from Leavenworth district and three councilors, making a change of six in the Council and sixteen in the House, changing the whole political complexion of the State.

The frauds in Kansas are patent to the whole country; nobody doubts them. There is not an intelligent man in America who doubts them. When these charges have gone over this country, why is it that the President of the United States, against the protests of some of the ablest and best men of his party, in this body and in the other House; against the voice of the press of his party in the Northwest; against the intelligence that comes flashing over the wires and by mail, by presses, and by letters from all quarters of the Union, sends in this message misrepresenting, misstating the affairs in Kansas, and pressing its prompt admission? Why is it that Senators—honorable men—men who ought to scorn to do a mean thing—also press it? Why is it that this is pressed, to be hurried through, and this act consummated, when we know that, on the 4th of January, twelve or thirteen thousand men of that Territory voted against this constitution, and there were only six thousand seven hundred votes cast for it on December 21, of which three or four thousand were unquestionably fraudulent. I say there is only one power on this continent that could thus control, direct, and guide men, and that is that gigantic slave power which holds this Administration in the hollow of its hand, that guides and directs the Democratic party, and which has only to stamp its foot, and the men who wield the Government of this country tremble and submit and bow to its will.

Senators talk about the dangers of the country. Great God! What are our dangers? The danger is that there is such a power, a local, sectional power, that can control this Government, can ride over justice, ride over a wronged people, consummate glaring and outrageous frauds, and override and trample down the will of a brave and free people. That is the danger. The time has come when the freemen of this country, looking to liberty, to popular right, to justice, to all sections of the country, should overthrow this power and trample it under their feet forever. The time has come when the people should rise in the majesty of conscious power, and hurl from office and from places of influence the men who thus bow to this tyranny.

Senators are anxious about the Union. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] to-day thought it was in peril. Well, sir, I have no alarm about it. I am in the Union; my State is in the Union; we intend to stay in it. If anybody wants to go out, there are Mexico, and Central America, and the valley of the Amazon, all open to emigration; let them start. I shall do nothing to keep them in the Union. But all this continent now in the Union is American soil, and a part of my country; and my vote and my influence, now and forever, will be given to keep it a part of my country.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, there has been no disposition on this side of the Senate Chamber to force this question in any manner whatever. The motion now pending is a motion to refer it to the appropriate committee, there to be investigated and reported back to the Senate for their future consideration. Why the charge should be made that there is an attempt to force Kansas into the Union, is to me most extraordinary indeed. That question has not yet come up; that question is not yet before us; no single individual has yet said that that is the question pending for consideration. I could have raised a point of order on the Senator from Massachusetts and kept out one of his old speeches, for I believe we have a rule of the Senate which says that no Senator shall speak more than once on the same question, until all other Senators present have spoken. He has, however, favored us with two of his old speeches. I thank him for them. I find no complaint whatever with them—they are just about such as I had expected; without replying to them, for I do not intend to do so, I must be permitted to make a single remark, that I shall never make use of my immunity as a Senator to utter slanders against citizens of the United States outside of this Chamber.

I hope this discussion will stop until the subject be referred, and the facts evolved. Let them all come out. What right has any man to charge fraud without giving any evidence of it? He who makes a charge of fraud without being prepared with the evidence to substantiate it, is guilty of calumny and slander; and if he does not give the evidence, still stands as a slanderer before the country. Whenever I make a charge in this Chamber, I shall be prepared with the facts to substantiate the charge I make. I may have an opinion smothered up in my own bosom until the evidence comes that will justify me to give it utterance; but until that evidence does come, if I dare make the accusation, I am nothing but a calumniator and a slanderer before the country.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to ask the Senator a question—whether it is the design of the committee to take testimony in relation to all the charges which have been made in reference to these frauds, and examine into them before they make a report?

Mr. GREEN. If the Senator asks the question, and will take his seat, I will answer him.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have asked the question, and now I take my seat.

Mr. GREEN. Now I will answer. Until it is referred to us I shall not undertake to speak for the committee; but I can say that we will undertake to do justice to the whole subject; and more than that, we will undertake to be guided by any directions the Senate may see proper to give us. This is my answer. If a more explicit or more full answer be desired, I will still give that. I have heard, day after day, and kept my seat in silence, with all the harassed feelings that a son of Missouri must necessarily be expected to feel, these imputations thrown out against Missourians when I knew they were false, and when the men making them dare not pretend to substantiate them before the country; but I stand in the defense on the negative. He who makes an affirmative charge is guilty of slander, if he does not sustain it. He who makes it, and throws it broadcast before the country without giving the grounds on which he dares to make it, is equally guilty, because the country is not prepared to justify the accusation. Let the facts be investigated. We are begging for an investigation. We are proposing that the matter shall be referred to the appropriate committee, there to be investigated. Instead of that, we are charged with undertaking to force Kansas into the Union, right or wrong.

Such is not the object; and if, when the facts are developed; if, when the scrutiny of this committee has been applied to them, they do not believe that the rules of law, of justice, and of constitutional government, will justify the admission of the State, it will be, so far as I am concerned at least, reported against; but I do not deem it proper to sit silent in my seat while these unjust charges are made; while these broad assertions are repeated again and again, that the people of Kansas do not desire admission into the Union, when Senators have no right to make any such assertion, or present any such charge. Who are the people of Kansas, in a governmental sense? The women and children? No. The Indians who inhabit the Territory, and who are not incorporated in the civil society there? No. Who, then, are the people of Kansas? The loyal, obedient subjects; the citizens who acknowledge and who owe allegiance to this Government; not rebels, not those who owe no allegiance to our Government, not alien enemies who happen to be encamped within the boundaries of the Kansas Territory—they are not citizens of Kansas; they have no right to a voice in the determination of the civil policy of Kansas; and when you talk of the great majority, the overwhelming influence that surrounds the outsiders of Kansas against this constitution, there is not a single Senator who dares say, on his honor as a gentleman, that they are citizens of the United States, much less inhabitants of the Territory of Kansas. When I refer to the vote cast, when I refer to the legal proceedings had, I assert that those who participated in them—and no man dare controvert it without my riveting on him the falsity of his denial—are citizens of the United States, in allegiance with our Government, and of right exercise the power which they assert in that Territory.

There are many points to be investigated in this matter. I have forbore much. I have listened without complaint to the taunts and slanders and insinuations which have been asserted against the State of Missouri; but there is a point beyond which forbearance ceases to be a virtue; and it is well-nigh approached. The facts must be developed; the facts will be evolved; and when those facts come before us, those who have been loudest in making these denunciations will either have to take them back with humiliation and contempt, or acknowledge that they have made the assertions without proof.

Talk to me of Kansas! I know not what vote has been cast there. I am asking for an investigation, and I implore members of the Senate to defer their arguments on the subject until the facts are developed; and, at the same time, I say to them that if they want the committee to summon witnesses, to call for persons and papers, to bring out a more perfect understanding of all the facts, and give us that authority, let them do so according to their own will and pleasure. Because we ask this, we are charged with undertaking to force it down their throats. No, Mr. President, there is nothing like it upon this side of the Chamber.

When the Senator rises in his seat and reads about James Buchanan, and William H. Seward and other men voting, he knows—I do not mean that he guesses—that they are fictitious votes.

Mr. WILSON. They are counted.

Mr. GREEN. So far as any evidence is before us in the Senate, as honorable Senators I ask you who is it that gave fictitious names in Kansas when the registry was taken? We have no evidence that anybody did so, but a certain class. Your own man, Secretary Stanton, said that the Republicans in many instances refused to give their names, and in other instances gave fictitious names. Some base Republican may have assumed the name of James Buchanan; some base Republican may have assumed the name of William H. Seward; and this, I am justified in asserting before the Senate, from the legal evidence before us. I pause for a reply, and am willing to receive it. There is not a particle of evidence before us of any man assuming a name or making use of a fictitious name except that anti-slavery, that Republican party, which, not content with abiding by the forms of law and of constitutional obligation, have been intent on making Kansas a free State without African slavery, right or wrong, and they therefore are to be charged with the assumption of those names.

It is known to you, sir, that they not only organized a party, but gave it a military form, and in that military form they even aped the ritual of the Free Masons in initiation, and required an oath on admission, by which the initiate swore "to use all exertions to make Kansas a non-slaveholding State." What Congress had refused to do; what the Senate and House of Representatives and the President of the United States had said we have not the competent power to accomplish, you outside of the Territory of Kansas will import hired mercenaries to do; you will, as your own men themselves assert, make them swear an oath to do what Congress has not the power to do and what the Supreme Court of the United States has said Congress cannot do. Because these movements are frustrated, and an overruling Providence has so directed the result of human events that it comes in otherwise, complaint is to be made and we are to be held up before the country as guilty of fraud. I hurl back the accusation. Why, Mr. President, frauds may have been committed; I do not pretend to say frauds have not been committed. I say that so far as my experience extends, there never has been an election in the United States in which there may not have been some fraud. Yes, sir, I do not believe there ever has been an election in the United States at which some minor, some man outside of the district, some one not qualified by law, has not assumed to exercise the elective franchise when it did not belong to him. But what I do assert is this: that there is no fraud in Kansas sufficient to vitiate the legal proceedings of that Territory, that they stand with all the sanctions of law, and that nothing can be brought up against them of a sufficient magnitude to repel the legal presumption in their favor; that the constitution stands as the will of the people of Kansas—not of the rebellious part, not of alien enemies, not of Mormons or Danites, but of those who owe allegiance to the country.

I shall not now go into a critical examination of what the Senator from Massachusetts calls a test oath. Obnoxious it may have been, or it may not have been; but this much I will say: if it was, it was provided for in the exercise of power which Congress authorized them to exercise, to regulate the elective franchise as they pleased. They did it; and I will say more, that there is nothing very obnoxious in it, as far as I recollect; for it only required voters to swear to support the Constitution of the United States, the organic act of the Territory passed by Congress, and the fugitive slave law, and to pay one dollar tax as evidence of their citizenship. There are many States in this Union whose constitutions contain provisions almost identically similar with that. Would you have a man to vote or hold office in Kansas who defies the authority of the Federal Constitution? No. So said the Legislature of the Territory of Kansas.

Would you have a man to vote and hold office there who denies the organic act of Kansas? No. So said the Territorial Legislature. Would you have a man to vote or hold office in Kansas who denies the legality of the fugitive slave law? No; because it is passed by constitutional authority to carry out a provision of the Federal Constitution. Such being the case, there is nothing very wrong in that. If they thought proper to superadd a provision requiring evidence of citizenship strong enough to produce a certificate that a man had paid a tax, is that anything very extraordinary? In the State of Missouri, border-ruffian as it is, but yet imbued with all the principles of liberty that burn in all the purity they ever did in the presence of the vestal virgins, the law requires a man, before he can take a seat in the Legislature, to produce evidence that he has that year paid his State and county tax. The people of Kansas, living just beyond the border of Missouri, many of them being emigrants from Missouri, if they imitate the example which Missouri and other States have set, there is nothing very exceptional in that.

So I might go on, but I will not do it. My object to-night is not to prolong this debate; not to enter into this discussion at all, but to beg of friends and foes—I mean in a political sense, for I know I have no personal foes here, because I am no man's personal enemy myself, and I judge of others by myself—to let the question be taken at once. Let the message be referred so that it may be investigated and reported back, either favorably or unfavorably. If you want the committee invested with power to take evidence, pass your resolution accordingly; and whether done right or wrong, when it is reported back you can investigate with more intelligence, on a better predication of facts than you possibly can before that investigation is had. It is alone for this purpose that I press the matter.

I know the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] indicated a desire to be heard on this subject. I am the last man in the world to interfere with his desire; and if he insists on being heard before the reference, I shall not even ask for a vote; but if he can forbear until the reference is had and the investigation made, I will take it as a great favor, as it will tend to expedite the matter; assuring him, at the same time, that when reported back, if it ever shall be reported back, there will be no effort to crowd it to the prejudice of any man who desires to be heard, either for or against the report. I hope, therefore, Mr. President, that we shall have a vote this evening; but I only make this request, leaving it for Senators to consult their own will on the subject. I yield the floor.

Mr. WILSON. A very few words in reply to the Senator from Missouri; and I wish to say in advance that threats, by word, voice, or manner, from that Senator, have no terrors for me. He talks about charges made against some of the people of his State, and he says that when charges are made, unless they are supported by authority, they are slanders. I agree with the Senator. For myself, I have said nothing in regard to his State that is not on the records of this Government, where it will live forever—evidence taken under the solemnity of an oath by a committee of the House of Representatives.

When, in January, 1856, knowing, as I did, many of the facts in regard to the election of the 30th March, 1855, I brought them before the Senate, a Senator from Missouri [Mr. Geyer] assumed to deny them. I proved them upon him on this floor, and there is not a man here that has attempted to disprove them from that time to this. When the proposition to raise the House committee was made, it was resisted. There is a large volume of records proving that four thousand nine hundred and twenty or four thousand nine hundred and thirty men from Missouri went into the Territory to vote on that day. It is as clearly demonstrated as is any mathematical problem in Euclid; and it requires a degree of assurance in any man to deny it here or elsewhere. No one shall brand me as a calumniator when I refer to that record. There is the record, deny it; but do not undertake to intimidate me by threats. I am not the man to be intimidated by threats, here or elsewhere.

The Senator says that when I referred to the investigation at Kickapoo, I knew that James Buchanan and William H. Seward did not vote in the Territory of Kansas. Of course I know it. There were over one thousand and seventy votes returned as cast on the 21st of December at Kickapoo. The Senator intimates that Black Republicans gave these names. Sir, Black Republicans did not vote on that day, and the Senator ought to have known it. He did know it, and knowing it, he makes the declaration that Black Republicans had given in those names. The votes on that day were pro-slavery votes. Republicans were not there to give the name of any man.

Are we to have no other evidence on which we are to act as public men than what we gather from the executive documents? Sir, the tree of knowledge does not grow in the executive garden. I wish it did; for if so, we should not have such documents as we have before us. Our knowledge is not limited to executive documents, or to the executive agents in that Territory. There is some little intelligence outside of the Executive and his tools in Kansas.

The Senator from Missouri objects to declarations being made. Is it not admitted that frauds have taken place in Kansas? How is it in Oxford? Did not Governor Walker prove that fifteen hundred fraudulent votes were given there in October last?

Mr. PUGH. What is proved?

Mr. WILSON. That there were frauds at Oxford in the October election.

Mr. PUGH. How do you know it?

Mr. WILSON. Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton examined the facts, and stated them to the country. The public press states the facts; the people there state the facts. It is said by those who have examined the list of names, that the poll-list at Oxford was made up from the Cincinnati Directory. I do not know whether the Senator's name is in that directory or not.

Mr. PUGH. It is.

Mr. WILSON. That town gave sixteen hundred votes in October and thirteen hundred on the 21st of December. I say the simple statement of the fact shows that there must be fraud. The Senator from Missouri knows it must be a fraud.

Mr. GREEN. I know exactly the contrary; and can give an explanation which will be satisfactory to the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. Will you do it now?

Mr. GREEN. I will do it when you refer that subject to the committee of which I am a member.

Mr. WILSON. We will refer it to you, and I want you to give us the facts.

Mr. GREEN. I will do it.

Mr. WILSON. It is known that there are not over one hundred and thirty voters in the place. Governor Walker states that he found there "six houses and no tavern." These votes must have been fraudulent.

The Senator talks about our saying here that the people of Kansas do not want to come into the Union. We have not said so. I believe the people of Kansas, of all parties, desire to come into this Union. It is not a question of coming into the Union, but it is a question of how they shall come in.

The Senator talks about a legal people, and indulges in legal technicalities. I admit he has the color of law on his side. His Missouri men went over there and elected a Legislature; they took possession of the government; they made the laws; their friends have administered them from that time to this, and all the wrongs of Kansas have been perpetrated under them. Because they have the color of law on their side, it does not follow that it is right or just, or that we should be governed by it.

I say to the Senator from Missouri, that I want a fair and distinct understanding with him. If I misstate in any respect a matter of fact in regard to Kansas, and he will show it to be so, I will most gladly correct it.

Mr. GREEN. It would be a little more appropriate and a little more in conformity with the ordinary rules of right, for the man who makes a charge to sustain it, and not require his opponent to prove a negative.

Mr. WILSON. I agree to that, and I agree to the Senator's general declaration that a man who makes a charge without proof is a slanderer. I accept that declaration with all its consequences. What I have stated here to-day as matters of fact, I have the evidence to substantiate; and I tell him his general denials will not do.

Mr. PUGH. The Senator stated that he knew that the names in the Cincinnati Directory were to be found in the poll-books at Oxford. Let us have the evidence of that.

Mr. WILSON. I have in my possession the authority upon which I made the statement, and I believe the authority reliable. I will place the authority in the Senator's hands. Did not the Senator from Missouri make a charge in regard to Black Republicans putting in fictitious names at the Kickapoo election? Did he not insinuate it?

Mr. GREEN. Not at all. I made this remark: that we have no evidence of any persons in Kansas using fictitious names except Black Republicans; and Mr. Stanton, in an official paper, stated that many of them refused to give their names at all, and others gave in fictitious names. It was very evident that the names read by the Senator were fictitious names; so that the presumption was stronger against Black Republicans than any one else. That was my argument. Answer that if you can.

Mr. WILSON. I do not see that nice distinctions can be taken between declarations and insinuations. They amount to the same thing. But have not Governor Walker and Governor Stanton referred, in their testimony, to the fictitious names put on the list in the town of Oxford, and in McGee county? Certainly the same men who assert what the Senator now states, prove what I state.

But I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate at this late hour. I close by expressing the hope that we shall refer the message to the committee, with instructions to investigate and report the facts for the guidance of the Senate.

Mr. BIGLER. I desire the Senator to allow me a moment, as he seems to be familiar with the affairs of Kansas and the facts connected with the elections there. I have a few official papers before me, and they present some things which I cannot understand. I do not intend to enter into any question as to the general returns in Kansas; I shall certainly not do so at this time; but I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to one or two very striking facts which are contained in the official papers in my possession. I have before me an official return of the votes cast at the election in October, certified from the executive department of Kansas. I have also a return, certified by the presiding officers of the respective Houses of the Legislature of Kansas, as to the vote on the constitution on the 4th of January, under the territorial law. These returns exhibit, first, this striking fact: that whilst in the city of Leavenworth alone there were over one thousand three hundred votes cast against the constitution, Mr. Parrott received in that entire city and county but one thousand and forty-six votes. I have not the official vote for the city of Leavenworth alone, but I am told it was less than seven hundred for Mr. Parrott in October. Therefore, in the city of Leavenworth alone, there were seven hundred more votes polled against the constitution than were cast for Mr. Parrott. How can this discrepancy be accounted for? The population has manifestly decreased rather than increased.

Another fact is shown by these official returns. I do not undertake to say whether these things are true or not, but I want to give them as they appear on the face of the papers. In Shawnee, where Mr. Parrott received seven hundred and forty-nine votes, seventeen hundred and twenty votes were cast against the constitution.

Mr. COLLAMER. I would ask the gentleman whether he is not perfectly aware that all the free-State people opposed to the constitution voted against it, but only a comparatively small part of them, not more than one half of them, voted for officers.

Mr. BIGLER. The Senator is entirely mistaken. What I am speaking of is the October vote for Mr. Parrott, and not the vote for Mr. Parrott on the 4th of January. The election in October was at the end of a bitter partisan contest, and when, let me tell you, owing to the character of the population in Shawnee, it was doubtless larger than it is to-day. The October vote in Shawnee for Mr. Parrott was seven hundred and forty-nine, and for Mr. Ransom sixty-one—making a total of eight hundred and ten votes; and yet the other day there were cast seventeen hundred and twenty votes against the constitution, according to the returns. Whence this additional thousand? Will the Senator from Massachusetts say there are a thousand men in Shawnee who did not vote in October last?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I desire to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania where he gets the information that there were seventeen hundred votes cast at Shawnee in January. It is one of the subjects for which I introduced my resolution this morning to which objection was made. It is that very information, how that vote stood, that I want to get at, and I want to test the accuracy of these verbal statements by an official return.

Mr. BIGLER. I stated when I took the floor that on the one hand I read from the certified returns of the October election from the executive department, and on the other from the certificate of the presiding officers of the respective Houses of the Legislature of Kansas. In that return, not in an official manuscript, but as furnished from the papers of Leecompton, it is put down at one thousand seven hundred and twenty votes against the constitution. The other is official, for it is certified by the proper officer, and shows that in October last, in this district of Shawnee, Mr. Ransom received sixty-one votes and Mr. Parrott seven hundred and forty-nine votes—together, eight hundred and ten. The other day there were one thousand seven hundred and twenty votes cast in the same district against the constitution. Perhaps this can be explained and reconciled, but certainly on its face it looks as much like fraud as anything brought to our notice by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. COLLAMER. Let me ask the gentleman if he is not aware that in the October election it was required that there should be a residence of six months; while at the election in January, in relation to the constitution, there was no residence required?

Mr. BIGLER. That is the most unhappy explanation the Senator could make. It is the most fatal view he could present. Anybody who is familiar with Kansas affairs knows that Shawnee is a country where the citizens have no titles. The title is in the United States Government. They are there as preëmtors; and when the fall of the year approaches, the population, as far as it can without destroying the squatter rights, leaves the country, to stay away during the inclement season. It is my deliberate judgment that the population of Shawnee was hundreds less in January than it was in October. I am so assured by gentlemen who have good opportunities of knowing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILSON. I have no wish to occupy the floor any longer.

Mr. COLLAMER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. PUGH. I hope we shall not adjourn without a vote on this question. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. POLK. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question. He said, I believe, if I understood him aright, first, that he read from the Missouri Republican, and afterwards it appeared that he read, not from the Missouri Republican, but the Missouri Democrat. He did not state the date of the paper.

Mr. WILSON. I did not say that I read from it, but from an article which had been made up out of a letter published in the Republican. It is in a paper that came to me to-day. I received it since the Senate met.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ALLEN answered "yea."

Mr. HUNTER. Has any Senator answered? ["Yes!"] I ask that, by general consent, I may make a statement. I understand there are some Senators on the other side who desire to be heard on this question. There is no disposition to force them to speak to-night, if we can get the question by Monday night. That is all we ask. If those Senators desire to sit on, I am willing to sit with them; but if not, I am willing to adjourn, and let us take the question on Monday night.

Mr. PUGH. I withdraw the call. I supposed we were about to sit it out to-night.

The VICE PRESIDENT. By unanimous consent, the call can be withdrawn. The Chair hears no objection.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 4, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM KREBS.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MOTION TO RECONSIDER.

Mr. GREENWOOD submitted a motion to reconsider the vote by which the case of L. J. Hilburn was yesterday laid on the table.

The motion was entered on the Journal.

The SPEAKER announced the business first in order to be the report of the Committee of Elections on the Ohio contested-election case, on which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky to yield the floor, to enable me to submit a motion that this contested-election case shall be postponed for one hour, in order to allow the call of committees for reports, which was commenced yesterday, to be concluded.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I have no objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri, if I shall be entitled to the floor when the subject shall again come up for consideration.

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman from Kentucky will certainly be entitled to the floor.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Then I will yield the floor, and allow the sense of the House to be taken on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I object to the motion.

Mr. PHELPS. I suppose I have the right to submit the motion. I move that the further consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections be postponed for one hour, to allow the committees to be called for reports which were not called yesterday.

Mr. SEWARD. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. SEWARD. Then I object.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I will yield the floor to allow the gentleman from Missouri to make his motion.

SELECT COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Messrs. BOYCE, QUITMAN, TRIPPE, GARNETT, MOTT, WORTENDYKE, and SPINNER, as the committee authorized under the resolution of Mr. Boyce to investigate various matters connected with the revenue and expenses of the Government.

Mr. SEWARD. I withdraw my objection to the motion of the gentleman from Missouri.

The SPEAKER. The question then is upon the motion to postpone the further consideration of the resolution reported from the Committee of Elections for one hour.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 81, noes 58.

PENSIONS TO OFFICERS AND SOLDIERS.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the consideration of the report made from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, of House bill No. 259; and upon that question the gentleman from Arkansas is entitled to the floor. The question is upon the motion to postpone.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention, if I were disposed to do so, to enter into a discussion at this time of the merits of this bill. My object is to oppose the proposition which emanates from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to postpone the further consideration of this bill to a day certain. I am perfectly willing to vote on a part of that proposition. I am perfectly willing that the consideration of this bill shall be postponed; but I am radically opposed to the system resorted to by gentlemen upon this floor, and giving a measure of that character, and indeed of any other character, precedence over bills long since introduced and of equal importance. I desire it, then, to be understood that while I am not expressing an opinion upon the merits of this measure, I am desirous of being understood as opposed to the postponement of this bill to the time indicated by the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. SAVAGE,] for the reason that it would give this bill preference over any and all other measures which in fact have not had the same advantage, and which could not possibly get the advantage sought for this measure.

Gentlemen talk about the importance of this measure, and say that, because it is an important measure, therefore it should be given this preference; therefore we ought to postpone it to a day certain. Why, sir, I could talk about a dozen other measures which have been introduced, which are equally important. I remember to have introduced a resolution a few days since, which has not had this advantage—a resolution by virtue of the passage of which the business of this House would be greatly facilitated—a resolution confining debate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to the matter legitimately submitted to the committee. That resolution has not been acted upon yet; and I could also say to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] when he talks about the importance of this measure, that there are others which are of more importance. I would call his attention to a bill which I introduced a few days since, for the establishment of a board of inspectors at the town of Napoleon, Arkansas, and to the numerous railroad bills for that State, all of which are of more importance than this bill. This is an important measure, but those others are equally important. Therefore I propose to enter my protest against giving this or any other measure precedence over others which I regard as equally important. I could allude to numerous other bills introduced by various gentlemen upon this floor, which are equally important; yet they are all to be thrust aside, I apprehend, and this particular measure, because it is a great source for Buncombe, must have precedence over all other measures. I protest against it. Let it go where all other important measures go—to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and let it be found where my bills have always heretofore been found—among its unfinished business.

Mr. STANTON. What is the distinct question before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is a motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and a motion to postpone until the 24th of February. The question will be first upon the motion to postpone. No motion has been made to commit to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STANTON. I have one word to say in regard to the postponement. It is clear to my mind that if this bill, reported by the gentleman from Tennessee, is to be considered, it ought to be considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If it is intended to make it a special order for a given day, it should be attended by a motion to commit. This is a measure of very great magnitude; it has been pending almost since the commencement of the session before the Committee on Military Affairs, and that committee have been seeking to perfect the details of a bill, but have not succeeded as yet in doing so. Now, the details of this measure are matters of very great importance, as well as the measure itself; and I shall not, for one, consent that this shall be brought before the House in the House itself, subject to having the previous question called upon it, and where, without debate and without amendment, members may be compelled to vote upon it as it stands, and thereby be placed in a doubtful position before the country, when they are, in fact, in favor of a well-adjusted system of pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812, and in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee.

For myself I am in favor of a well-digested and carefully-prepared bill granting pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812; but I am not in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee as it now stands. I am perfectly certain that no well-digested bill will be prepared in this House unless it does go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where the committee may have an opportunity to examine its details and perfect its provisions. The Committee on Military Affairs have deemed it important, to enable them to act understandingly on the measure, to have some information from the War Department as to the extent of the draft which this bill will make upon the national Treasury. They have called for the information, but it has not yet been communicated to them. Neither the committee nor the House have perhaps the remotest idea of the extent of the draft which this bill will make upon the national Treasury. Whether the bill, as it now stands, will require ten, or twenty, or forty millions per annum, no man can tell. I submit that while it is an important measure, and perhaps a very desirable measure—though I confess that it is a measure the expediency of which is somewhat questionable—I am not in favor of legislating in the dark, or of making it a special order in the House, where it may be forced through under the previous question, and where members may be compelled to vote upon the bill as it is, and thereby be held responsible to the country as being opposed to a system of pensions for the soldiers of the war of 1812, while, in fact, they are in favor of it. I trust, therefore, than unless the gentleman from Tennessee will modify his motion so as to make the proposition to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and make it the special order for a day certain, the House will not postpone it to the day named by him.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. Why not make the motion yourself?

Mr. DAVIDSON. Mr. Speaker, I understand, and if I am wrong gentlemen will correct me, that this bill was reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions. It seems to me, sir, that if that committee has been constituted for any purpose at all, if it has any duty to perform, it is to examine and report upon just such bills as this. I think that, if the Committee on Military Affairs discharge their duty, and I know they will do it, they will have enough to do at this time to attend to the military affairs of the country.

Mr. STANTON. If the gentleman will permit me, I wish to inquire whether it is in order now, with the questions at present pending, to move to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and make it the special order for the 24th of February?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to move to make it a special order, unless it be done by unanimous consent. The motion could only be made on Monday; it requires a suspension of the rules.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Well, sir, the Committee on Invalid Pensions have examined the details of this bill and have reported it. They have asked the House, after a full investigation of its merits, to fix a day to determine whether they will at this late day grant relief to the widows and orphans of the soldiers of the war of 1812. They come here and ask you if you will do justice to these parties, without asking whether it will take one million, or five million, or ten million dollars. I have never yet learned, sir, that statesmen, in the discharge of the solemn duties imposed on them, have ever counted the cost when they undertook to do justice between claimants and the Government. I have always thought that the first thing to be ascertained by a committee in the consideration of a proposition was, is it just? and if it is right to render justice on the part of the Government to the people, then it is right and proper that they should have a chance to be heard.

Now, sir, I know, from the little experience I have had in legislation, what the meaning of a motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is. I understand the strategy resorted to by gentlemen to avoid discussion and votes in this House, and a show upon the record of the House who is in favor of rendering justice to the people and who is not in favor of it; and, therefore, I, for one, am opposed to sending this bill to the Committee of the Whole. I wish to know the reason why this House, with the Speaker in the chair, and under the rules, cannot render a just and appropriate and proper verdict between the people and the Government? Let us do it here, sir, where we have a right to call the yeas and nays, and show the people who are for rendering them justice and who are opposed to it, or rather in favor of postponing it and giving it the cold shoulder.

I am in favor of this bill. I believe it is right that the Government should carry out the principle which they have established as a just one, of giving pensions to those who have served the country, by coming forward now and rendering justice to the widows and orphans of the soldiers of the war of 1812. For these reasons I am in favor of fixing a day for the consideration of the bill in the House; and I demand the previous question.

Mr. PHELPS. Will the Chair state what will be the order in which the question will be put if the previous question is seconded, and the main question ordered?

The SPEAKER. The first question will be upon the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. That failing, the question will be upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. PHELPS. Then the motion I desired to submit yesterday to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, was not entertained?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear such a motion.

Mr. PHELPS. I submitted such a motion yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not entertain the motion of the gentleman from Missouri. If he made the motion at all, it was made after the motion to postpone had been submitted, which precluded the reception of his motion.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that the previous question is demanded. I would inquire if the effect of sustaining the previous question would not be to cut off the motion to postpone?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. STANTON. What will be the effect of the previous question? Will it bring us to a direct vote upon the engrossment of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The first question will be on the motion to recommit to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. STANTON. And next upon the motion to postpone?

The SPEAKER. The motion to recommit failing, the question will then be upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill. If the previous question be sustained, it will cut off the motion to postpone.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Then I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I simply want to say in regard to this matter, that if I understand it, it is not a question of legal right and justice; that it is, at best, a matter of gratuity, and that it is not a fair statement of the case to say that these individuals are here requiring their legal claims. They are here simply asking for a gratuity. It is not a question of legal claim, but a question whether the House will grant pensions to these parties. It may be in equity and morals an honest claim, but it is certainly not a legal one.

Mr. CURTIS. I rise to a point of order. It is not in order to go into the merits of the bill upon a motion to postpone.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I am simply answering the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. Davidson.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana was out of order.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Well, I wish the Chair had found it out sooner.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Illinois had appealed to the Chair, the Chair would have interrupted the remarks of the gentleman from Louisiana. The gentleman from Illinois can proceed to assign any reasons why the measure should or should not be postponed. The debate is limited by the rules of the House upon a motion to postpone, and it must be confined to assigning reasons why the measure should or should not be postponed.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is immaterial for me to speak unless I can say what I wanted to say in a few words; and that was that it is well known, I presume, to every gentleman of the House, that nine out of ten, and perhaps ninety-nine out of a hundred, of these claimants, are not the widows and orphans of the soldiers; but that the object is simply to satisfy the demands of speculators and land-sharks into whose hands the claims have gone. That is the fact about it. I desire the bill to be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where it can be considered and sifted, so that it shall be well guarded. If we do anything in this matter, let us do it for the benefit of surviving soldiers and their widows and orphans, and not for the everlasting cormorants who come here and urge the kind of claims which it is here proposed to originate.

Mr. PHELPS. I desire to appeal to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SAVAGE] to permit me to submit a motion that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and then he can submit his motion to postpone.

Mr. CURTIS. I have but one word to say, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOVEJOY] took occasion to refer to the merits of the bill. For one, I am perfectly willing to have it fully prepared and matured before it comes before the House; but I submit that there will be time enough before the 24th of February to mature the bill, as the gentleman from Tennessee avers that he will do. So far from this being a scheme coming from speculators, it is merely a measure of even-handed justice.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I submit the question of order, whether the gentleman is in order in discussing the merits of the bill?

Mr. CURTIS. I will confine myself, if possible, to what is in order. I am arguing that the time to which it is proposed to postpone this bill is sufficient to allow of its being matured.

One word now in regard to the matter being before the Committee on Military Affairs. It is true that this bill had been before the Committee on Military Affairs, and is now before that committee in another form. Every member knows that within this period the committee will have ample time to mature it, so far as it can do so; and every member knows that it is the purpose of the friends of the bill to bring it up in the fairest possible form; to ask nothing but what is right; to trim it down to the simplest possible form, and to have it fairly and fully discussed before the House.

There is no desire to have this bill brought prematurely before the House. So far from the Military Committee requiring a postponement, I apprehend that a majority of that committee have already prepared their own views. Some inquiries have been made at the War Department, and I presume that long before the 24th of February these inquiries will have been answered. I am in favor of the motion made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. SAVAGE], because I am told by those who are best acquainted with the forms, that unless a vote be secured on it in this way, it is likely to be lost forever. I therefore advocate the motion of my friend who introduced the bill, and hope it will pass. If it be found that the Committee on Military Affairs produce a better bill, or a bill that may appear more satisfactory, I am authorized to say that the friends of the bill will take that form in preference to the one now presented, and will bring it up on the day proposed. We are in earnest in this matter. I do not want to encroach on the rights of the House by entering on a debate as to the merits of the bill, but I hope that in proper time I will be heard on the merits.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It appears to be the wish of all persons in the House that there should be a fair and full investigation of this bill; and therefore, to secure that, I propose that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order, and that the bill be printed. That will secure its investigation and consideration.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I shall object to making a special order. I desire the reference of the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, but I am opposed to making a special order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I have nothing more to say on the subject. I am opposed to having the bill postponed and kept before the House.

Mr. SAVAGE. My object is a fair one; and I am at all times willing to accept a fair proposition. The only object that I have in view, as I said in my remarks yesterday, is simply to have a fair trial of this bill before the House and before the country. I believe that the proposition of my colleague [Mr. Jones] presents such an opportunity, and that I ought to accept it, if the House permit me to do so. I am willing to have the bill referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, if it be made a special order for any time within the next six weeks or two months. If my colleague will select any day within the next six weeks, I, as a friend of the bill, will give my consent. Say the first Tuesday in March, as suggested to me by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would say to my colleague that I am willing to see any day selected; but as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] objects to its being made a special order, I cannot make the motion; and therefore I have nothing more to say on that subject.

Mr. SAVAGE. I suppose that the gentleman has a right to make the motion for a special order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I understand that I can only make my motion by unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I hope unanimous consent will be given, and let us dispose of this matter.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope my friend from North Carolina will withdraw his objection, and let the course indicated by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] be adopted. We waste more time in caviling over it than would be taken up in this way.

Mr. CLINGMAN. What is the precise motion?

Mr. LETCHER. To refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and make it a special order for six weeks or two months hence.

Mr. SAVAGE. Say the first Tuesday in March.

Mr. CLINGMAN. For how many days?

Mr. LETCHER. Say for two days. We can dispose of it in that time.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I withdraw my objection, if the special order be confined to two days.

Mr. SAVAGE. Say three days, as a compromise.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I object to the motion to make it a special order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I suppose we can vote at once on the motion to postpone. There is no use in discussing it further.

The question being on the motion to postpone the further consideration of the bill till the 24th of February next,

Mr. BOCKOCK demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Bockock and WALDRON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes one hundred and eight, noes not counted.

So the bill was postponed.

INVALID PENSIONS.

Mr. MORSE, of New York, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported bills of the following titles; which were severally read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of Isaac Carpenter;
A bill for the relief of Leonard Loomis; and A bill for the relief of Hector St. John Beatty.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill making appropriation for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States, for the year ending June 30, 1859.

A bill to alter the times of holding the terms of the United States courts for the State of South Carolina.

Also, that the Senate had passed a joint resolution for the compensation of R. R. Richards, as chaplain of the penitentiary, for his salary, to June 30, 1857; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

RE-REFERENCE OF PAPERS.

Mr. MORSE, of New York, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back the petitions and papers in the cases of John McGarvey, Stephen P. Lamb, and Mary M. Davison; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

INVALID PENSION BILLS.

Mr. CHAFFEE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported bills of the following titles; which were severally read a first and second time, and referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of Henrietta L. Clarke;
A bill for the relief of Thomas Alcott; and
A bill for the relief of Mary W. Thompson.

WILLIAM YORK.

Mr. POTTER, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of William York; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

T. L. O. KEEFFEE.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of T. L. O. Keefee, of Missouri; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

T. A. CROSBY.

Mr. CASE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back the petition and papers of Thompson A. Crosby; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

EXTENSION OF A PATENT.

Mr. REILLY, from the Committee on Patents, reported a bill extending the patent granted to William Crompton for an improvement in figure or fancy power-looms, for seven years from the 25th day of January, 1858; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

DAVID BRUCE.

Mr. MACLAY, from the Committee on Patents, reported a bill for the relief of David Bruce; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

CLERK TO A COMMITTEE.

Mr. KEITT, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be authorized to employ a clerk at the usual rate of compensation for clerks of committees in this House.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I object to that resolution.

Mr. LETCHER. How does it come here?

Mr. KEITT. It is the report of a committee.

Mr. LETCHER. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. KEITT] how long that committee want a clerk, what they want him to do, and whether they do not also want a stenographer?

Mr. KEITT. In reply to the question of the gentleman, I have to say that if we wanted a stenographer, we should have to appoint the gentleman from Virginia; but as the gentleman is pretty full of business, I do not like to ask him to act as stenographer. But, sir, the only question of the gentleman requiring an answer is, how long we want a clerk? I reply that, we want one only for a short time—only until we can complete some surveys and explorations which have to be made.

It is very well known that these grounds have to be extended; and various plans have been presented, some extending them to Second street, some to Third street, and some to Four-and-a-half street. We have in view to present these various schemes to the House, with their cost, and then let the House determine which plan they will adopt; and no longer than is absolutely necessary will the clerk be employed.

The resolution was not agreed to—ayes 60, noes 114.

Mr. BILLINGHURST moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was rejected; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the Committee had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 62) to supply an omission in the enrollment of a certain act therein named; which thereupon received the signature of the Speaker.

CONTUMACIOUS WITNESS.

Mr. STANTON. The House will remember that the reception of the answer of the witness who was attached for contempt, was postponed until one o'clock to-day. It is one o'clock now, and the Sergeant-at-Arms informs me that the witness is present and ready to answer.

Mr. PHELPS. How many more committees are there to be called?

The SPEAKER. Some eight or ten.

Mr. STANTON. I now move that the House receive the answer of the witness in writing.

The SPEAKER. The hour having arrived, the Chair thinks, in execution of the order that the party shall present himself, when the Chair will propound to him the questions directed by the House.

The Sergeant-at-Arms conducted the witness into the presence of the House, when

The SPEAKER said: J. D. Williamson, you have been presented at the bar of the House by its order, to show cause why you have failed to appear before its committee in obedience to its summons. I am instructed by the House to propound to you the following interrogatories, and to receive your answers thereto "in writing and under oath:"

1. What excuse have you for not appearing before the select committee of this House in pursuance of the summons served on you on the 27th ultimo?

2. Are you now ready to appear before said committee, and answer such proper questions as shall be put to you by said committee?

The witness then submitted the following answer in writing, under oath:

NATIONAL HOTEL, WASHINGTON, February 3, 1858.

Mr. SPEAKER, House of Representatives of the United States, Sir: According to a resolution of the House, of this date, the following interrogatories are to be answered by me under oath, viz:

1st. What excuse have you for not appearing before the select committee of this House, in pursuance of the summons served on you on the 27th ult.?

Answer. I was under the authority of the sheriff of the city and county of New York, not to leave the city without his consent, and was so advised by him and my counsel, with whom I consulted on the subject; also that it always was my opinion, and is still, that neither the House of Representatives or the Senate, has any legal right or authority to compel me to come before them or their committees, to divulge the private transaction of my business which I see fit to transact in a perfect lawful manner, and which if divulged, would destroy all the business of my office, by which I am dependent on to support my family, as no person would entrust their confidential business to a firm who, to suit the different political parties that spring into power every year, would call the firm before them to expose their most confidential and private affairs, which concern only themselves, and which the Constitution of our common country gives to every man who does not violate any of the laws of the land, which I solemnly swear I have never done or violated up to this day, and if I had not have been taken from my bed by force, and brought to this city, by virtue of a warrant issued by order of this House, it was my intention to have thoroughly rested the question now at issue, before one of the courts in New York, without any disrespect to your honorable body, as it has always been one of the most particular objects of my life to pay all due respect and regard for the legal constituted bodies of my country at all times.

2d. Are you now ready to appear before said committee and answer such proper questions as shall be put to you by said committee?

Answer. Yes, all proper questions which shall not effect my integrity or violate my oath or sacred promise I have given not to divulge the same.

J. D. WILLIAMSON.
Subscribed and sworn to before me, this 4th day of February, A. D. 1858.
F. A. MURPHY, J. P.

Mr. STANTON. The committee which this witness was summoned to appear before have had, of course, no consultation as to the course the House should pursue upon that answer, and therefore I am not authorized by them to submit any proposition to the House. I will, however, submit a proposition which strikes me as being proper under the circumstances. The answer, it will be seen, sets up matter of privilege by virtue of which the witness claims exemption. In my judgment there is nothing in it. But I do not propose to precipitate the action of the House upon a question of that sort, or to present the issue prematurely. I therefore desire, by the leave of the House, that time may be given to enable the committee to have the witness brought before them, to propound to him distinct interrogatories, in order that the committee may ascertain whether there is any matter of confidence which the witness claims should exempt him from giving the information the committee desire. If he answers, the question of his obligation or not to answer as to confidence tial matters, will not be brought before the House. If he does not, the committee will be ready to report to the House for such action as the House may think proper to take. With a view to enable us to see what his answer will be, and to appreciate properly the claim of the witness to exemption from responding to the call of the House, I move that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until to-morrow, and that the answer of the witness be printed. And in the mean time I will say to the House that the committee will assemble and have the witness brought before them and interrogatories propounded to him, and we will know then whether there is anything in the witness's claim of exemption.

Mr. KELSEY. I desire to have the first part of the answer of the witness read, in which he speaks of being in the custody of the sheriff of New York. I want to know by what process he was held in custody by the sheriff?

Mr. STANTON. The gentleman will find that he does not state by what process he was held. I submit the motion that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until one o'clock to-morrow, and that the answers of the witness be printed; and on that motion I ask the previous question.

Mr. MILLSON. Will the gentleman from Ohio withdraw his motion for the previous question for a moment or so? I want to make a suggestion to him in reference to the proposition he has submitted, which I think is due to the dignity of the House that the House shall consider before adopting the course proposed by him.

Mr. STANTON. I withdraw it to hear the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. MILLSON. Mr. Speaker, those who listened attentively to the replies of the witness will observe that he has not even sought to purge himself of the contempt for refusing to obey the summons of the House.

Mr. STANTON. If the gentleman will permit me, I will modify my motion by adding to it that the witness be recommitted to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. MILLSON. That modification will, in a great degree, remove the objection which I had to the original motion of the gentleman from Ohio. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that the witness distinctly takes issue with the House. The witness has come here to defy the authority of the House. It is not now a question between the witness and the committee, but one between the witness and the power of this House to compel the attendance of persons whose testimony may be wanted in the prosecution of any investigation before a committee having power to send for persons and papers. Now, sir, the House will see that it owes it to its own dignity first to settle this question, before the witness shall be allowed to appear before the committee and give testimony in reply to questions that may be propounded to him. He tells us that unless he had been compelled to appear here, unless he had been dragged from his bed by order of the House, he never would have voluntarily appeared. He tells us that it was his purpose to invoke the decision of the courts of law for the purpose of ascertaining the extent of the constitutional power of this House. Then, sir, he stands in the attitude of contumacy before the House. In his answer it is declared that he intended to test the question before one of the courts of New York.

Now, I do not mean to say that this is a privilege which the witness may not exercise. He has a right to invoke the decision of the courts of law; and, as he has invited this controversy with the House, it is due to him, as well as to the House, that he should be indulged in the opportunity of invoking the decision of the courts of the United States in this District. Sir, I do not mean to come to any premature conclusion as to the extent of the authority of the House. It may be that, upon a full investigation of this subject, I may conclude, too, that this House had no authority to compel the attendance of the witness here. But we have summoned him here; we have "dragged" him here; and it will not do for the House now to evade the issue thus made up. It is due to ourselves that, before this person is examined as a witness before the committee, it should be ascertained in what aspect he presents himself, in what attitude he stands before the House. To allow him to be examined before the committee is to relieve him of the penalty that he may have incurred.

I then suggest, sir, to the gentleman from Ohio, that before this person shall be brought before the committee to give testimony, the House shall deliberately determine as to the extent of its own power, and inquire whether he does not owe an atonement to the House, which must first be exacted before his testimony can be received.

Mr. STANTON. I will suggest to the gentleman from Virginia what, it occurs to my mind, is the proper course for us to pursue when the answers shall have been printed and the House shall have had an opportunity to see them. It certainly never occurred to me that the taking of the witness before the committee, and propounding questions to him, whether answered or not, would discharge him from the contempt of the House. But my idea is this: that when the witness shall be presented here, upon a refusal to answer or having answered, this House shall, by its resolution, transmit him to the criminal courts which have jurisdiction of his case for violating the statute which requires him to obey the subpoena of this House.

That is my idea of what the committee will probably recommend if the witness shall refuse to answer questions; that the House shall send him to the district attorney for the District of Columbia, or for the southern district of New York, to be dealt with for a violation of the criminal statute of the country in refusing obedience to the subpoena of the House, and that we shall not bother with him here about a little question.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to give me the privilege of submitting a resolution which, I think, will meet his views. I ask that it may be read.

Mr. MILLSON. I have no objection to hearing it read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas, J. D. Williamson has failed satisfactorily to answer questions put to him by order of the House, and has not purged himself of the contempt charged:

Resolved, That said J. D. Williamson be continued in close custody by the Sergeant-at-Arms, until discharged by the further order of the House, to be taken when he shall have purged himself of the contempt charged, by testifying before said committee.

Mr. MILLSON. I did not give way to the gentleman from Ohio to offer that resolution, but merely to hear it read.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I ask the gentleman to allow me to have read a substitute for the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox.] I will remark that I am a member of the select committee.

Mr. MILLSON. I will hear the gentleman's resolution read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas, the answer of J. D. Williamson, in answer to the questions of the House of Representatives relative to his disobedience of a summons of this House as a witness, and his willingness to answer the questions of the committee which may be propounded to him, being insufficient and quibbling, and therefore disrespectful and impertinent: It is thereupon Ordered, By this House, that said J. D. Williamson be committed to the common jail of this District, without bail or mainprize, until he answer all legal questions propounded to him.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Will the gentleman permit me to read a proposition which I desire to offer?

The proposition was read, as follows:

Ordered, That the Speaker do reprimand J. D. Williamson for his contumacy, and that said J. D. Williamson do pay the costs of this attachment; and that the Sergeant-at-Arms do produce him before the said select committee at such time as it may require him, and answer such questions as they may propound to him.

Mr. MILLSON. I have now heard all the various suggestions and propositions submitted by gentlemen; and I take the opportunity to say that none of them exactly meets my concurrence. Before I proceed, however, to consider the merits of these propositions, I desire to reply to a suggestion made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON.] The gentleman says that the witness will not be relieved from the penalties incurred for his contempt in refusing to obey the process of the House, by going before the committee and being examined. He says that if he is brought before the committee and shall then refuse to answer the questions propounded, a report of his contempt will then be made, and the House may then take such order as may be proper. Now, I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that there is an account now to be settled with the House by this witness. It may be that another opportunity will be afforded the House to consider the question of the propriety of punishing for contempt in refusing to answer. But there is, at this moment, an unsettled account with the House in the refusal to appear.

We must first consider whether we have authority to compel the attendance of a witness; and when the witness is in contumacy in refusing to appear, it is due to the House, before it gives him another opportunity of practicing a contempt of its authority, to have the preliminary question settled. The mandate of the House will fall into contempt, if, when we require the attendance of a witness, he shall deliberately, on the advice of counsel, refuse to make his appearance here, and then, when compelled to come by the service of an attachment, say that he never would have come of his own free will, and that he came only because he was dragged here. If we permit that, sir, our authority will fall into as much contempt as that of ancient Dogberry, when he charged his subordinates to arrest all disorderly persons, and when asked what they should do if they resisted, advised them to let them go, and thank God that they had got rid of the rogues.

Let us determine this preliminary question. And on this point I will observe that I do not like any of the propositions suggested by the three gentlemen who have submitted them to the House. I do not think we ought at this time to come to any conclusion as to the extent of our authority. I think the witness ought to be remanded to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and that then the select committee charged with the subject should report to us their views of the power of the House and their opinion as to what ought to be done to vindicate its authority.

Mr. COX. Permit me to say one word in explanation of my substitute.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I wish to have the original resolution and the amendments reported by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has entertained no proposition except that made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON.]

Mr. BURROUGHS. I understood that amendments were offered to that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not entertain them. They were merely reported for information.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I move my proposition as a substitute for that of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON.]

Mr. BURROUGHS. I am not in favor of adopting any resolution to send this subject as a matter of inquiry to any committee of the House, either to determine the power of the House, or to decide any question relating to this subject of contempt. This doctrine, that the Legislature of a State, or that either House of Congress of the United States, has the right to demand the attendance of any citizen, and to examine him as a witness, did not originate in America. It is as old as the existence of the Parliament of England.

I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] to be, that this man be sent back, and to make a report of his case to the district court for the southern district of the State of New York. Now let us see what dilemma we would then be in. We have here before us a question to investigate certain grave frauds and wrongs and villainies alleged to have been committed during the last Congress by certain gentlemen. Now, when we have got before us a man brought up by the proper officer as a witness, the gentleman from Ohio proposes the very ingenious method of sending him back to the State of New York, that his offense may be there investigated, while he stands before us in utter defiance of our authority; in defiance of the parliamentary law of the country; in defiance of the parliamentary law of every country that ever had a parliament, or a properly constituted government. And we remain here with our hands tied, unable to produce the facts on which this investigation is to proceed.

Another thing. The gentleman from Ohio says that this man may possibly be under some honorable obligation as to matters which he dare not or may not disclose. It is not the first time, sir, that thieves have felt themselves under honorable obligations. It is not the first time that rascals and villains have claimed that their confidence was superior to the law. I recollect very well, that on a murder trial in my State, a few years ago—the highest crime known to the common law or to the law of the land—men appeared before the court and said that they had taken to themselves obligations higher than the law of the land, higher than the Constitution of their country. But what did the courts do with those men? They put them in jail and kept them there till they answered.

Now, we have got a committee ready to investigate frauds which my friend from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] thought it worth while to inquire into. It is charged, sir, that $87,000 were offered and paid to members here last year to obtain their votes on certain measures calculated to strike down the interests of the North; and we have engaged in the investigation of these villainies. And yet we are to send this man home to be tried before our courts for refusing to answer! Sir, I am in favor of putting this man straight in jail, and keeping him there until he shall indicate his intention to appear before this committee and tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. And I would keep him there until his flesh withers upon his bones, unless he answers. Sir, we shall never be able to establish truth, honesty, and fair dealing among men, unless we have power to compel the attendance of witnesses, and to compel them to testify their knowledge of wrongs that have been committed.

Now, sir, I do not know what other men may think, but I believe that during the last ten years there have been villainies practiced by lobbies about the Halls of Congress, which should be laid before the world. I believe the future existence of this Government depends upon the integrity of the representatives of the people. But, sir, I have perhaps said more than the occasion calls for. I put it to the conscience, I put it to the heart of every member, whether he will consent to excuse a man who comes here to defy the power of Congress—who tells us that he has got some confidential arrangement with some thieves and scoundrels which he will not disclose? Sir, send this man to jail, and keep him there until he will speak.

Mr. HUGHES. I ask that the first and last sections of the act of the last Congress be read. The Clerk read as follows:

“Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any person summoned as a witness by the authority of either House of Congress to give testimony, or to produce papers upon any matter before either House, or any committee of either House of Congress, who shall willfully make default, or who appearing, shall refuse to answer any question pertinent to the matter of inquiry in consideration before the House or committee by which he shall be examined, shall, in addition to the pains and penalties now existing, be liable to indictment as and for a misdemeanor, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, and on conviction, shall pay a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, and not less than one hundred dollars, and suffer imprisonment in the common jail not less than one month, nor more than twelve months.”

“Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That when a witness shall fail to testify, as provided in the previous sections of this act, and the facts shall be reported to the House, it shall be the duty of the Speaker of the House or the President of the Senate to certify the fact, under the seal of the House or Senate, to the district attorney for the District of Columbia, whose duty it shall be to bring the matter before the grand jury for their action.”

Mr. HUGHES. I desire to make a suggestion or two to the House upon the application of that statute, in a case of the character of that now under consideration. That law was passed in the last Congress. It will be observed that a contempt of the House, such as will subject a party to the penalties provided in this statute, may be committed in two ways: first, by refusing to obey the process of the House; and, second, by refusing to testify before the House or before a committee. And the statute says that these penalties are superadded to such penalties as now exist. Now, in case the party refuses to obey the process of the House, he is liable to be indicted in the district court of the United States where the offense was committed. If he refuses to testify, the effect of his refusal will be that he will be reported to the House, and the Speaker is to certify to the fact of his so refusing to testify to the district attorney. But the Speaker is not required to certify to anything in case he fails to obey the process of the House, because the offense is already complete.

So far as that branch of the matter is concerned, the witness has clearly brought himself within the letter and spirit of the law of the last Congress. The House has nothing to do, and the Speaker has nothing to certify to. It is a complete offense within the jurisdiction of the district court, and must be left to that court to determine. If gentlemen desire to pursue this man further for this offense they must carry their complaint before the district court.

But so far as the second branch of the statute is concerned, the case is not yet fairly before the House for its action. If the witness has refused to testify, the fact of his refusing to testify must be reported to the House by the committee, and the Speaker must then certify that he has so refused, to the District Attorney.

Then so far as this statute passed by the last Congress is concerned, the matter has not, in my opinion, assumed a form which authorizes the House to take definite action in the case.

But, sir, this law provides that the penalties therein named shall be in addition to the penalties to which the party was previously liable. Upon that subject I shall appeal to my friend from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] for information, for I do not profess to be correctly informed upon it. I understand, however, (and if I am not correct, I hope gentlemen will set me right,) that, previous to the passage of that act, the extent of the House to punish for contempt consisted in continuing the party in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms during the session.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. Where did you get that authority from?

Mr. HUGHES. From the case of Houston and Stansbury. The circumstances of that case led to a very full discussion of the powers of the House for punishing for contempt.

Mr. MILLSON. In reply to the gentleman from Indiana, I will say that he is undoubtedly correct in stating that the power of the House to punish by imprisonment is limited by the duration of its constitutional term. There can be no doubt about that; and that was precisely the reason why Congress at the last session enacted a law which would subject a contumacious witness to a punishment which might outlast the duration of the Congress itself.

Mr. KELSEY. I desire to make a suggestion. It seems to me that the first question before the House is to decide whether this answer of the witness purges himself of the contempt he has committed in refusing to obey the subpoena of this House? When the House has passed upon that, the question will then recur, whether the witness is willing to obey the order of the House and testify before the committee? Then we can deal with him, if he is contumacious.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. The very substitute now before the House proposes to pass an opinion upon that subject, by saying that he has not purged himself, the reply being insufficient and impertinent.

Mr. HUGHES. To proceed from the point where I was interrupted—and I will presently come to the matter suggested by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. KELSEY:] this House, then, had power, previous to the passage of this law, to commit a party for contempt for such a period as the Congress might last. Now, whether that punishment can extend to confinement in the common jail, is a question I shall not discuss. This House commits a man, for contempt, to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms. Whether it is usual or not to put him in the common jail, I do not know. The question now before the House is, will they leave this man to this penalty of the law, which he has incurred for failing to obey the process, and which he will further incur if he refuses to testify? or will the House act under the old law, so imperfect that this law was necessary to cure its defects? So far as the question now before the House is concerned, in regard to the exercise of its own powers, there can be no two opinions about it. The witness has openly set the power of the House at defiance. That he is in contempt of the House there is no doubt. But, sir, it is a matter of discretion in the House whether they will now proceed to deal with him, or whether they will suspend their judgment upon that matter until he has been before the committee—for the sending him before the committee, before the jury, to give evidence in the matter in which it is required, by no means purges him of contempt.

I suggest that, as the powers of this House upon this subject are so very imperfect, an attempt to exercise them would give rise to a great deal of embarrassment, and be a great obstruction to the public business; and as this statute covers the case fully, and there is a competent court having jurisdiction of this matter, the House ought to content itself, for the present at least, by simply passing the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON.] Then, if the witness continues to be contumacious, the House, upon the report of the committee, can pursue the matter further. But it is obvious, if we do, we ought not to carry it any further than is necessary to obtain the testimony, because we detain a man who is already in the power of a court.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I agree very generally with the remarks made by the gentleman from Indiana. The proper course for the House, as I think, is to waive the contempt, send the witness before the committee, and let the questions be propounded. I do not know, nor does he know, what questions will be propounded. There ought to be no questions propounded but legal ones, and he has said that he will answer all legal questions. [“No! no!”] Proper and legal I consider the same. Let the committee report to the House the questions propounded to the witness by the committee, if he refuses to answer them. Then we can take action upon the report. I call the previous question.

Mr. STANTON. I ask the gentleman from Georgia to withdraw the demand for the previous question a single moment, and I will renew it.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I withdraw it.

Mr. STANTON. I trust that the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. WRIGHT], who has made the motion to commit the witness, will withdraw his proposition. All I desire is, that the committee may have an opportunity to propound their questions, and see if they can get the testimony they desire. I wish the House to remember that we are now acting judicially; and it has been my experience, in the little practice I have had, that judges sit deliberately and calmly, and mature their judgments. I hope the House will not act hastily, make a rash judgment, and establish a practice which may be prejudicial to the rights of parties who may hereafter be brought before it.

The proposition I submit to the House contemplates no present, definite, and distinct action in reference to this matter of contempt. It does not exonerate the witness from any action which the House may think proper to take hereafter. It does not decide that the act of the witness is not a contempt, but it proposes a course which is dignified, and which befits a calm consideration of the subject.

It is proper to say further, that since this proceeding has commenced the witness had said to me that he is not a lawyer, and has not prepared his answer upon consultation with a lawyer, and does not know its legal defects; that he does not desire, in consequence of his ignorance, to be involved in any very serious consequences. At the same time, it is as little as the House can do to let the matter go over; and if the gentleman from Georgia will withdraw his proposition, I think the House will, by common consent, adopt the proposition I have submitted, or will now agree upon such a proposition as will give satisfaction to the witness and to all parties concerned. I move the previous question.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. Will the gentleman from Ohio withdraw the demand for the previous question, as he has made an appeal to me in regard to my proposition?

Mr. STANTON. Certainly.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. It was with great reluctance that I moved the resolution which I submitted. I moved it, sir, with the conviction in my own heart that it was absolutely necessary that the House should act with energy in the protection of its own rights, and in the protection of its honor, or that this House would not attain the object which it sought by this investigation. This gentleman presents himself here, sir, in an attitude of contumacy. He comes here to quibble in the face of the House, and before its members, upon the authority of the House to command respect from all the citizens of this Republic. He comes here and doubts, in the first place, our right to take him at all, and tells the House that he intends to have the question investigated by the tribunals of the country. Well, sir, he has the right to have it so investigated; but it does not come, in my opinion, with a good grace from a witness who appears before a judicial tribunal—for that is our attitude now—in obedience to a rule, nisi to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt, to quibble upon the authority which has brought him before it, and to tell the court that he intends to pry into its powers and ascertain whether it can do so and so and so and so. Let this House act, and then this gentleman can investigate the question. Let him take the responsibility, in the first place, of refusing obedience to the mandate of the House; and when this House has, in a proper manner, punished him for that disobedience and that contumacy, or undertaken to do it, then let him try the law—the judicial tribunals are open to him—and see whether the action of this House is legal or not.

Sir, we are engaged in a great question. It is one, as I remarked in the outset, which involves the honor of the House, which involves the integrity of the legislative body of this nation. It is alleged that in this temple, dedicated to justice and to law, frauds, infamous frauds, have been practiced for the purpose of controlling legislation, and that the votes of members of this House have been bought and sold in the market. You have appointed a committee to investigate the matter, to ascertain whether those allegations are true, and if so, to publish the facts to the country. I say it is a great question. If there be truth in these charges, it ought to be known, although it may blacken the annals of our country's history. The people ought to know it. The people never will know it unless you command respect to the precepts which this House issues, and aid your committee in a proper investigation of this question.

Mr. Speaker, the committee were satisfied, before the subpoena was issued for this witness, that we should have trouble with him.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman from Georgia if a letter, written to the committee by this witness, in which he denied the power of the House, was not read here the other day?

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I think there was, but I have not read the letter.

Mr. STANTON. Certainly there was.

A MEMBER. It was addressed to the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. COX. I would be glad to have it read again.

Mr. STANTON. I submit to the gentleman from Georgia whether it will not do just as well to do this thing to-morrow as to-day? That is all the difference there is between us.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. No, sir.

Mr. STANTON. I submit whether it is not better not to do anything hastily?

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I do not want to do anything hastily. This gentleman has nothing in the world to do but to express his willingness to answer all legal questions (mark you) which may be propounded to him to relieve himself from imprisonment. He need not move one foot from where he now stands. He has but to say "I am ready to answer all legal questions propounded to me by the committee;" but he has no right to append to it his own terms or the condition that he will answer if he can do so without violating any promise he has given or any oath which he has taken.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him at this point? I do it for the purpose of announcing to the House, upon the authority of the witness who is produced before it, that he is willing to answer every and all questions, and that he does not set up the defense that any question may require him to criminate himself.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. If that is the case, I am satisfied that the witness shall go before the committee, and will not press my resolution.

Mr. STANTON. I now demand the previous question, and will insist on it.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. May I take the floor for a moment?

Mr. STANTON. I would be glad to accommodate the gentleman, but there are twenty others asking the same privilege, and I cannot do it.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw the demand for the previous question for a moment. I will renew it.

Mr. STANTON. Well, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman has anything to say for the witness, it will be proper that he shall state it. If not, I must decline to withdraw the previous question, as there are at least twenty other gentlemen who desire to make speeches.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I answer the gentleman from Ohio that I have something to say, direct and pertinent to the interests of the witness, and which I am authorized to speak by him and for him.

Mr. STANTON. Then, sir, if the gentleman from New York will renew the demand for the previous question, and not withdraw it for anybody, I withdraw it.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Have I the floor, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor.

Mr. READY. I desire to know if the gentleman from New York is authorized to say that the witness will make the answer he has just stated in writing?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I have not questioned the witness on that point.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask if the gentleman is authorized to say that the witness will make that answer under oath, as the resolution of the House requires?

Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE. The answer ought to be in writing.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. If I have the floor, I desire to say a word or two, not only in respect to the rights of this witness, but in respect to the reputation of this House and of the people of the United States whom it represents.

Mr. McQUEEN. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York if the witness is prepared to withdraw the answers which he made to the House this morning?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I will ascertain that in a moment. In the mean time, however, I have a word or two to present to the House on this subject, a subject certainly of a very serious and important character. It has been stated here that we are upon a grave crisis, that we are engaged in the discovery of frauds, and that we have taken a first and a very important step towards that discovery. Ay, sir, we have, but let me entreat gentlemen to look to it that any subsequent step towards that discovery be not planted in an outrage upon the rights of any citizen of these United States. Why, sir, what a picture will it be? The Congress of the United States engaged in purging itself of corruption; engaged in discovering iniquity elsewhere; carrying out their inquiry, in the first place, by an outrage and violence upon the rights of an individual; and in the next place, by asserting a right and their impunity in so doing.

Now, sir, what is the case before us? The witness is introduced here in default. In default of what? Of replying to your mandate to appear and answer. But, in the first place, you have advanced a step beyond that; you have purged this default by asking a question; and your inquiry now is in respect to his contempt for refusing to answer the question, not to a contempt by reason of his default. But if that were not so; if it were for the contempt by reason of his default, and you were not concluded by your advance beyond that question, was not that default purged by his written declaration here that he acted under the supposition that he was under the authority of the sheriff of New York, and was so advised by his counsel? What contempt was there in that, I ask gentlemen here, either those who have been bred to the profession of the long robe, or those who have acted in other vocations of life?

Now, what says the law upon this subject? It has been stated that the law which has been cited is applicable to this case. It is, undoubtedly, but it is applicable only in concurrence with the inherent power of this body to assert its parliamentary rights. The section of the law to which I allude, is as follows:

"Any person summoned as a witness by the authority of either House of Congress to give testimony, or to produce papers, on any matter, before either House, or before any committee of either House of Congress, who shall willfully make default, or, when appearing, shall refuse to answer any question pertinent to the matter of inquiry before the House or committee before which he shall be examined, shall, in addition to the pains and penalties now existing, be liable," &c.

It is clearly, sir, a concurrent and coöperative remedy; and we stand here, not acting under this law, but under the general parliamentary law of all legislative assemblies; and it is in pursuit of that question that I will address to the Speaker, and to the House, a few remaining words. And what shall they be devoted to? Why, simply to the sole question that remains before this House at this present time—whether the witness standing there is a contumacious witness, refusing to answer the questions put to him. What question is put to him? I ask that the question be read from the Clerk's desk. Sir, there is no question. The committee has not done its duty. In its great anxiety to punish an alleged fraud, it has come here in hot haste—to punish whom? The perpetrators of the fraud? No; but the witness, before they have given him the opportunity of answering, or refusing to answer, the questions that should have been put to him.

And what a spectacle is this for the country to look upon! What a spectacle to be exhibited in the Hall of its Representatives; that, when pursuing alleged fraud, they should plant their foot on the neck of an innocent and unoffending witness! Sir, I move the previous question.

Mr. MOORE. I beg the gentleman will withdraw the call for the previous question.

The call was withdrawn.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I understand that the answer of the witness is not withdrawn.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I am authorized by the witness to state that he is ready and willing to answer in writing here, or at the bar, or elsewhere, as the House may direct.

Mr. ADRAIN. I hope that the witness's answer will be put in writing. It will not do to come merely from the lips of a member. I wish to have his answer reduced to writing, so that there will be no dispute hereafter as to what he said or did not say.

Mr. BURNETT. I object to this discussion as being out of order.

The SPEAKER. The call for the previous question has been withdrawn.

Mr. MOORE. If the answer handed in by the witness to-day be withdrawn and modified, as the gentleman [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE] states it will be, and if the modification be made in writing, I do not desire to submit the remarks which I intended to submit.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. May I suggest that the witness professes his willingness to withdraw the present return, and to file a second one to comport with what has been said in his behalf?

Mr. MOORE. The answer that he has made contains nothing about whether he is going to reply to the committee. The House cannot investigate that question now. It can only do so when the certificate of the committee comes legitimately before it. At this time we have nothing to do with it.

Mr. SEWARD. For the purpose of settling this question, I make the distinct motion that the witness do have further time to answer—till to-morrow, at one o'clock, p. m.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move that the witness have permission to withdraw and amend his answer, and that the matter be postponed till to-morrow.

Mr. SEWARD. Well, that is my motion. Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. On that I move the previous question.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I am perfectly willing that that course be taken, particularly as I have private information that the witness is willing to amend his return, and to answer all questions that may be propounded to him. No man in the world has a greater objection than myself to inflict punishment; and it was only for the purpose of punishing contumacy that I moved my amendment.

Mr. STANTON. I submit that, if my proposition to postpone the whole thing till to-morrow be adopted, the witness can come to-morrow with his amended answer.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. But I want the Journal to show that the answer was regarded as not satisfactory, and that the witness had permission to withdraw and amend it.

The SPEAKER stated the question to be on the proposition that J. D. Williamson have leave to withdraw his answer, and to submit an amended answer; such amended answer to be submitted at one o'clock, p. m., to-morrow; and that in the mean time said Williamson remain in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. TRIPPE. I would inquire whether, if that motion be adopted, the select committee cannot have the witness before them between now and one o'clock to-morrow? whether the committee can call the witness before them without the order of the House?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order; the previous question has been called.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. Why did not the previous question cut off this amendment?

The SPEAKER. The previous question was withdrawn to allow the resolution to be amended, and was again demanded.

Mr. SEWARD. By the consent of my colleague, I should like to suggest a modification.

The SPEAKER. No further debate is in order.

Mr. SEWARD. I do not intend to debate it; I want the resolution to show that the answer was withdrawn by the request of the witness.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I accept the modification.

The order was so modified.

Mr. MOORE. I suggest another modification to the effect that in the mean time the witness may be called before the committee to answer.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that unnecessary.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The committee has that power now.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered.

Mr. STANTON. My motion is to postpone this whole subject until one o'clock to-morrow, when the witness will have his answer ready, and may withdraw his answer filed to-day, and present his amended answer. I think that covers the whole ground.

The amendment was agreed to—one hundred and twenty-one having voted in the affirmative.

The proposition, as amended, was then adopted.

OHIO CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

The SPEAKER stated the next business in order to be the report of the Committee of Elections in the Ohio contested-election case, upon which Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, was entitled to the floor.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, in the determination of the question which is brought by the Committee of Elections before the House, propriety demands that we should lose sight entirely of everything like partisan feeling. It is a question of practice, and in treating it, the House acts as a court as well as a parliamentary body.

The precedents, under the act of 1851, stand in bold contrast with the course recommended by the committee. The resolution passed by the committee adopts a rule more stringent than it is usual to observe in courts of justice.

The application for further time to take testimony is met by the declaration that the sitting member in this case declined, directly after the election, to receive a notice from the contestant, the object of which was to go into an examination of the proof. What figure should this fact cut in the decision of the principle by this House?

The laws in Ohio require that the election shall be determined by a board of canvassers, consisting of the Governor, Secretary of State, Attorney General, and probably some other public officer of the State. It provides that the county clerks in the several districts in the State shall forward the returns to the seat of government, and, upon the day fixed by the law of the State, the board of canvassers shall open the poll, examine the returns, and declare the result. The notice of the contestant was sent to the sitting member before the declaration of that result by the canvassers. The day fixed by law for canvassing the returns of the election, was some day in December—the election took place in October—and the notice was served on Mr. Campbell in October, before the day fixed by the law of that State, for the inspection of the election returns, and the declaration of the result, had arrived.

Mr. Campbell declined to enter upon the examination, upon the grounds that the movement was premature. Gentlemen say that in this Mr. Campbell relied upon a technical objection. Not so. As the election was not to be declared until an appointed day in December, it would have been exceedingly indelicate for the member to have received notice of contest, and actually have proceeded to the defense of a seat which, by the laws of the State, had not been pronounced to be his. I ask the members of this high court whether any one of them, placed in exactly the same position, would feel himself at liberty to receive notice of a contest and to go into an examination of the validity of his title to a seat, which title, by the laws of the land, had not been declared in his favor? Much less, then—if he would not do so—ought he to permit this refusal upon the part of Mr. Campbell to affect prejudicially the question which is now pending at the bar. I take it for granted that there is no judge in the world who sits upon the bench, disposed to do right, who would prejudice the rights of a party for not doing that, or for not accepting the proposition to do that which he was in nowise bound by law to do, and was forbidden to do, by every consideration of propriety.

If my proposition is correct, the objection I have noticed falls to the ground, and Mr. Campbell stands here unprejudiced by reason of anything that occurred up to the time when that notice was given to him, under which this proceeding takes place. That was some time in December, 1856. Mr. Campbell was then in Washington, a member of the Thirty-Fourth Congress; and, as we all know, engaged in its business at the head of the Ways and Means. And he was here, a member of that House, from that period in December until after the time had expired in which, according to law, he might have taken this testimony. But I am told this fact makes no difference. The chairman of the Committee of Elections [Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois] says that the law must operate upon all alike; and that the fact that Mr. Campbell was a member of the Thirty-Fourth Congress, engaged in its legitimate duties, has nothing to do with the question. I admit it has no bearing upon the ultimate question of right to the seat. It is not to affect the rights of the other party. If it affected the rights of the other party in any manner, I would not urge the fact of Mr. Campbell's engagements here as a reason why we should delay; but upon the question of due diligence, we have a right to consider it. Upon a proposition addressed to the discretion of the court, we have the right to consider the fact that a man was detained by necessary and legitimate business—that he was in a condition in which he could not presently attend, or that he was deprived of the opportunity to attend to the taking of depositions within the time limited by the law. In practice, nothing is more usual than for the courts to hear statements like this upon applications for continuance. If that be so, let the admitted fact of Mr. Campbell's necessary detention here in the winter and spring of 1856-57 have the weight it deserves.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I desire to ask the gentleman why this application was not made at the commencement of this session?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. If the gentleman from Mississippi will wait until I come to that part of my argument he will receive my answer, and I will inform the gentleman beforehand that I consider the question as one which ought to be answered.

It seems to be conceded by the minority of the Committee of Elections that, under the law of 1851, both parties may, at the same time, open the commission for taking depositions by themselves and their agents, for the sixty days within which the law limits the taking of testimony. I confess that is not my construction of the statute. I do not understand how, upon a mere matter of construction, any lawyer upon that committee got at that construction. The law itself says:

"That the party at whose instance the subpoena may issue, shall, at least ten days before the day appointed for the examination of the witnesses, give notice in writing to the opposite party of his intention to examine witnesses, which notice shall contain a statement of the time and place of the proposed examination, the name of the officer who shall conduct the same, the names of the witnesses to be examined and their places of residence, which notice shall be served by leaving a copy with the person to be notified, or at his usual place of abode: Provided, neither party shall give notice of taking testimony at different places at the same time, or without leaving an interval of at least five days between the close of taking testimony at one place and its commencement at another."

Now, the construction of the committee upon this law is that both parties may open a commission at the same time, and in different places. How did that committee arrive at that conclusion, when the law itself says that neither party shall give notice of the taking of depositions at different places at the same time? Is it the construction of the committee that both parties together may do what the law has declared neither party may do? All I can say is, that as a person desirous of putting a proper construction upon the statute, I do not understand the reasoning which allows either party to do what the law itself declares neither party shall do.

It may be very convenient in practice, but if gentlemen will look back and ascertain the reasons that induced the enactment of the law, they would probably have found it in the fact that, in a contested-election case which was brought to the observation of this House, just prior to the passage of this act, it was shown that the United States commissioner had been housed with one of the parties and his witnesses; and, in the absence of the other party, the contestant had examined witnesses ex parte, and when the witnesses were drunk, and other witnesses of whom nobody had any knowledge in the neighborhood. Therefore it was intended by those who enacted this law that when a commission was opened, the party whose rights were to be affected should have an opportunity to be present at the taking of the depositions, and that two commissions should not be running at the same time in different places. Neither party has this privilege under this law.

What becomes of that proposition of the law, under the construction of this committee, which requires that five days shall intervene between the closing of the testimony at one place and the opening of the commission to take it at another? Why may I not open a thousand commissions in the congressional district as well as one, if, when my adversary informs me he will be engaged at A, I may notify him that his presence is required at the same time at B? Why may I not multiply them ad infinitum? What is the use of that section of the law which prohibits both parties from taking testimony in different places at the same time, under the construction these gentlemen give to the law? No, sir, it was the intention of the law, that within the sixty days, opportunity should be afforded to the parties to be present, and that if my competitor opens a commission in his behalf, I shall have the opportunity to be present personally, if I prefer it. I am not to be driven to the employment of a lawyer. I am not to be driven to the employment of an agent. Maybe I am not willing to do it—maybe I am not able to do it.

Let us change the application of the point for a moment. Suppose that instead of this election of Mr. Campbell being contested here by a party who wants the seat, it was contested by one of his constituents who did not want the seat, but who merely wanted to have a judicial determination, by this House, of some question affecting the validity of the election arising under the State laws; as, for instance, the day on which the election was held, or the character of the constituency that was permitted to vote. By the proposed construction of the law, will you shut that man off from his right to contest the election, by saying that the sitting member—probably endowed with fortune—has the right to open a commission wherever he may choose, and at any number of places; and that if the contestant cannot attend them, it is his own fault? When that constituent challenges the examination of votes at Hamilton, shall the member proceed at the same moment to take and close the proof at Dayton?

But, take the construction that it seems the committee put upon the law, and, for the argument, assume that both these parties had a right to have commissions open at different places at the same time; then this salient fact appears upon the papers—that the contestant himself did not so construe the law at the time that the contest was going on; for when Mr. Campbell gave his notice, about the 17th of March, that he would occupy the time from that date up to the 28th of March, the contestant replied, no; that period of time is already covered by my commissions. I do not know whether the gentleman is a lawyer or not—I am told that he is—and this shows the fact that while he was at home, on looking at this law, he put the same construction upon it that I now put on it. It shows the additional fact that, putting that construction upon it, he attempted, in carrying out his construction, to employ the whole time with commissions in his own behalf, while his competitor was here in Washington! It was denied here yesterday, after a fashion, that he so intended, or that he so understood it; but the fact stands out on the face of the papers, it appears on the application of the sitting member for further time.

Was there not then room for a doubt as to the true construction of this act in regard to the privileges of the parties? I show you that the contestant construed it at that time in one way. I show you that I myself now, with all the lights before me, construe it as he did then. I differ with the committee in their construction of the law. I am not alone. A number of lawyers in this House differ with the committee in their construction of the law. Mr. Campbell differed with them in that construction. Will not the fact that the sitting member was here, engaged in his legitimate duties, added to the fact that there was a doubt as to the privilege under the law, weigh with this House, on the application for further time to take testimony? Shall these facts have no force in the settlement of the question as to what, under the circumstances of the case, was due diligence?

But it is asked, why did not Mr. Campbell go on and take his testimony, as he proposed to do, after the sixty days had expired? Am I asked that question by lawyers? Am I asked that question by men who pretend that they intend to do justice? Will you require of a man that he shall do that which the law prohibits? Will you, when he comes forward here to address himself to your legal discretion, set down against him the fact that he did not do what you know would have been foolishly done, if done at all, and when done, would have been worth nothing? I think that the contestant was right in the reply which he gave to Mr. Campbell. He said:

"By the statute, the period for taking testimony is expressly limited to 'sixty days' from the service of the answer. You were in Congress when the act passed, and are presumed to know that you were equally bound with myself to close the testimony within that period."

"The 'practice' you allege of taking testimony after the sixty days, notwithstanding the statute, cannot be very inveterate, since the act was not passed till March, 1851; nor do I think that, at so early a day, practice will prevail against the express words of the statute, which declares that 'no testimony shall be taken.'"

"As to your notion that this language is 'directory only,' I have to say that I can well understand how an affirmative provision in the statute may sometimes, under stress of judicial pressure, be held 'directory,' and non-compliance excused; but I have yet to learn how a provision expressly negative, was ever or can be in like manner interpreted. 'Thou shalt not steal,' is, I take it, strictly prohibitory."

This conclusion of the contestant is a sound position, and indicates a proper interpretation of the law. It was conclusive on Mr. Campbell. I could have added another proposition. It is, that if Mr. Campbell had subjected himself to the expense of going on to take testimony after that answer of the contestant, such testimony could not have been read here for any purpose to affect the rights or the interests of this contestant. All that the astute gentlemen who argue on the other side of the case would have then been required to do, would have been to rise in their places and say that that testimony was worth nothing. The taking of it was prohibited by law, and if the witnesses had sworn falsely, they could not have been indicted or convicted of perjury. Therefore, had their affidavits been produced, they could not have been read here for any purpose.

That is explanation enough why Mr. Campbell did not go forward and take proof in the time that intervened after the expiration of the sixty days and before the session of Congress. We must say, as a court, not only that such taking would have been useless, but that the other party in the case expressly put his veto upon the proposition to go on with the taking of the testimony. He indicated to Mr. Campbell that the taking of it would be useless, because he interposed a legal bar to its future use. Ah, but, say gentlemen, why did he not go forward and do it in order to exhibit to us the substance of what he could prove? For the simple reason that, in the eye of the law, it would not have exhibited the substance, nor even the shadow of a substance. Because, the answer would have been made that it was good for nothing; that it was ex parte; that it was not only ex parte, but was denounced by the law; that although the men who made the statements had gone forward and sworn to them before a magistrate, yet, being prohibited by law, it was not testimony, and could not be so regarded; and you would then have been called upon, by these close constructionists, not to permit such testimony to be read here for any purpose whatever.

"Why did not Mr. Campbell, then, appeal to this House at an early day of this session?" We met here on the 7th of December. The contestant's memorial was filed on the 14th of December. The testimony was sent to the Committee of Elections after its constitution, and it had not been printed, as I understand, until about the period when the recess occurred at Christmas. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PHILLIPS] said: "What is that to us? Mr. Campbell knew what that testimony was, and knew to what extent he was interested in it. Why did he not come forward before the House?" I ask any member of this body, of any experience, if he will not respond affirmatively to the proposition that, when the memorial was referred to the Committee of Elections, and before that committee had had any opportunity of learning anything whatever in regard to it, if Mr. Campbell was not right in not making any movement in the case till the committee had had an opportunity of seeing the testimony? Was it not a matter of courtesy due to the committee, as well as a matter of right, that he should not have so abruptly moved in the matter?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I beg to say that the testimony was printed on the 16th of December, one week before the House adjourned for the recess.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I understand that the memorial of the contestant was filed on the 14th of December.

Mr. PHILLIPS. The whole of it was printed on the 16th of December—the memorial and the testimony. I ascertained that yesterday, and so stated the fact.

Mr. TRIPPE. The memorial was filed December 16, 1857, referred to the Committee of Elections, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The memorial was filed and referred on the 14th. We were to adjourn on the 23d of December. Here, then, were seven days between the time when the memorial was filed and the time when this House adjourned over till the 4th of January. I ask the gentlemen of that side of the House whether, under the law of Congress, you intend, in all cases, to lay down the line so strictly as to make this question of due diligence strike within seven days? Why will you do so in this case, while at the other wing of the Capitol, in the case of the contested seats of the two Senators from Indiana, who belong to your party, you give two years to take testimony? Let us act fairly. Let us settle this as a court, not as partisans. Is it right that while, at the other wing of the Capitol, you construe this law so as to give these Senators a right to go on from session to session taking proof, you shall restrict a party here within seven days? And let me here remark, that, in the contested election case of Allen and Archer, decided by the Thirty-Fourth Congress, the Committee of Elections gave further time for testimony, without referring the question to the House. And in this case, Mr. Campbell may well have supposed that the matter would properly come before the committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I am told that I am mistaken; but, if I have made a mistake, I have done so on the faith of the Clerk of this House—who was then the sitting member—who, no longer ago than this morning, told me the fact as I have stated it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. If the gentleman from Kentucky will allow me a single remark, I will state precisely what was the fact. Certain testimony was produced by the contestant and laid before the committee, to which the sitting member objected. It was stated that the notice was served when he was here at Washington, and that he had not a proper and sufficient opportunity to be present and cross-examine the witnesses. The committee differed with him, however; they considered the notice sufficient; he then asked that he should have time to examine those witnesses. Owing to this fact, as stated by him, the committee then understood that he desired an opportunity to cross-examine these witnesses; and they also understood from the contestant that he desired an opportunity of taking the testimony over again. With that understanding, the committee said to the parties, "if you take this testimony, we will receive it."

Mr. PHILLIPS. I ask the gentleman if that was not done at the instance and by the consent of the parties, and not in the exercise of their power as a committee of the House?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The gentleman from Maine makes the explanation which answers the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It shows the fact that what was done was done by the committee without consulting the House. What was done by the Committee of Elections in the case of Archer and Allen might have been done in this case; and the subject of granting additional time Mr. Campbell might well have supposed would not be made a proposition before the House. And, therefore, prior to the time fixed by the committee for taking up the Ohio contested election, Mr. Campbell may very well have concluded that it was not his business to bring the matter of this special application before the House.

I understand that when he left here it was the understanding that his case would not be taken up before the recess; and that if it was taken up afterwards before his return, he should, by telegraph, be notified of the fact. It is a fact that by telegraph he was notified; that he left a sick family and hurried here, where he found his case already pending. He then presented some questions as to the admissibility of testimony, in the nature of exceptions to the testimony which had been filed; and I understand that the committee determined they would not hear exceptions to the admissibility of testimony until they came to a final hearing of the case, when they would decide on everything at the same time.

Now, I apprehend that this determination of the committee, that exceptions which had been taken to depositions which were before them should not be heard in the progress of the case, and the possibility of the case being decided upon hearsay testimony, put Mr. Campbell on his guard, and admonished him that, if he would have his rights properly represented, he must have additional testimony before the committee at their final hearing of the case. If the committee decided to reject what he considered illegal testimony, he was ready to submit his case to the committee as it stood; but he thought it would not be safe to those whose rights he represents until he knew the character of the evidence to be used against him in the investigation. Unsuccessful before the committee in obtaining the preliminary decision he sought, he then comes before this House upon this state of facts, with the declaration which he has made here, to wit:

"I verily believe that, if this application is granted, I shall be able to show to the entire satisfaction of the House, by legal testimony, that my election was a fair and valid election, and that if illegal votes may have been cast, more illegal votes were cast for the contestant than for myself. Having had no fair opportunity of vindicating my rights and the rights of my constituents in the premises, this application is respectfully submitted."

That, sir, has all the dignity of an affidavit. It is the statement of a member of this House, on honor as a Representative, in a matter pending here judicially. But my colleague [Mr. STEVENSON] says this application ought to fail, because it is not accompanied by the affidavits of the witnesses, showing what they can prove if they were examined.

Mr. STEVENSON. I made no such statement. I understand my colleague to assume the position, that upon the mere statement of the party that he expects to prove facts, without stating what he expects to prove or the witnesses that he relies on, such an application should be granted. What I said was, that if you move to set aside a judgment, the facts the affiant expects to prove must be stated; and if you make application for a continuance, then the applicant must state the facts he expects to prove, the names of the witnesses, and the reasons why he makes the application.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. It is just as I supposed, except that the gentleman has probably mistaken the position he occupied here. He certainly would not draw an illustration in this place from what a man should do who applies to a court which has rendered the judgment. Mr. Campbell is not here applying as one against whom judgment has already been rendered upon the merits of the question. He applies for time to prepare for a hearing on the merits, and that application is addressed to the sound, equitable discretion of this court. This high tribunal is not to carry out a Kentucky statute of practice.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman forgets or fails to mention a material fact, that this case was fully argued upon its merits by the attorney general of Ohio for the contestant, and that the argument for the sitting member had been continued for two days before the application for continuance was made. And, in analogy to judicial proceedings, I say that, when a party announces himself ready to put a case on trial and proceeds with the trial, he must bring very strong reasons for setting the judgment aside.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I desire to correct the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. STEVENSON.]

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I will correct the gentleman myself. That statement brings us to the "cream of the coconut." That brings us to the question of fact, whether Mr. Campbell had pronounced himself ready to have a hearing before the committee.

Mr. STEVENSON. He had not.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Then why does my colleague put him in the category with a man in court, who has announced himself ready for the trial? and why does he say the trial had for two days proceeded &c.? The fact that the attorney general of Ohio argued the case upon its merits for two days, does not prove that Mr. Campbell had announced himself ready for the hearing. On the contrary, I understand that the case was taken up in violation of what Mr. Campbell understood to be the intimation of the chairman of the committee. I do not mean to be understood as imputing unfairness upon the part of the chairman or any member of the committee.

Mr. GILMER. I want my friend from Kentucky to go on and state the facts, as I know he will with great pleasure.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. With the permission of the gentleman from Kentucky, I will state that, in the absence of Mr. Campbell, the committee were called together and the contestant appeared before them with his counsel, and desired to be heard upon the merits of the case. Perhaps I should not refer to what transpired before the committee; but inasmuch as reference has been made to the transactions of the committee, I think I may be permitted to state some few facts. At that time I made the suggestion that perhaps it was not exactly right to do so in the absence of Mr. Campbell. It was said, upon the other side, that the counsel of the contestant was to leave for Ohio in a day or two, and that it was important that he should be heard; and that he would make a full brief, and give it to Mr. Campbell. Mr. Campbell soon after returned, and immediately made application for further time; or rather, that, in order that he might determine whether or not he should desire further time, he would like to have the committee pass upon some preliminary questions. The committee discussed that matter to some extent, hearing Mr. Campbell's attorney partly through upon the preliminary question; then finally said he must decide at once whether he would apply for further time to take testimony; and informed him that they would not decide upon the preliminary question or demurrer until they came to decide upon the full merits of the case; and that, if he desired to put in an application for further time, he must do it then. And it was understood when Mr. Campbell's attorney commenced making the argument, he was considered as having made the application at that time.

Mr. STEVENSON. I would ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether, when the sitting member had allowed a whole month to pass after his case was laid before the committee, without he or any of his friends making any application for a continuance, the contestant had not a right to infer that he was ready in the cause?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Most indubitably not, in the presence of the fact that we had taken a long recess at that time; that the sitting member had gone home, with an understanding that his case would not be taken up unless he was telegraphed of the fact, and notified to be present. But, sir, if the gentleman were a judge of a court in the county where he lives, and should say to parties litigant in that court that there would be no more causes taken up until the next Monday morning; that the witnesses and jurymen could go home; what would the people think of him if he were to take up a case in the absence of one of the parties, take proof, and proceed to judgment? I would like the gentleman to tell me the difference between this case and that.

Mr. STEVENSON. I think it would be perfectly right to take it up if that litigant's attorney was there and allowed it to be taken up.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Who was that attorney in Mr. Campbell's case?

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Day, of New Orleans.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. He was not the attorney until after Mr. Campbell's return. The committee took it up while Mr. Campbell was at home attending at the sick bed of his wife, and heard the attorney general of Ohio for two full days argue the merits of the case in the absence of Mr. Campbell, when he had gone home with the understanding that the case would not be taken up in his absence.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. This whole case seems to be argued upon very little points; and I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will remember, "de minimis non curat lex." In regard to this whole question, there is no difference of opinion between Mr. Campbell and myself. This testimony was all printed two or three days before the recess; and it was in the hands of the members of the committee. There was no action taken by the committee prior to the recess. Mr. Campbell came to me, and asked if the case would be taken up before the recess? I told him I thought not; that the testimony was voluminous, and that we could look at it in our rooms better than in the committee. He said he desired to go home; and requested, if necessary, that we should send him word by telegraph. I promised to do so. I only promised that; but I wrote him a letter, stating that his presence here would be necessary by a given day; that Mr. Vallandigham was here, and desired to take up the case. That letter was written four or five, and perhaps six, days before his presence was necessary. In addition to that I sent him a telegraphic dispatch, which he received. He told me, on his return, that he did not get my letter, but that he got the dispatch.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I received the letter after my return here.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. There was no misunderstanding about it. Mr. Vallandigham was here with his counsel, waiting four or five days to commence the argument. Mr. Vallandigham said that his counsel could not stay longer. As Mr. Campbell had been notified to be here on a given day, but did not come, the argument commenced, and the counsel promised to Mr. Campbell a full brief of it. I believe he wrote out the substance of what he said, and gave it to Mr. Campbell. He returned with Mr. Day, a distinguished lawyer from New Orleans, who argued the case for two full days upon its merits before any application whatever was made for a continuance.

In justification, however, to Mr. Campbell, I must say that a motion was submitted to the committee requiring them to decide certain legal questions in regard to the admissibility of some testimony. In case the committee decided that certain testimony was illegal, then he desired further time to take testimony. He desired an immediate decision. The committee concluded not to decide upon the admissibility. It was not a motion to suppress testimony or to take testimony. The committee determined not to decide upon the admissibility of this particular testimony, nor upon any of the other points raised; but only upon the whole case. After all this argument had taken place upon the merits of the case, the application was made for a continuance.

I believe I have stated the facts correctly, and the journal of the Committee of Elections, which I have before me, bears me out in my statement. If I have not, I desire any gentleman to correct me.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The explanation answers all the purposes I desire to accomplish by it. It is to show to the House the fact that Mr. Campbell did not go into a discussion of the merits of this case voluntarily; that the discussion commenced in his absence; that he had filed preliminary exceptions to the admissibility of certain testimony, and it will be apprehended by the country, which may take an interest in this case, that, according to all the modes of practice, exceptions to the admissibility of testimony are generally heard in the progress of a case. If a question as to the admissibility of testimony arises in a jury trial, it is decided as the case progresses. If exceptions to the admissibility or competency of testimony arise in a chancery cause, they are decided before, or, if not before, at the general hearing.

Mr. STEVENSON. I desire to ask my colleague a question.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I will say to my colleague that I have not time, as there are other points to which I desire to refer. How much time have I left, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Four minutes.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. It has been said by my colleague, or by some other gentleman, that Mr. Campbell has only produced affidavits to show that he could change three votes. I want you to remember that those votes were negro votes—negro votes given for the Democratic candidate. Sir, it is known to the House that a syllabus, setting forth the proof in this case, taken by the contestant, was circulated prior to the hearing, and addressed to the jurors before the court came on. I recollect that I received one of them at my home, long before I came here. It was an argument of the case before term time, by one of the parties; and the point addressed to us, from the slaveholding States particularly, was that there was something dark about Campbell's vote; that "niggers" had voted for him; and Campbell, knowing our peculiar sensitiveness upon that subject, offers to produce testimony here to show that three negroes voted for the contestant to every one that voted for him. That is the reason why he furnishes these affidavits at all. It is a speech to those among us who are sensitive in regard to a particular species of suffrage.

Again, sir, there is a fair and good reason why the names of the witnesses should not be given in this application for further time. One of the charges in this case is, that there was a wholesale scheme "of colonization" in this election. That charge is made by Mr. Campbell against the other side. If there was any such wholesale scheme of colonization carried on in order to rob the people of the district of their rights, then it would be the easiest thing in the world to get hold of the men who were colonized, if a list of their names was published before they were brought forward to testify. That excuse for the failure to furnish a list of the names of witnesses would be considered perfectly conclusive and satisfactory in a court of justice.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. It is my wish, Mr. Speaker, that in the discussion of this question, and in its decision, we should act as if we were a court—act as if we were judges. I wish to be governed by the same considerations that would govern me if I were on the bench; and I did hope, when the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] arose, that he would have argued the question upon its merits as a question of continuance addressed to our discretion as a court, whether the motion to continue should be granted or not, in order to effectuate justice. I intend, in what I say, to argue this motion to continue upon its merits. But I must say to the gentleman from Kentucky, that in what he said before the conclusion of his remarks, it does seem to me that he has not been governed by the rule he laid down. He alludes to an exhibit made by the sitting member in his application for a continuance in which is appended the affidavit of two or three individuals, stating that one Flanigan, who is a negro, voted for Mr. Vallandigham, but the sitting member does not even state that he expects to prove this statement to be true.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Allow me to set myself right. My allusion to that was in reply to the statement that Mr. Campbell had made an attempt to show how many votes he could change, and had only attempted to show that he could change three. My point was, that that attempt was made to meet an effort on the part of the contestant to create a prejudice against the sitting member.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Very well, sir; let the question be argued strictly as a motion to continue. What I say is, that the sitting member does not allege that he expects to show that Flanigan was a negro, and voted for Mr. Vallandigham; and no court of justice, not even the humblest justice of the peace in the land, would grant a continuance unless the party would swear that he would prove the fact alleged. The gentleman does not even state that he expects to prove it. This paper, purporting to be an affidavit, was taken by the sitting member at some time, of which the contestant knows nothing. As soon as it was exhibited to the committee, the contestant replied to it, and alleged that the accusation was libelous against any one who had voted for him. Sir, I hold in my hand, but have not time to read it, proof incontestable to show that the contestant was right, and that the statement was but a fabrication. Upon the bare announcement of the statement he was prepared to pronounce it a libel, and here is the proof of it. This exhibit, then, unsupported by an allegation that the sitting member expects to make it appear true by proof, amounts to nothing in his motion for a continuance.

I listened with attention to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] because, if anything could be said on legal principles why the continuance should be granted, I would be willing to give the sitting member the benefit of it. He rests it mainly on a construction he gives to the act of 1851; but in this he differs both with the majority and minority of the committee, as well as with the sitting member and the contestant. He differs from all of them. He thinks that if the contestant had covered the whole sixty days with his notices, the sitting member would have been excluded from taking testimony under the law. Well, sir, this is a ground the sitting member does not set up himself. He placed no such construction on the law, and does not ask the House to do it. He understood that, while the contestant was taking testimony in one place, he could be doing the same in another; and he thus acted. He took testimony while the contestant was also taking testimony, which was all right. The records of the committee (this document) show that he did not act upon the principle that the gentleman is contending for, and upon which he has mainly rested his defense of the motion for further time.

Now in this connection I wish to call the attention of the minority of the committee to some statements made in their report. They say here:

"Whilst the sitting member—from the construction (in which, however, we do not concur) which it is clear to us both the parties gave to the law—was only able to take testimony from the 17th to the 27th of March, 1857; and that, at the time the sitting member's notice to take his testimony, as aforesaid, was served, the contestant refused to attend, and claimed that he had already covered this time with his notices; and which latter statement is not denied by the contestant."

Sir, I call upon every member of that minority, I call on JAMES WILSON, EZRA CLARK, ISRAEL WASHBURN, and JOHN A. GILMER—I call upon them collectively and individually to make good this statement. I ask them to show the evidence on which it is clear to them that both parties gave this construction to the law? or that either of them did? Where is there one particle of evidence here that the contestant at any time disputed the right of the sitting member to take testimony if he saw fit within the sixty days, though he was taking testimony at the same time at a different place? Where is there any evidence that the sitting member doubted his right to take testimony at any time by giving the proper notice, though the contestant was at the same time taking testimony at a different place?

Mr. GILMER. The gentleman from Georgia will permit me to draw to his attention the fact, that Mr. Campbell, in his applications for a continuance for testimony, states that Mr. Vallandigham declared that Mr. Campbell had no right to take testimony whilst he was taking his testimony; and that he (Mr. Vallandigham) actually declined to attend and cross-examine.

To this application of Mr. Campbell, the contestant filed a very particular answer, as long as a spell of sickness, answering and arguing in full in reply, but failed to deny these two statements in the application. He simply denies that he gave his notices with the view of preventing Campbell from taking testimony.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Why, Mr. Speaker, it is strange that the gentleman should entertain or enter into any such delusion. Mr. Campbell does not state that Mr. Vallandigham declared any such thing. He says he was informed that Mr. Vallandigham claimed the right to occupy all the time. This Mr. Vallandigham denies. How could Mr. Vallandigham give such construction to the law when, by the very record before the committee, it appears that Mr. Campbell served him with a notice to take testimony on the 7th of March, and two days after that, on the 9th of March, he served Campbell with a notice to take testimony during the same time, at another place or before another tribunal? How can he have been assisting in such a construction as you say, when the record shows that he acted directly in the teeth of it? But, Mr. Speaker, I asked for the evidence to sustain this statement of the committee. I ask the Clerk to read an extract from Mr. Vallandigham's reply to Mr. Campbell's statement.

The Clerk read the extract as follows:

"It is asserted in the application that forty of the sixty days were 'covered' by me in taking testimony in Butler county. 'I reply, first, that if I had chosen to consume the whole sixty days in that county alone, I had the right so to do. It would not have precluded the returned member from taking testimony in that or in any other county, at the same time.'"

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Now, before you go any further: can the Committee of Elections want any clearer denial than the paper in their own hands? How can any gentleman of the minority of the committee rise and make good a statement that it is evident to them that both parties gave that construction to the law? Does not the contestant distinctly state that he had the right to take testimony on every one of the sixty days? And that the sitting member had the same and equal right?

Mr. GILMER. He states it now as a matter of argument; but he has not denied that he previously gave the law that construction.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. How could he have given that construction when he acted differently, as I have stated and shown? [To the Clerk.] Read on.

The Clerk read as follows, from Mr. Vallandigham's letter:

"Second, that, in point of fact, only twenty-eight of the forty days were actually occupied, and many of these only in part."

"It is asserted that twelve of these same forty days were 'covered' by notices for Montgomery county also."

"I answer that, for the reason hereinafter assigned, but two days were occupied under the notices referred to. [Testimony 15.]

"Complaint is made that notices were served in Hamilton at the returned member's house, it being then in charge of a colored servant."

"I answer, first, that the returned member had in Washington refused to accept personal service of the notice last preceding the one now complained of; [testimony 10.] second, that Congress had adjourned at the date of the service, [March 9, 1857.] third, that the notice was served at his usual place of residence, as provided for by the statute; fourth, that his counsel appeared and cross-examined every witness."

"It is asserted that 'seventy-three days would seem to be occupied by the contestant's commissions within the 'sixty days' provided by law; and to make up these seventy-three days, the five wherein I was precluded by statute from taking any testimony are reckoned."

"Without commenting on the singular disingenuousness, in this and in other respects, of this calculation, I answer: 1. That the taking of testimony on my behalf commenced on the 2d of February and closed on the 28th of March, a period of just fifty-five days—two days only of the time for the county of Butler being occupied in Montgomery; and, 2. That the very diligence of the contestant is made an argument against him, upon an application by the returned member for leave to avoid the results, as he insists, of his own gross negligence. If strict law is to prevail here, as is claimed by his counsel, upon other points, I respectfully recur to that ancient and wise maxim of both equity and law, vigilantibus, non dormientibus, succurrit lex."

"It is asserted, or insinuated, upon the authority ejusdem generis, that my purpose, in serving the notice in this contest, was to prevent the returned member from taking any testimony at all."

"I meet this by a flat denial. But five notices, in all, to take testimony were served; one of them he refused to accept; another was simply a list of witnesses, as required by the statute; and two of them were abandoned, leaving just two under which testimony was fully taken."

"The construction of the statute is obvious, and the returned member acted upon it as construed by the committee but a few days ago. I add, that in this, as in other instances, there would seem to be a studied effort to represent me as unfair and disingenuous throughout this contest. Of the justice of these insinuations, and the delicacy of introducing them here, I leave the committee and those who know me best to judge."

Mr. WILSON. I understand the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] to challenge the minority of the Committee of Elections, individually and collectively, to answer his question; and he refers to the argument of Mr. Vallandigham, as read from the Clerk's desk, to show that the contestant here does not give the construction to the statute which we say he did. That, Mr. Speaker, is not the question.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I do not yield the floor unless the gentleman rises to answer the question I put. My question is this: I ask the minority of the committee to show to this House and to the country, one particle of evidence on which their statement is predicated, that it is clear that both parties gave the law this construction, or that either of them did.

Mr. WILSON. I will do so. It is not material what the contestant's construction of the law may be now. That letter just read is a mere matter of argument. But I refer the gentleman to page 6 of this report, where Mr. Campbell states:

"I am informed by him [his attorney] that when he served notices contestant claimed that he had no right to do so, because his notices, previously served, covered the residue of the 'sixty days,' and refused to appear and cross-examine the witnesses."

Where was this? In Ohio. Not here in the committee room. Not since the commencement of this Congress. The contestant denied that Mr. Campbell had a right to take further testimony.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Does the gentleman read that to me as evidence?

Mr. WILSON. It has not been denied.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. It is denied flatly. It is denied in the statement of the gentleman [Mr. Vallandigham] in his own paper, which I have just read. It is denied by his acts; denied by those documents that I hold, and read from a while ago, which show that he acted inconsistently with any such construction. What the gentleman [Mr. Wilson] has read is the statement of the sitting member, that his lawyer told him that Mr. Vallandigham put such a construction on the law, in the very teeth of the acts of Vallandigham and of the acts of Campbell. I ask for the evidence. Do you, as a lawyer, give me that as evidence? I want the evidence upon which that statement was made.

Mr. WILSON. Do I understand the gentleman from Georgia as stating that the contestant denies that he informed the attorney of Mr. Campbell that he had no right to take this evidence?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I understand the contestant distinctly to deny it.

Mr. WILSON. Will the contestant rise in his place and deny it?

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM, (contestant.) I have denied, and do deny, making the statement alluded to.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Sir, there is no evidence of any such fact before the committee. The course of the sitting member all the time is directly inconsistent with any such construction. We find the contestant receiving notice of Mr. Campbell on a certain day, that he would take testimony in a certain place, at a future stated time; and we find him—two days afterward—giving notice that he would take testimony before another tribunal at the same time. Now, Mr. Speaker, this statement says: "It is clear to us that both parties gave to the law a construction" inconsistent with their acts. And what I say is, that there is not a particle of evidence that either of them did. The evidence, as far as it covers any construction, is that neither of them did.

Now, sir, as far as I have been able to judge of this application on its merits, it is nothing in the world but a pretext for delay, and delay only. What are the facts on which the showing is made? And, first, what is the history of the contest? The election was held on the 14th day of October, 1856. Within ten days after the returns of the election, by the first board of canvassers, were known, the contestant gives a notice to the sitting member of his intention to contest, with specifications. The gentleman from Kentucky argues as if this was a step taken prematurely. I am not certain myself that it was. The act of 1851 says that it shall be done within thirty days after the board of canvassers shall have determined upon the election. By the law of Ohio, the first board of canvassers—the county officers—count the votes, make out an abstract of them, and send them up to the Governor. The contestant in this case acted upon the presumption that this first board of canvassers were the individuals referred to in the act of 1851. At any rate, if he was premature, it shows that he did not intend to sleep over his rights. There was no laches on his part. The sitting member has no reason to complain of it. He was notified of what he might expect at an early day, and this is his answer to that first notice:

HAMILTON, OHIO, October 31, 1856.

SIR: I received your written communication touching that "nigger business" some time after it appeared in the "nuz papers."

No official information of my election to a seat in the Thirty-Fifth Congress of the United States has yet been furnished me, and you will pardon me for suggesting that perhaps your deep anxiety on this subject has occasioned premature action.

In December next I shall probably receive, under the "broad seal" of the State of Ohio, a certificate that the honor of representing the third district in the next Congress has been conferred on me by the people. In that event please observe that you and the corrupt minions of the present condemned Administration are not only invited but dared to contest my right to the seat. Should you or they attempt to carry out your vaunted designs, I promise the country a record of one of the most corrupt and disgraceful outrages that has ever been perpetrated upon the American ballot-box.

LEWIS D. CAMPBELL.

Col. C. L. VALLANDIGHAM.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when this contest was commenced we see how the sitting member treated it. He commences in the first place by saying "I have received your written communication touching that 'nigger business.'" Sir, here is the notice served upon him—courteous, a proper notice in every respect. No such term is used in it—no such language used in it. But the sitting member, seeming to regard his rights as already perfected, or being determined to deal in insulting, or at least offensive language, couches his reply in these words:

"I received your written communication touching that 'nigger business,' some time after it appeared in the 'nuz papers.'"

He goes on to say—

"In that event, please observe that you and the corrupt minions of the present condemned Administration, are not only invited but dared to contest my right to the seat."

Dared to contest his right! Did not this look as if he was ready even then, in October, 1856? "You have begun too soon. Begin at the right time. I dare you to do it!" Well, sir, the contestant abided his time, relying on the truth of his cause when the time had expired, after the sitting member had received his certificate in the month of December, 1856. He then gave another notice, which is couched in respectful, courteous, proper, and legal language. That was on the 24th day of December, 1856. It was served on the 29th of that month. The dare was now met. The law allowed thirty days to the sitting member to answer the notice given. It might have been supposed, from the dare, that it would have been promptly replied to. He took twenty-one out of the thirty days to write his answer. It was served on the 27th January, 1857, just in time; the contestant went on and took his testimony under the law; he served his notice under the law; he had his commission issued under the law; he had his witnesses examined under the law; it was closed up under the law; it was sent to the Clerk under the law; he stood upon the law of the case, as he stood upon the right of it from the beginning; what he was dared to do he did do, and according to law throughout.

Now, what was the course of the sitting member? If he had such awful disclosures to make, why did he not accept the first notice? Why delay? But more than this. Why did he delay so long in replying to the second notice? Was it not to stave off the investigation? Again: when notice of the time and place of taking the testimony was sent him by a friend of the contestant, the sitting member then in Congress refuses to accept it. Here is the proof of his refusal before this House. He would neither accept service nor allow notice to be served upon him; at least he evaded it two or three different times. Now he complains that he did not have notice because it was left with a colored woman at his house in Ohio. When she positively refused to accept notice here, when Mr. Crane could not run him down, he now complains that he did not get personal notice. Well, the law declared that the notice should be served personally or left at his usual place of abode. The contestant did leave it there. He complied with the law, but he did more; he went and served his attorney personally with a copy, and he was represented by an attorney at the examination of witnesses at both places—one at Hamilton and one at Dayton—different attorneys, but one at each place.

I now ask if the contestant has not pursued his rights legally, and if any advantage was taken? Does the bare fact that Mr. Campbell was a member of Congress excuse him from his own laches if he had any testimony to take? I say "no." Is not he a member of Congress sitting here at this time? Would not the same plea excuse him now as before? He is a member of the same committee of Ways and Means. Sir, the question is one of diligence—whether there was not such laches upon his part if he had any more testimony to take as should now preclude him from asking further indulgence by the House?

It appears to me that the contestant has done his duty; pursued his rights properly; and that, in every step, the sitting member has shown nothing like diligence or a desire to forward this investigation which he courted. Delay has been his course all the time. He did take some testimony in the latter part of March; but he could have taken it every day from the 27th of January to the 28th of March if he had been inclined to do it, or if he had had any to take. I say it was due to him, due to the House, and due to his constituents, that he should have done it. I say, when the gentleman used this language—

"Should you or they attempt to carry out your vaunted designs, I promise the country a record of one of the most corrupt and disgraceful outrages that has ever been perpetrated upon the American ballot-box."

he should have made the attempt at least to redeem his promise; he had the opportunity offered to him. What were those outrages? Twelve months have rolled around; he has failed to show them, and now he asks for time. When Congress met in December he failed to ask for time. He failed to ask for time when the testimony was printed. This was before the recess, for I got a copy of this testimony before the recess; not only that, but it is here almost the middle of the Congress to which he claims to have been elected, counting back to the beginning of the congressional term, more than twelve months since he was served with notice of contest, and having failed up to this time to expose these great outrages upon the ballot-box, he now comes and asks for more time?

Why, sir, after the contestant has pursued his rights, got his evidence, returned it to the Clerk's office, and printed, and the committee are about to report, when a long argument upon the merits of the case by an attorney of the sitting member has been heard before the committee, he comes in and asks this House to allow him further time. It seems, sir, that that pledge can never be redeemed; these outrages upon the ballot-box alleged by him to have been committed, can never be established. In my judgment, under all these circumstances, it is due to the contestant here, due to the people of the third congressional district of Ohio, that no longer time should be given. I ask the gentleman who said he intended to argue this case as a judge, or, rather, to take such a view as a judge would take of the case, whether he would grant a party litigant in his court a continuance in a cause upon such a showing as this?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I have indicated to the gentleman that I would.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The gentleman did not take the view I have presented—he did not go into this record.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Yes, sir, I did. I did not allude to the nuz letter because I did not think that was to the merits of the case.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I think that letter does go to the merits of the case, for it shows the tone and temper with which this contest was first met. It shows, too, Mr. Speaker, that the sitting member was not taken by surprise. It shows what he threatened, and that if he had the testimony which he now asks us to let him have an opportunity to exhibit, he would have produced it before this.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I think, if the gentleman takes that ground, the opportunity denied and asked for by the sitting member ought to be afforded to him.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I am of the belief, from all the facts, that he can produce no such testimony. He has had his day in court, and he failed to produce it; and, sir, it is due to the constituency whose Representative he alleges he is, that this House of Representatives shall put its condemnation upon that threat.

Having closely scrutinized this case, I think this House should decide it at once and give no further time. If there has been any laches, it has been on the other side. I consider this nothing but the most groundless pretext for delay; for delay and nothing else. The sitting member has not presented the names of his witnesses, nor has he stated what it is that he expects to prove by them. He merely alleges that he verily believes that he can establish such and such things. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] argued as if the sitting member had alleged, in his motion for further time, that he could prove that more negro votes had been cast for the contestant than for himself—three to one, I believe. Now, sir, he alleges no such thing; his exhibit only refers to two, and one of these the affidavit I have shown to be wholly unfounded. He makes no statement of facts whatever that he expects to be able to prove; he simply says he verily believes that he can prove that he was fairly and legally elected if we would give him more time. And what is the force of this? Now let us see who says this—who is the party in court, if you please. Who says that? Why, it is the same party who said at first:

"Please observe that you and the corrupt minions of the present condemned Administration are not only invited but dared to contest my right to the seat. Should you or they attempt to carry out your vaunted designs, I promise the country a record of one of the most corrupt and disgraceful outrages that has ever been perpetrated upon the American ballot-box."

There is the promise made, and nothing has been done with that promise. He utterly failed to comply with his promise. He says now that he "verily believes" he can prove so and so, but he does not say by whom or when. I say that he has had time enough. He has had his day in court, and this is nothing but a pretext for delay; the outrageous frauds have dwindled down to a belief that he can prove that he was duly elected.

There are one or two other points, Mr. Speaker, to which I wish barely to allude. Reference has been made to the fact, that after the sixty days had expired, the returned member made a proposition to the contestant that they should take further testimony; and an argument has been made upon that statement of fact, prejudicial to the contestant. Now, I ask to have read the reply of the contestant to that proposition. But, before it is read, I will state to the House that this was the reply made by the contestant before the Committee of Elections:

"As to the proposition of April, 1857, by the returned member, to take further evidence by agreement, I shall refer to that hereafter, and supply the answer by me returned to it, but which he has omitted."

Now, I ask the Clerk to read the reply the contestant made to Mr. Campbell's proposition last year.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"But, like yourself, I deprecate delay and suspense: equally with you, I desire to save all cost to the Government: and above all, I have a very high regard for the true principles of popular sovereignty. Your proposition would be a fair one, and instantly and willingly accepted, were there not a fairer and better course for both, and for all concerned."

"Wherefore, to avoid all suspense and delay, and the exceeding annoyance and irritation of a contest; to save all cost as well to ourselves as to the Government; to relieve Congress from an unpleasant duty which may devolve upon it; but especially by ascending to the fountain-head—the people—to carry out the true principles of popular sovereignty, and obtain a full and clear expression of the public will, free from doubt, so that the true majority may govern, I hereby propose to waive all advantages, as well substantial as technical, and at such time as the Governor of the State may appoint, or, if you prefer, upon the second Tuesday of October next, submit again the question to the people of this district for their final decision."

"To this proposition I shall await your reply. Should you decline, Congress must decide between us upon the law and the testimony."

C. L. VALLANDIGHAM.

"LEWIS D. CAMPBELL, Esq., Hamilton, Ohio."

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. That was the reply of the contestant to the proposition of the sitting member to take further testimony. He told him he would go before the people. He was willing to go before the people and let them decide the question. Why did not the sitting member accept that offer? Gentlemen upon the other side of the House say that it was unfair in the contestant not to accept the sitting member's proposition to do away with all they had done legally, and recommence the taking of the testimony illegally.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask the gentleman if he would be willing to apply the rule he contends for to the case of the Indiana Senators?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. If the Indiana Senators had made such a proposition, and it had not been accepted, and if those who contest their seats came and pleaded a weaker proposition which they had made to their prejudice, I should say that that fact would be a very good reply to it. The gentleman, however, brings to my mind a remark of the gentleman from Kentucky, which I intended to reply to, but was nearly forgetting. The gentleman from Kentucky said that the Democratic party in the Senate had given two years to the Indiana Senators to take testimony. That struck me as rather a strange statement. I have got the Senate reports here, both the majority and the minority, and I find no such proposition in either of them.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The gentleman must quote me correctly. I say that the party in the Senate, under their construction of this law, have extended the time from session to session.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Is that two years?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. An application for time was made last year, and another application of the same sort has been made this year.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I speak by the record. I have here the majority report of the Senate committee on that election, and this is the resolution which they report:

"Resolved, That in the case of the contested election of the Hon. GRAHAM N. FITCH and the Hon. JESSE D. BRIGHT, Senators returned and admitted to their seats from the State of Indiana, the sitting members, and all persons protesting against their election, or any of them, by themselves, or their agents or attorneys, be permitted to take testimony on the allegations of the protestants and the sitting members touching all matters of fact therein contained, before any judge of the district court of the United States, or any judge of the supreme or circuit courts of the State of Indiana, by first giving ten days' notice of the time and place of such proceeding in some public gazette printed at Indianapolis."

It does not extend the time to two years, nor to one year, nor to six months.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. It gives them a running commission, extending the time down to the end of the term for which the Senators were elected.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. That is not the resolution.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. No, the resolution fixes no time; it is an indefinite time.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Then the gentleman cannot say that it is two years. Two years is not an indefinite time.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The gentleman seems to be very particular to hold me to the declaration of two years. I do not care whether you fix it at two years or not. My observation was that the rule ought to work alike here and in the Senate, especially when it was worked by the same party.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Very well.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. And I say that the Indiana Senators have been allowed time from session to session.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Well, sir, their term of office only began on the 4th of March last—at the same time as the term of the sitting member in this case. No time has yet been granted to the Senators from Indiana; but time has been allowed the sitting member in this case. Now, under my construction of the Senate resolution, which is yet unacted on, it does not allow indefinite time, as the gentleman says, but time under the law of 1851. That is my reading of it. The Senate knows the law as well as we do, and the resolution merely allows the time under the existing law.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Does the gentleman from Georgia understand the law of 1851 to extend to the election of Senators?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I supposed that, so far as the taking of testimony was concerned, they might adopt the rule prescribed by that law. I know the law was expressly made for this House; but the Senate might adopt the rule for the taking of testimony. But the gentleman claims that the same rule should be worked here as in the Senate, especially when it is to be worked by the same party. Well, sir, the Republican minority in the Senate recommend that there be no time granted, and no testimony taken, in the Indiana case. Will the gentleman from Kentucky take that side? I do not suppose that the gentleman from Kentucky will identify himself with that side anyhow; but would he have those who act with him on this question adopt that rule?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I can only say, in reply to the gentleman, that I am rather surprised that he talks about "sides" on a question like this.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The gentleman commenced it. I am but replying to him. It was he, sir, that first spoke about the Senate and "sides." He urged this action of a Democratic Senate as authority for his side of the House. He brought the question here. I am only replying to him; and, sir, it is a bad rule that will not work both ways. [Laughter.]

I say, sir, to the gentleman, and to the House that for my own part, I am not governed by any such principle. I intend to determine this question strictly according to law. And when I see that the sitting member treats these notices as he did from the beginning, when he does not accept them, when he evades them on all occasions, when the party seeking his rights is thrown on strict law; then, I say, let him stand on the law. I go further. I look on this attempt in no other light than as a pretext, a slim and flimsy pretext for delay, and delay only. I look on it as nothing else; and, therefore, I give it as my opinion, that this extension of time ought not to be granted. We ought to take the vote on the merits. I trust the committee will report as soon as possible on the merits, and let us know who is the proper Representative of the third congressional district of Ohio. The people there have an interest in this matter. This offer of the contestant to the sitting member, that they should appeal anew to the people, was limited to the last election. The sitting member would not accept it. Congress is now far advanced. We have passed the first two months of the session. The case ought to be ended. He would not let the people decide it, although he dared this investigation; and now, sir, when the day of judgment has come, he appeals again for more time, time, time. I say, let the judgment, whatever it is, be rendered and executed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I have but a few words to say at this time; and before saying them I desire to make a motion. It is to amend the resolution accompanying the majority report, by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting in lieu thereof the language of the resolution reported by the minority of the committee.

I will occupy but a few moments of the time of the House in saying a word or two in reply to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS.]

Mr. HOUSTON. I rise to a point of order. Has not the gentleman from Maine already addressed the House on this subject?

The SPEAKER. He has.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I have now offered an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine has addressed the House once on the original resolution.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is true, but the Speaker will remember that the amendment which he has now proposed was pending at the time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Not at all.

Mr. HOUSTON. It was proposed in the report of the minority of the committee.

The SPEAKER. It was not pending at the time.

Mr. HOUSTON. It was presented by the minority of the committee as a counter proposition to the resolution offered by the majority. It was read to the House, and was under the consideration of the House.

The SPEAKER. The proposition was not entertained, as shown by the Journal of the House.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Will the gentleman from Maine give way for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. If it be the pleasure of the House I will give way for that motion to be made, with the understanding that I shall have the floor on this question to-morrow.

And then, on motion of Mr. DAVIDSON, (at twelve minutes past four o'clock,) the House adjourned till to-morrow at twelve, m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 5, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. JOHN LANAHAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER stated the business first in order to be the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections in the Ohio contested-election case, on which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WASHBURN] was entitled to the floor.

MARYLAND CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I rise to a question of privilege. I wish to present to the House certain papers connected with the contested election for the State of Maryland—the case of Mr. Brooks against Mr. Davis. I ask that they be laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The papers can only be received by unanimous consent. The House is already considering a question of privilege which cannot be suspended by a second question of privilege, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Then I ask the unanimous consent of the House to have these papers laid on the table and ordered to be printed. It was so ordered.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. J. GLANCY JONES, it was Ordered, That leave be granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Colonel Johnson, of Ohio; copies thereof to be left on file.

SOLDIERS OF THE WAR OF 1812, ETC.

Mr. QUITMAN. With the consent of the gentleman from Maine, I desire to offer a resolution, requiring some information from the President of the United States, which information is indispensable to enable the Committee on Military Affairs to proceed to the consideration of the matters before them. The resolution was prepared by order of the committee.

There being no objection, the resolution was reported as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House—

1. What was the whole number of officers—non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates—whether regulars, volunteers, drafted men, or militia, at any time engaged in or mustered into the service of the United States in the last war with Great Britain.

2. Also, what was the whole number in like manner engaged in any of the Indian wars which occurred during the same period, distinguishing, in both cases, between the number of those engaged for a greater or less period than one month.

3. Also, what was the number of persons to whom bounty lands have been awarded for services in said war of 1812, or in the said Indian wars.

Resolved further, That the President be requested also to communicate to this House, if there be any data in the possession of the executive department, an estimate or proximate estimate of the probable annual cost of the extension of the system of revolutionary pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812, and accompanying Indian wars.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. We have, in the official reports, all the information called for, except that requested in the last branch of the resolution. I therefore do not see any necessity for the resolution.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would suggest to the gentleman to include also those engaged in Indian wars from the close of the revolutionary war to the commencement of the war of 1812. There are a great many of them.

Mr. QUITMAN. There is now a bill before the House, and also a bill before the Committee on Military Affairs, on the subject of extending this pension system to the soldiers of the war of 1812, and to those engaged in the Indian wars at that period. The information is required to enable this House to act understandingly on the subject of extending the pension system to the soldiers engaged in the war of 1812 and in the Indian wars. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] can point out to me where I can procure this information I will not trouble the House or the President; but I have been unable to find it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I can furnish my friend from Mississippi with all the information he seeks except as to the last branch of the resolution. But I do not object to the resolution, as the information can be furnished very easily.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I am not aware of any document where I can get the information I desire as to the number of those engaged in the Indian wars between the close of the revolutionary war and the commencement of the war of 1812.

Mr. QUITMAN. I have no objection to that. Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think we might as well include this. I therefore propose the following amendment:

Also, the same information as to those engaged in any of the Indian wars, from the close of the revolutionary war to the commencement of the war of 1812.

Mr. MASON. This and the other committees have clerks. It is the duty of these clerks to prepare such information as is necessary for the action of their committees; but most of them, I observe, are used merely as messengers to go to the Departments, and to pile up labor on the regular clerks of the House. They are mere sinecures. They do not discharge the duties which properly devolve upon them. Such resolutions as this only relieve these clerks of what are their proper duties. They act now merely as messengers to go to the Departments for information which they should compile themselves.

Mr. QUITMAN. I can reply to the gentleman from Kentucky in a single word. The information called for at the suggestion of the Military Committee is for the consideration not only of the committee alone, but for all the members of the House. And I would remind him that it would be very indecorous for a committee of this House to send a clerk to the President for official information without the authority of the House. It might require weeks to obtain the information in the manner suggested by the gentleman, which could be obtained of the President promptly, if respectfully called on by the House for it. This is information for the benefit of every member of the House, as well as of the members of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MASON. Certainly that reason may be very good for those who are disposed to throw the responsibility upon the House. But I would remind my honorable friend from Mississippi, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, that I, and, I believe, most of the members of the House, depend on the information furnished by the regular standing committees of the House with almost as much certainty as if it came from the President himself. They can obtain all this information from the records, through their clerks, and then they would have something to do for their clerks. But, sir, the custom has become too common for this House to call on the Departments for information which subjects the Departments to immense labor, when the information could as well be obtained by the committees of the House, through their clerks.

Now, sir, if the gentleman wants to make a big showing—if gentlemen in this House who are opposed to this pension bill want to make a big showing—they can pile up these soldiers; they can magnify them to any extent which they think proper.

Mr. COBB. I wish to inquire if the resolution has been received, and is before the House?

The SPEAKER. It has been received.

Mr. MASON. I have no disposition to detain the House longer in reference to this matter; but I think the resolution is entirely unnecessary. There are a dozen clerks of committees, any one of whom has leisure enough to obtain all the information required by the committees of the House. I have some knowledge about the action of some of these committee clerks. I know, and the clerks of the House know, that these clerks of committees, instead of discharging their legitimate duties, go to the clerks of the House and require them to make long reports, while, perhaps, they are engaged in important duties. They impose upon the regular clerks of the House immense labors which it is the duty of the clerks of committees to perform themselves. Under the course now pursued, the places of these committee clerks are mere sinecures; they have nothing to do but to frank the documents and conduct the correspondence of members of the committees. If they will discharge the duties properly appertaining to them, they would be worth something.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I see no cause for detaining the House in reference to this matter. I can assure my friend from Kentucky that this information can be obtained with very little labor. My opinion is that most of it has already been presented. If it has not, it should come before the House in official form. It would be of no value obtained in the manner which the gentleman proposes. I think the House is ready for the question, and I hope no more time will be consumed.

Mr. MASON. I am opposed to consuming the time of the House on this theme; and it is to prevent the consumption of the time of the House that I oppose this class of resolutions. I vote against these resolutions all the time. They devolve an immense deal of labor upon the Departments to obtain information which the committees could very well obtain themselves. They have clerks appointed for this especial purpose. Much time is consumed by having these resolutions of inquiry constantly presented to the House. The committees report resolutions requiring immensely long reports from the Departments, and immensely long reports from the clerks of the House. They make a showing that they are very laboriously engaged in their investigations of public questions, when, in fact, they are devolving all their labors upon others; and when, in fact, the immense amount of public business transacted by them is really done through the labors of others. I object to this system of blocking up the business of the House by these resolutions. It is a very plain case who are opposed to the appeal of your masters and mine. You never saw a man who was opposed to the soldiers of the war of 1812 having pensions. You, sir, never saw, among your citizens at home, a man opposed to it. It is very well for these gentlemen to undertake to show that this bill will saddle an immense expense on the country, and hold it up as a scarecrow to frighten members from their proprieties.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I raise the question of order, that the gentleman is not confining his remarks to the resolution before the House, by discussing the propriety of passing pension laws.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the remarks of the gentleman are not pertinent to the question before the House.

Mr. MASON. Well, sir, I was only applying them to all this class of resolutions. I object to that resolution.

Mr. GROW. I call the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. QUITMAN. I permitted the amendment of my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES;] but I wish that there should be a distinction made between those who served in the Indian wars and those who served prior to those wars. I hope the resolution will make that distinction.

Mr. MASON. I objected to that resolution. How did it come before the House by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It had been received before the gentleman from Kentucky commenced. The Chair asked the question if there was objection, and no objection was made.

Mr. QUITMAN. I introduced that resolution as a report from the Committee on Military Affairs, and I suppose I have the right to say a few words upon the subject. I do not wish to consume the time of the House, but—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I would inquire if debate is in order after the previous question has been ordered? I did not understand that this resolution was introduced as a report from a committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Mississippi to ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a report from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I did not so understand it.

Mr. SEWARD. How could it be the report of a committee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not informed.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to make a point of order. I did not understand the gentleman from Mississippi as introducing this resolution as a report from a committee. If he did not, debate is not in order.

Mr. QUITMAN. I would inform the gentleman that I expressly stated that I introduced it as a report from a committee.

Mr. SEWARD. Well, I am satisfied.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Had I understood that, I should not have yielded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understood it at the time, and asked if there was any objection.

He heard none. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Mississippi is entitled to an hour.

Mr. QUITMAN. I will not consume as much time as the gentlemen have in objecting. I wish the House to understand that the information called for by this resolution will not cover one sheet of paper; and therefore all this cry about labor and expense is all imaginary. It simply calls for the numbers, not the names, of these persons. This is all I wish to say.

The amendment was then agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. QUITMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Post Office Department, containing a statement of the clerks and other persons, employed in the Post Office Department for the year ending January 30, 1857; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the War Department containing a statement of the expenses of the national armories; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Post Office Department, transmitting a detailed statement of the expenditure of the contingent fund of the Post Office Department; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

OHIO CONTESTED ELECTION.

The SPEAKER. Upon the pending question—the Ohio contested-election case—the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WASHBURN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GILMER. Before my friend from Maine proceeds, I ask him to yield me the floor, as an act of courtesy, that I may reply to a question which was put to the minority of the committee in the debate yesterday, as I apprehend, with somewhat too much warmth and confidence. The minority of the committee were called upon individually, by name, and with an air of defiance which might have produced the impression that there was not one particle of testimony before the committee upon which the minority could have reported that both parties acted upon the presumption that one could not proceed to take testimony during the sixty days that the other party was proceeding under his commission. Although I make no charge of a want of courtesy, I think my friend from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] will consider, after having put the question, and particularly after calling the names of the minority individually, he should not have declined to yield at least a portion of his time to have pointed out to him and to this House the grounds upon which the assertions in that report were based. I say I complain of no discourtesy, for, Mr. Speaker, I am proud to say, speaking of my brethren upon that committee, leaving myself out of the question, that I have never been associated with a set of gentlemen who seemed to me more fair-minded, more willing to hear and to be heard, to have their opinions canvassed, and more patient, even under contradiction, than the gentlemen upon that committee. My brethren upon that committee will do the minority the justice to say to the House, that, differing with the majority of the committee, our report was drawn up and submitted in full meeting, and read over to the majority. It was not then intimated that there was any question of fact relied upon in that minority report which was not well founded; for, if it had been, that minority, I may say, would have yielded to any suggestion made by the majority in that regard, and have allowed it to be corrected; as a matter of fact. I understood it to be the sense of the whole committee, that in that fact we did concur; that, taking the whole case together, it was apparent to us that they had acted under that view of the law; and I believe (with great deference, however, to the legal opinion of the gentleman from Kentucky) that we gave a correct opinion upon a fair construction of that statute.

I desire to point out, in the answer of Mr. Valandigham, what is a perfect refutation of the pretense that he did not so understand it. After all the air of triumph of my friend from Georgia, what does that evidence prove? I invite the attention of the House to it, since it is now printed in my friend's speech. It is simply a denial of Vallandigham that he did not keep his commission open with a view to deprive Mr. Campbell of the opportunity to take his testimony.

Mr. Speaker, in this political investigation I presume it is not expected that a committee, in arriving at its conclusions, in all instances are to have the same direct, positive, and conclusive testimony upon facts that a judge or a jury in a court of law would require in determining an issue. This is a question of discretion. A question of discretion is one thing, and a question which is decided finally and prejudicially to a party is another thing. The question before us is upon a question of application for extension of time for the taking more testimony, which, if granted, cannot prejudice either of the parties. Let me state the case here, Mr. Speaker, as clearly as I can, so that this House will understand it.

It is stated in Mr. Campbell's application for further time, that when his attorney served notice upon Mr. Vallandigham, that gentleman then gave that construction to the law, and said that he would not attend; and he did not attend. In his answer he answers everything minutely, cautiously, carefully, and like a lawyer; and not only answers, but argues every point; but these two material points are left unanswered, except the answer which my friend from Georgia brought to the attention of the House—that he said he did not give his notices with a view of cutting off the sitting member. He did not attend when the sitting member was taking testimony, either in person or by counsel, to cross-examine the witnesses. Then, sir, we have not only his failure to reply, but the corroborating circumstances tending to show that he failed to appear and cross-examine the sitting member's witnesses, in order that legal exceptions might be taken to their testimony when it was brought before the committee.

Mr. TRIPPE. I desire to ask the gentleman from North Carolina a question. I feel considerable interest on this point, because, as I announced the other evening, I put my vote upon this question directly upon it; and I am now by no means satisfied as I was the other evening.

I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to this particular point. He is making, I admit, a pretty plausible case that Mr. Vallandigham, the contestant, did put that construction upon the statute, and that he protested against the right of the sitting member to overlap his time and take testimony while he (the contestant) was taking it. That may be true; and it occurred, I believe, on the 17th or 18th of March. The question I wish to ask is—and that is the point upon which my vote as a member of this House will depend—did the sitting member act under that impression himself up to that time or afterwards? Did he fail to take testimony because he so construed the law? Did he postpone giving notice of his intention to take testimony up to the 17th of March because he believed that before that time he could not do it because of the notices of the contestant? Did he believe himself to be unable to do so under perhaps a wrong construction of the act? If he did, if he believed that he could not take testimony, and did not take testimony because, as a lawyer, he so construed the law, then it would be cruel not to give him further time.

I will make this further remark, sir: it nowhere appears that Mr. Campbell did, at that time, give that construction to the law, except in the statement of the committee. It is not in Mr. Campbell's application or anywhere else. If it is stated on this floor to be the fact, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. GILMER. I will say to my friend that it is so stated in the minority report. The contestant knew, the day before the report was submitted to the House, what it contained; and he also knew that if he had shown, either personally or through his friends on the committee, any reasons why it should not be stated in the report, the objection would have been noticed in the report. The contestant was here all the time; he knew every day what was going on in the committee; he knew what would be in the report; it was submitted to his friends in the committee, and no exception was taken to it. If there had been, and Mr. Vallandigham had stated that there was any doubt about the fact, the minority would have hesitated to state the fact.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to ask the gentleman from North Carolina a single question to see if I understand the course of remark he is now pursuing. Does the gentleman desire to be understood as saying that the report of the minority of the committee came under the personal observation of the contestant before it was presented to the House, and that any statement of fact contained in that report might have been corrected by him if not consistent with fact?

Mr. GILMER. Perhaps it would be going too far to state that, and I will not do the gentleman injustice by stating anything that is not strictly true. What I say is this: that in deference to our brethren on the committee, we caused this report to be read over in the committee before it was presented to the House, Mr. Vallandigham not being present. I cannot state, at least, that he was present. May be he was. But I will state with great confidence that he knew what was in the report, and must have known that the minority would not have inserted a statement of fact if it was to be controverted here, without stating that it was denied. I will add further, that when the testimony of the contestant was taken, Mr. Campbell was in the city of Washington; and when he gave his notice, he endeavored to put it in such shape that his taking of testimony should commence after the conclusion of the contestant's commissions, and as soon as he could get home.

Sir, I was pleased to hear the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] when he stated the rule by which he intended to be governed in coming to a correct and fair conclusion in this case, and upon this question. I think he laid down the proper rule; but I regretted to see that, when he came to argue the facts, instead of addressing himself to our judgment, he addressed himself to our prejudices and to our passions. One prominent argument which he presented by way of enlightening the House as to whether this continuance should be granted or not, was a letter which Mr. Campbell wrote shortly after the election, in reply to an untimely notice of contest given him by the contestant. That is a prominent reason why this continuance should not be granted.

Another reason which Mr. Vallandigham presents, and presses with great vehemence, is the proposition made to him by Mr. Campbell on April 2, 1857, which, in substance, was this: "Well, now, we are both at home; we have got the summer before us; we can go on and take all the testimony we want; we need not trouble the House with asking for an extension of time; we can waive informality; you can accept my notices and I will accept yours." My friend from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] thinks, because the contestant replied, "Why, let us go again before the people," that is an argument here to determine this question, under the rules of impartiality. And, in conclusion, my friend exclaimed, in an excited manner, that we should now proceed to judgment—that the time had come when we should go to execution. He said that this delay was all a pretence. And this was addressed to the House to secure impartiality. That was addressed to the House, of course with no improper desire to sway its judgment in the decision of the question. If I were disposed, Mr. Speaker, I think I could show many things to operate on the southern friends of Mr. Vallandigham, by way of prejudicing them against him. If I were disposed to do any such thing, I could record his vote in the Legislative Assembly of Ohio, in which he voted to allow free negroes and other negroes to testify against white men.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. I never cast such a vote.

Mr. GILMER. I will show by the journal that you did.

Mr. SEWARD. I raise the point of order whether the gentleman is not bound to confine himself to the subject-matter under discussion? We will have talk enough about negroes before we get through this Congress.

Mr. GILMER. I did not intend—God forbid that I should—to hurt the feelings of any gentleman; but when this comes to be examined, it will be incontestably shown by the journal that I am right.

Several MEMBERS. Read the journal.

Mr. SEWARD. I make the objection that the question as to nigger voting in Ohio, so far as the State of Ohio is concerned, has nothing to do with this question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the question of order, and thinks that the consideration of questions in the Ohio Legislature cannot be introduced into this House.

Mr. HILL. May I ask a question of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. SEWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. HILL. Do you object to this information going before the House lest it may injure the character of the contestant?

Mr. SEWARD. I have nothing to do with the character of either of the contestant or sitting member. That is a matter for their constituents at home to settle. I do not know that I would indorse either of them. I ask the gentleman [Mr. HILL] if he indorses the political opinions of the sitting member [Mr. CAMPBELL] on the slavery question?

Mr. HILL. I would remark to the gentleman that he ought to have called the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] to order yesterday when he read that irrelevant letter.

Mr. GILMER. I will state in brief what I desire to show, and gentlemen can compare this statement with the journal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from North Carolina cannot proceed with the statement in order.

Mr. GILMER. I submit with great deference to the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I move that the gentleman have permission to make his statement.

Mr. SEWARD. I insist on my question of order. I want to vote on the question without regard to niggers in any shape. I want to know which of the gentlemen comes here indorsed by the majority of the people of the district, and I shall vote accordingly.

Mr. BURNETT. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will withdraw his objection, and let the gentleman [Mr. GILMER] bring in his statement. Mr. Vallandigham has denied it.

Mr. SEWARD. If it suits the temper of the House I withdraw it; but I have no relish for it myself.

Mr. MILLSON. I do not think it proper to introduce such subjects in the House; and I object.

Mr. GILMER. I was simply going to show that, as my friend from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] thought proper to indulge in these side-bar explanations, and in these matters dehors the matters at issue it might turn out that if Mr. Campbell chose to do the same, he might have reasons as thick as blackberries in the corners of fences, or as huckleberries in the swamps.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. I hope the objection will be withdrawn, and the gentleman be allowed to proceed.

Mr. HILL. I would say, in justice to the contestant himself, that he desires the gentleman from North Carolina to go on and read this vote. I hope there will be no objection, since it is agreeable to him.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I certainly stand impartial between these parties. I have taken no part in this controversy. But I appeal to gentlemen on both sides of this question, that matters so purely irrelevant as this, which may provoke asperity, crimination, and recrimination, to a certain extent, shall not be introduced in this House on a question of this sort. It certainly is a matter of no earthly consideration to any man sitting here as judge or juror, what may have been the past political opinions expressed by either of these gentlemen on any question, in any convention or Legislature. I therefore renew the point of order, and intend to maintain it. I trust that no irrelevant matter will be introduced in this discussion.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I appeal to the gentleman from Kentucky to withdraw his objection.

Mr. MILLSON. I have not withdrawn my point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I regard it as discreditable to the House to allow discussions of this character to go on. It is a question of no importance to the main question how gentlemen vote on any proposition outside.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I hope objection will be withdrawn, now that injustice has been done. The record shows that Mr. Vallandigham gave no such vote.

Mr. GILMER. I will proceed.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 38.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Did the gentleman say I was mistaken?

Mr. GILMER. I think so. I will read the journal, if I can be permitted to do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina must suspend. The Chair has ruled this debate to be out of order, and cannot permit it to go on to settle the question of fact.

Mr. GILMER. Then I hope I shall be permitted to proceed without further interruption. I will be very short. I will remark that I do not desire to do Mr. Vallandigham any injustice in relation to this matter. There is no gentleman here who would be more relieved to be satisfied that the intimation I have made was unfounded. But, Mr. Speaker, in the debate heretofore, the fact that Mr. Campbell's application was not formally made until after Mr. Vallandigham had been heard by his counsel before the committee, has been held up as a reason why his application should not be granted. While my friend from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] was speaking, I desired to put in an explanation of the matter; and had I been permitted to do so, I know he would have done both parties justice. When the fact is understood, I am very well satisfied, and I am certain the members of the Committee of Elections will sustain me, that the objection will go for nothing.

When we returned after the holidays, Mr. Campbell was detained at home by reason of sickness in his family. Mr. Vallandigham was here. His counsel was here. They appeared before the committee, and asked, as a matter of favor, that the counsel of Mr. Vallandigham might be heard. I believe the majority of the committee were opposed to his being heard; unless Mr. Campbell or his counsel were present. I think I submitted to the committee, that inasmuch as the committee were all lawyers, and as the counsel of Mr. Vallandigham had to be at home at a given time, I saw no impropriety in hearing him upon the law of the case, upon the admissibility of testimony, and upon the merits of the case, without prejudice to anybody. When Mr. Campbell came here, he would be supplied with a brief of the argument made before the committee. With the understanding that the counsel was to have a memorandum of the argument made before the committee in behalf of Mr. Vallandigham, they allowed him to proceed. He did proceed, with much ability and fairness as a debater, and was heard with great interest and pleasure by the committee. He did, as I understand, leave a brief of his argument, to be reviewed by the counsel of Mr. Campbell, who also addressed the committee, as I understand, during my absence. Yet, sir, this very indulgence granted to Mr. Vallandigham's counsel, who wanted to go home to attend to his business, is seized hold of as one of the reasons why time for taking additional testimony should not be granted.

Sir, no member of this House, when the case comes to a final hearing, would be more ready, upon all the facts, with the supplement testimony before us or not, to do ample justice to Mr. Vallandigham than the person who now addresses this House. But, sir, under the circumstance, were I in Mr. Vallandigham's place, or were I one of his personal advisers, I would say to him, "Let all the facts be produced." After having been a candidate in that district for three successive times; after having been rejected by that people twice; and after having the legal returns of the third election decided against you, I would place no impediment in the way of taking that testimony. Do not have yourself subjected to the suspicion of asking to be voted a member of the House of Representatives by that body, itself, in the face of the fact that this additional testimony may disclose that you were not elected by the people you seek to represent."

One word more on that question, in answer to the remarks of my friend from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] in relation to the answer given by Mr. Campbell to the first notice given by the contestant. I do not stand here to vindicate that answer. I think that both in its tone and language it is subject to criticism; and I have no doubt that Mr. Campbell afterwards, in a cooler moment, after he had had time for reflection, when he had had time for consideration, would regret having giving such an answer.

But, Mr. Speaker, I will in this connection present some considerations by way of excuse for the answer thus given, under the circumstances, in that mode and manner, admitting that it is obnoxious to much criticism, if not to the extent to which it has been carried. When did it take place? It took place shortly after a most heated and angry contest, in which one of these gentlemen was elected, and which was held between the State and presidential elections; and when you consider the manner in which this canvass had been conducted; when you consider the intolerance to which it had been carried on the part of the contestant, I think it presents some excuse for the character of that answer.

In a report of a speech made by Mr. Vallandigham in 1856, it is said:

"Mr. V. then proceeded to trace Mr. Campbell's political history, interrogatively, from the beginning, some twenty years ago, to the present time."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to know of the gentleman from North Carolina if he is reading from a book, or from matter which was laid before the committee?

Mr. GILMER. No, sir.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I raise the point of order, that it is not in order to read from a speech of Mr. Vallandigham which was not laid before the committee.

Mr. GILMER. I read it by way of reply to what was said yesterday. It will be very short. It will only give a specimen of what is contained in that speech:

"Was he the public spirited young man who began his career by volunteering to prosecute gratis all offenders against the black laws? He (Mr. V.) had been accused by some of voting, while in the Legislature, to repeal these same laws some ten or twelve years ago; but it was not true: he voted then against them along with Dr. Hibbard and Thomas Brown of this county, although he then thought them useless and obsolete; and never heard of anybody 'reported' in favor of enforcing them except his very consistent competitor."

He then goes on and uses this language, to which I call the attention of the House:

"Was he the man, who pending the balloting for Speaker, and after he had been forced to decline, moved to put Mr. Orr of South Carolina in the chair over Mr. Banks's head?"

And then again, in another part of the speech, he uses this language:

"The South don't know him, and cares still less about him. Does he suppose, because a few southern members of Congress of loose patriotism and yet looser habits are accustomed, out of abundant good nature, to associate with him at a few places of public resort, that the whole South knows him? Does he suppose, because once or twice in a session, along with the congressional gang drawn out alphabetically, he is permitted to dine at the President's house, and now and then by special favor is allowed to eat the crumbs and drink the heel-taps left after dinner, at the house of Toombs, Stephens, Hunter, or Slidell, that therefore he is of sufficient importance to call forth the united efforts of the South to defeat him? Can arrogance, insolence, and vanity go further?"

I only read these extracts, Mr. Speaker, to show, when he penned this answer, which even his friends admit is open to criticism, that perhaps no man was ever more provoked, and that no man could have greater provocation to extenuate any offense, than Mr. Campbell had when he sent that answer.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I think this debate has proceeded about far enough. The debate has wandered very far from the point involved upon which the House are to pass, and I hope that the attention of the House will be brought back to the resolution before it, and not be lost entirely in the mazes of declamation on outside matters brought into this discussion. The simple matter for the House to determine is, whether Mr. Campbell, in this application to take further testimony, presents a case proper for the exercise of the discretion of the House? That the House has, in its discretion, the right to grant further time, there is no doubt. Is the case presented a proper case for its exercise?

I will for one moment depart from the line of remark I had intended to pursue, in order to allude to the remark of the gentleman from North Carolina about this vote. I think it is proper I should do so in a single sentence. I have carefully examined the vote to which the gentleman referred.

Mr. HILL. As this question has been ruled out upon the one side, it ought to be upon the other. I make the point of order, that what occurred in the Ohio Legislature is not germane to the question before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it is not relevant, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I will not speak further, then, upon this matter, than to deny utterly the conclusion to which the gentleman from North Carolina comes, as to the facts which have been stated.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I appeal to my colleague to withdraw the point of order, and let all the facts come out.

Mr. HILL. I will say that I have no prejudice in relation to this matter. I know all this matter is extraneous; but I have seen, with regret, that political feeling has taken charge of this matter already. I think that what is fair upon one side is fair upon the other. Properly speaking, I belong to neither side, and I have no bias between these parties.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The gentleman can assent or refuse.

Mr. HILL. If gentlemen will take all this matter, and read the journal as it is, with the consent of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. GILMER,] I shall have no objection.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I am willing to read the whole record.

Mr. HILL. I shall object, unless it is all read.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. It justifies no such conclusion as the gentleman from Georgia arrives at. I have read it carefully.

Mr. HILL. Every gentleman can examine it for himself, and come to his own conclusion; though I have, myself, no objection to have the whole of it read.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I shall devote the very few moments I have to the consideration of the question. If there have been more grounds presented as reasons why further time should be given than were stated in the report of the committee, I have yet to learn them. There are only two grounds upon which the application can be placed. One is, that Mr. Campbell was a member of Congress, and unable to give attention to the taking of testimony; and the other is, that the contestant occupied the whole time, and excluded him from any opportunity to do it. All the other points which have been made are but relative to those two, and nothing else.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] yesterday took occasion very violently to assail the committee on account of the conclusion at which they had arrived in their construction of the law of 1851. The opinion which the committee expressed was their unanimous opinion. It is an opinion that they are still disposed to adhere to. It is, perhaps, very unfortunate for the House that, in the organization of the committee, some gentleman, possessing the legal ability of the gentleman from Kentucky, was not placed upon it; and it is very probable that hereafter we will inquire of him, before we make our reports, what his opinions are upon the law, that the whole committee may not go so entirely astray hereafter; and I have no doubt he will be quite as ready to volunteer his opinions in a quiet way to the committee as he was to express them so very eloquently before the House.

The gentleman objected to the view of the committee in the construction of the law, that the parties had a right to go on at the same time and take testimony. Well, sir, if they have not that right, the law is but a piece of nonsense. The law says that neither party shall proceed to take testimony in more than one place at the same time; and he inquires, if neither cannot, can either one? and he thinks the answer to that question involves the demonstration of his position in the argument. Very far from it. I answer the question just as he answers it—that neither one can take testimony in more than one place at a time, but either one can take testimony in one place at a time. He puts a question that does not involve the point at issue; and having extorted an answer to it, he concludes that that is an answer to our argument.

But the gentleman finds fault upon the other branch of the law, because the committee concluded that the parties may go on and take testimony after the expiration of the sixty days. He says very triumphantly: "What! Ask the parties to take testimony in violation of the law? The law says no testimony shall be taken after the expiration of the sixty days, and you ask him to violate the law. Parties swearing falsely could not be convicted of perjury under such circumstances. It is idle to talk about the right of the parties to take testimony after the expiration of the sixty days."

Well, sir, with all deference to the opinion of the gentleman, I still differ with him in the view that he takes. He says that a party swearing falsely could not be convicted of perjury. Why not? It is a matter pending and undetermined by the House, a point material to the issue; and if the House see fit to receive the testimony when it is presented, it is as valid for the purpose of determining the matter in controversy as though it had been taken during the sixty days; and although the law says that the House may extend the time for taking testimony, it does not necessarily say that the time shall be extended after the House shall pass the order; but it may retroact and make good an employment of time immediately following the sixty days, and before the passage of the order.

I suppose, sir, that if a case were opened in a court, either upon the common law side or the chancery side of the court, the rule would apply that testimony could not be taken during the term, during the session of the court; but yet, would the gentleman say, that if such testimony was taken, and a party testified falsely, he could not be convicted of perjury? The rule of court would exclude the testimony; and yet, if a party had testified falsely, he would most undoubtedly be guilty of perjury, and could be punished.

Now, sir, I still insist that, by a fair construction of that law, it means precisely what the committee have interpreted it to mean, and that any other construction would, in many cases, utterly prevent a contested case from being decided in Congress at all.

Having briefly noticed these two points, I wish to proceed to notice some other objections that have been interposed. But before it shall pass from my mind, I wish to do Mr. Campbell an act of justice, by extending somewhat an explanation that I made yesterday. In the hurry of my remarks, I did not state all the facts connected with the subject upon which I was speaking.

I stated that before Mr. Campbell made this application for further time, his counsel had argued this case upon its merits, and that the counsel for the contestant had done the same thing. I should have stated that before the argument commenced, it was represented to the committee that Mr. Campbell would, perhaps, upon his arrival, desire to make a motion for further time. The argument was commenced with the understanding that he should have the privilege upon his return. It is just to him to state that part of the history of the action of the committee.

The contestee further suggests to me—what it is perhaps proper I should say, because it is true—that his counsel argued the question, up to the time when he closed his argument, mainly upon questions of law relating to the admissibility of testimony which had been taken. Such is the fact, and it is right and proper that I should state it; and before he had concluded his argument, and taken up the facts of the case, he was informed by the committee that they would not pass upon those questions of law until the other question was settled; and that if he desired to make his application for time, he must do it then. The discussion was then abandoned, and the application made which has been brought before this House.

I do not share in the apprehension of my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. GILMER,] in regard to some question which may arise to be decided by this House. He is extremely fearful that, unless this case goes back for further testimony to be taken, some very dangerous and startling question may be raised in this House for its decision. He is very apprehensive that this House will have to determine the question whether, under the constitution and laws of Ohio, a person having negro blood in his veins is entitled to vote. I do not see any such very alarming matter in that. The constitution of the State of Ohio limits the right of suffrage to citizens of the United States, and the only question for this House to determine is, who are citizens of the United States, and at the same time citizens of Ohio? If the gentleman from North Carolina sees any great danger in this, I confess I do not. We have important legal opinions to guide us in coming to a conclusion. The House ought not, for the reason indicated, to send this inquiry back. The reason is, in my opinion, utterly insufficient, and one which ought not to be entertained for a moment.

The proper question for the House to decide is, "has Mr. Campbell used such due diligence in the prosecution of his case as would entitle him to a further extension of time?" Now, I think that he should have stated in his application what he expects to prove by having further time, and the witnesses by whom he expects to prove it. He should have laid the foundation in such a way as to enable the House to determine whether, if his expectations were realized, the result would probably be changed. But he does not lay that foundation. He presents certain affidavits which, according to the reasoning of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] have no legal force whatever; affidavits taken after the expiration of the time allowed, and on which, according to the gentleman's reasoning, the parties could not be prosecuted if they had sworn falsely. But even admitting their force and validity, they do not state those facts which would change the result as now presented to the House.

I submit, then, that under all these circumstances the sitting member has not laid the foundation necessary to entitle him to come before the House and ask for an extension of time. His absence from home during the taking of testimony worked no disadvantage to him and no advantage to his opponent. His opponent did not appear before the commission, but was represented by counsel. They both stood on precisely the same footing. And it is no valid objection for him now to say that he was absent, because he appeared, as the law provided he should appear, by counsel, through the whole of the examination.

Now, Mr. Speaker, without any sort of desire to go over all this ground, and take up all these legal points raised in the course of the discussion, but simply to bring the House back to these two points which I first stated, I have limited my consideration entirely to them. I think we are just as well prepared for the question now as we ever will be. At any rate, I am satisfied that we have taken up time enough with this preliminary question. I must therefore ask the previous question on the passage of the resolution reported by the committee.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the call for the previous question for a moment.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I will do so to hear what the gentleman has to say. I do not, however, surrender my right to the floor.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make good now, by reference to the journal of the Ohio Legislature referred to, my declaration a short time ago that I did not vote as the member from North Carolina [Mr. GILMER] stated.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I raise the point of order that was raised on the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. GILMER.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. I appeal, on behalf of the contestant, to the gentleman from Maine to withdraw his point of order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. MORGAN. I object, decidedly.

Mr. SEWARD. If the gentleman wishes to refer to what occurred in the Ohio Legislature, I object.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I must resume the floor. The contestant has appealed to the House, and the objection has come from the gentleman from New York. I renew the call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Before the question is put on ordering the main question, I move a call of the House; and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 106, nays 102; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoek, Bowie, Boyce, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Chapman, John B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, Wood, Woodson, and Zollicoffer—102.

So a call of the House was ordered.

Pending the vote,

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, stated that Mr. SEARING had been called home by sickness in his family.

Mr. FAULKNER. My colleague, Mr. SMITH, has been called home by severe indisposition, and requested me to announce that fact to the House. This is the first occasion since that his name has been called, and the first appropriate occasion that I could state the fact.

Mr. PEYTON stated that Mr. TALBOT was confined to his room by indisposition.

The roll was then called; and the following gentlemen failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Bonham, Caruthers, Caskie, Horace F. Clark, Corning, Dummieck, Edie, Davis of Maryland, Lawrence, Matteson, Murray, Searing, Smith of Virginia, Talbot, and Thompson.

Two hundred and eighteen members answered to their names.

The doors were closed; and the names of the absentees called for excuses.

MILLEGE L. BONHAM

Mr. MILES stated that his colleague, Mr. BONHAM, was detained at home by severe indisposition; and moved that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

SAMUEL CARUTHERS.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri, stated that his colleague, Mr. CARUTHERS, was detained from the House by indisposition; and moved that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN S. CASKIE. No excuse offered.

HORACE F. CLARK.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I know that my colleague, Mr. CLARK, has been called away suddenly and that he was, very reluctantly, obliged to leave. That is all the excuse I can make for him—that he has been called away by business of a very important nature. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

ERASTUS CORNING.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I repeat, as to Mr. CORNING, what I have stated in respect to Mr. CLARK. I know the fact, personally, that he has been called away also on important business, and obliged to leave. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM H. DIMMICK.

Mr. FLORENCE. I understand that my colleague, Mr. DIMMICK, is at home in consequence of the illness of a member of his family. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN R. EDIE. No excuse offered.

J. MORRISON HARRIS.

Mr. RICAUD. My colleague is absent from the city, engaged in getting testimony in his contested-election case, by permission of the House. I therefore move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM LAWRENCE.

Mr. COCKERILL. I will state that my colleague was called home by the death of a member of his family. I move that he be excused.

Mr. NICHOLS. I wish to state further, that Mr. LAWRENCE came to me yesterday morning, and stated that he could not leave the city unless he could pair off on this question. Upon this statement, I paired off with him, and shall not feel at liberty to vote upon any of the questions affecting this contest during his absence.

The motion was agreed to.

ORSAMUS B. MATTESON. No excuse offered.

AMEROSE S. MURRAY.

Mr. TOMPKINS. I will state that Mr. MURRAY left the city several days ago, stating that his family were sick. I have not heard from him since; but he was called home by sickness in his family. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN A. SEARING.

Mr. KELLY. My colleague is detained from the House by important business. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM SMITH.

Mr. FAULKNER. I have before stated that my colleague is absent from indisposition. I now move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

ALBERT G. TALBOT.

Mr. BURNETT. My colleague was absent from the House on account of ill health. He is now outside the door, having left a sick bed to be here. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN THOMPSON.

Mr. PALMER. I will state that Mr. THOMPSON is detained from the House by indisposition. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RITCHIE. I believe all the absentees have been called over. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The main question was then ordered on the resolution reported by the Committee of Elections, and amendment.

The question was first taken upon the amendment offered by the minority of the committee.

The amendment was reported, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert: That Lewis D. Campbell and Clement L. Vallandigham be, and they are hereby, allowed the further time of forty days from the passage of this order to take supplemental evidence touching the matter set forth in the memorial of Clement L. Vallandigham, contesting the right of Lewis D. Campbell, of the third congressional district of Ohio, to a seat in the Thirty-Fifth Congress.

Mr. KELSEY demanded the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 98, nays 113; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Andrews, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Conins, Covode, Curtis, Damrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, Wood, and Zollcoffer—98.

NAYS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery,

Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoock, Bowie, Boyce, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingan, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Leidy, Letcher, Maclay, McKibbin, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miles, Miller, Milson, Montgomery, Moore, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Reagan, Reilly, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Scales, Scott, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Tripp, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—113.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. HILL said: I wish, in a few words, to state the reasons why I shall ask the House to excuse me from voting on that amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I object.

Mr. HILL. I wish to state, that from the best attention I have been able to give the subject—

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I object to the gentleman's statement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the gentleman has not the right to assign a reason why he wishes to be excused from voting, and that the motion to excuse is not in order. The motion should have been made before the call of the roll had commenced.

Mr. COBB. I desire to state that I am not certain whether I was within the bar when my name was called or not. I was just by the door, reading a memorial, and I am not certain whether I was within the bar at that particular time or not.

The SPEAKER. That is a question which the gentleman must decide for himself.

Mr. COBB. That I cannot determine. I should certainly vote "no," if allowed to vote.

Mr. BENNETT. I wish to state that I was absent from the House for a moment, and when I returned I found the door closed. But for that fact I should have been within the bar when my name was called. I ask the consent of the House to vote.

Mr. CLEMENS. I object.

Mr. COBB. I hope I shall be allowed to vote. I was at that time reading the memorial of a poor, destitute lady.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. If the gentleman from Alabama was talking to a lady, it is not to be wondered that he does not know whether he was within the bar. [Laughter.]

Mr. COBB. A gentleman here states that I was within the bar when my name was called.

The SPEAKER. The rule requires that the gentleman must himself respond to the question whether he was within the bar, yes or no.

Mr. COBB. I could not do that.

Mr. HOUSTON. What does the Chair rule is within the bar?

The SPEAKER. Anywhere within the Hall.

Mr. FAULKNER. The committee which had charge of the arrangements of the new Hall reported that the limits of the entire Hall should be considered the bar. If a gentleman, therefore, is within the Hall, he is within the bar.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I want to call the attention of the Speaker to the fact stated by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BENNETT,] that he was shut out of the House. I saw him come to the door, and find it locked. He was not out of the House, therefore, voluntarily. He was shut out. I do not think the rule should be applied to him.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it should.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I think, then, that the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Alabama had better consider themselves paired off.

Mr. WARREN. I want to ask a question.

Several MEMBERS objected.

Mr. WARREN. I want to know whether the gentleman from Alabama was within the bar before the next name was called? [Cries of "Order!" "Order!"] I hold that the Speaker must put the question, "Were you within the bar before the next name was called?"

The SPEAKER. The Chair has propounded the only question that the rules recognize. The practice of the House has been that, if a member is within the bar when the next name was called, he shall be allowed to vote. The Chair has, however, propounded the only question which the rule requires.

Mr. CLAY. There seems to be some mistake as to what is the bar of the House. The gentleman himself seems to have labored under some doubt as to what was the bar of the House.

The question then recurred upon agreeing to the resolution reported by the Committee of Elections.

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to allow further time to take testimony in this case, as asked for by the sitting member.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. KEITT called for tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SICKLES and BILLINGHURST were appointed.

The House was divided, and the tellers reported—ayes forty.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 114, nays 101; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoock, Bowie, Boyce, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caskey, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingan, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Leidy, Letcher, Maclay, McKibbin, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miles, Miller, Milson, Montgomery, Moore, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Reagan, Reilly, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Scales, Scott, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Tripp, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—114.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Conins, Covode, Curtis, Damrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Haskin, Hickman, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ready, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, Wood, and Zollcoffer—101.

Pending the call,

Mr. HILL said, when his name was called, I ask now what I proposed to ask some moments ago; which is, that the House excuse me from voting upon the resolution, which is nothing more nor less than a reversal of the resolution which has just been negatived.

Mr. BURNETT. I object.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I would inquire if the rules do not require that such request should be made before the call of the roll is commenced. If so, I object.

At the close of the call,

Mr. HILL said, I ask the House now to suspend the rules to enable me to occupy three minutes in giving my reasons for desiring not to vote.

Mr. BURNETT. I object.

Mr. HILL. I shall have to make some objections myself on another occasion.

The result of the vote having been announced, Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONTUMACIOUS WITNESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to call the attention of the House to the response made by the witness, J. D. Williamson, which he has prepared as an amended answer in pursuance of leave granted by the House yesterday.

The amended answer was read, as follows:

WASHINGTON, February 5, 1858.

To SPEAKER House of Representatives.
Thirty-Fifth Congress:
SIR: In answer to the questions propounded to me by the House, I would most respectfully state: that the subpoena was served upon me summoning me before your select committee. I consented to appear, and prepared to do so, but being under heavy bonds in New York not to leave the jail limits of that city, I called upon the sheriff and told him that I had been summoned to appear before the committee, and desired that my bonds should not be forfeited by my absence. He replied, that if I left the city voluntarily my bonds would be forfeited, and my pledged faith broken; but if my attendance was compelled it was his opinion, as well as that of my attorney, that my bail would not suffer loss. Upon their advice I acted, supposing it was right, and never intending and not knowing that I was committing a contempt upon your honorable body. I would cheerfully, and without hesitation, have appeared before the committee and answered all questions put to me touching the investigation they were pursuing, had it not been for the restraints thrown around me in New York. I now hold myself in readiness to answer "such proper questions" as shall be put to me by the committee.

J. D. WILLIAMSON.

Sworn to, and subscribed before me, on this 5th day of February, 1858.

C. W. C. DUNNINGTON, J. P.

Mr. STANTON. I desire to state to the House, in addition to the written answer of the witness, that he has been before the committee and has answered very promptly, without evasion or equivocation, every question propounded. The committee have no further business with him that we know of, so far as the answers are concerned. Whether they are true or not, is a question which the public will decide when the testimony is published. I ask that the witness be discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I hold in my hand a letter from a very particular friend of mine in New York, a member of the bar, in which he states to me that this gentleman was in the position in which he represented himself to be, that he was called upon in his professional capacity, by the witness, and consulted in regard to what he could do to obey the order of the House; and that at his instance this witness instituted proceedings with a view of placing himself in such a position, without involving his sureties in responsibility not intended to be imposed upon them.

Mr. STANTON. I move the previous question upon the motion that the witness be discharged from custody.

Mr. LETCHER. Oh, no previous question is necessary.

Mr. STANTON. Very well; I withdraw it. The motion to discharge the witness was agreed to.

Mr. AVERY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill for reference merely. Several MEMBERS objected.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I call for the regular order of business.

PRESIDENT'S KANSAS MESSAGE.

The SPEAKER stated that the first business in order was the consideration of the President's message in reference to the Lecompton constitution and the motion to refer the same, upon which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Grow] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. JENKINS. I rise to a privileged question. It will be remembered by the Speaker, and by the House, that the special committee, which was appointed to investigate the official conduct and accounts of the late Doorkeeper, had leave, under the resolution appointing them, to report at any time. That committee have instructed me to make a report.

Mr. GROW. Yes; but the gentleman cannot take the floor from another to make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Virginia cannot take the floor from the gentleman from Pennsylvania to make the report.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, the President has sent to Congress a message recommending the admission of Kansas as a State into this Union, under the constitution formed at Lecompton, in November last. The first question that arises in all such applications for the consideration of the legislators is, is the constitution republican in its form, and does it in its essential features meet the will and wishes of those to be affected by it? The President has failed to send to Congress the vote of the people of Kansas on this constitution, so that we may judge whether it meets their will and wishes by the official record of their action. In the case of Minnesota he sent a message transmitting the constitution and the vote of the people for and against it, without any recommendation whatever. In that case he sent the facts, and left Congress to act upon them. In this case, without sending the facts, he sends a message abounding in epithets and denunciations of the majority of the people of Kansas, without furnishing us with the facts that the official record ought to show.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield me the floor, that I may modify the proposition I made the other day, and explain the modification.

Mr. GROW. I yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I wish to withdraw the amendment which I offered the other day to the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HUGHES.] The reasons why I wish to withdraw that amendment may be briefly stated, and I will state them. My object in moving the amendment was to obtain certain information which the country required. If we are to believe the opinions expressed by gentlemen upon all sides of this Chamber, this is one of the most momentous questions that ever has been presented to the Congress of the United States. Intimations have been given out upon this floor, and at the other end of the Capitol, that the decision of this question might result in precipitating a train of events of the most disastrous character to the welfare of this country. If these expressions of opinion rest upon any well-founded, existing state of facts, it is proper, it is necessary, that the country should know what they are. When a navigator is about to embark upon a voyage, it is important for him to ascertain exactly the point of his departure. If we are about to venture upon a new order of things, let the country and the world know what the facts are upon which that order of things is initiated. Let us know the facts upon which these predictions are made, and upon which this great change, if change there must be, must take place.

There is a wide diversity of opinion as to the existing state of facts in the Territory of Kansas. Allegations have been made of frauds, of corruption, of outrages, of infamy. If these allegations be true, and by our action we indorse what has been done, we become accessories after the fact in the perpetration of these frauds; and it is, therefore, due to ourselves as members of this House; it is due to those people whom we represent here, and who have confided their interests to our hands; it is due to those that are to come after us in this country and throughout the world, that these facts should be obtained in an authoritative form. And, sir, what possible objection can there be to an inquiry into the facts? The truth never harmed anybody. Upon a great public question of this kind there should be a call for information from all the sources from which it can be obtained.

I trust, sir, that no gentleman will desire to precipitate a vote upon the great question that lies at the bottom of this subject of the admission of Kansas, until we have before us all the facts connected with the origin of the constitution of Kansas—facts which have transpired since its formation by the convention—so far as they can affect the question of the propriety of her admission into the Union as a State. I ask for no facts beyond those that are directly pertinent to that question, and those facts I trust that gentlemen are prepared to give us, and to give them to us in an authoritative form.

It is said in some quarters that the object of this movement on my part is to effect delay, to prolong excitement in the country. Sir, it is not to effect delay. It is to hasten the work which we are to do. Who is there that desires to take this fearful leap in the dark, when he can by investigation have facts before him to light his path? I do not propose to recount all that has occurred in the Territory of Kansas. It is no part of my purpose to do it. My own convictions of what has occurred there, and what has not occurred there, do not in this movement that I make affect my action. I have not been there. I am not personally acquainted with the facts. But, sir, I hold in my hand that information which satisfies me that there ought to be investigation. As it can be read by the Clerk much better than by myself, I send it to the Clerk's desk that it may be read. I will state that it is the letter of ex-Secretary Stanton, the late acting Governor of the Territory of Kansas.

Mr. LETCHER. I rise to a question of order. Who is entitled to the floor—the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Grow] or the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS?]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was recognized; and he yielded the floor to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. LETCHER. For explanation of his amendment, as I understand; not for a speech.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Well, sir, I am explaining my amendment.

Mr. LETCHER. I raise the question that the floor cannot be farmed out.

Mr. GROW. To do away with objections, I yield the floor unconditionally to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I propose that the paper sent to the Clerk's desk be read as a part of my remarks, and in this connection, in the same way as if I had read it myself.

Mr. BOCK. Would it be in order for a gentleman to send up a portion of his speech to be read by the Clerk?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. If the point of order is made on me, I ask the Chair to decide the point.

The SPEAKER. A question of order is raised. The gentleman from Illinois proposes to have read a certain paper. According to the practice of the House, the Chair thinks it is in order. According to the Manual, the Chair is of opinion that the leave of the House must be granted. The Chair will follow the practice of the House, and permit the paper to be read, as it comes out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I trust that objection will be withdrawn, that the paper may be read. The gentleman has certainly a right to have it read. We all can see the convenience of it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I am only amazed that the gentleman from Virginia should have made the point.

Mr. LETCHER. What point?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Objecting to reading.

Mr. LETCHER. I did not object to the reading. I objected to your taking the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I hope the paper will be read now.

It was read, as follows:

To the People of the United States.

Having been recently removed from the office of Secretary of Kansas Territory, under circumstances which imply severe censure on the part of the President, and having had no official information of my removal, nor any opportunity for explanation or defense, I have deemed it necessary to present to the people of the United States a brief statement of facts in vindication of my motives, and in explanation of the results of the act for which I have been condemned.

The office in question was not given at my solicitation. My acceptance of it, under all the circumstances, was a proof of strong friendship for the President, and of unbounded confidence in the firmness and faithfulness with which he would adhere to the line of policy deliberately agreed upon between him, his whole Cabinet, and Governor Walker.

On my arrival in the Territory in April last, in advance of Governor Walker, I confess that I had an imperfect knowledge of the real condition of affairs. I supposed the question of slavery to be the only cause of dissension and difficulty among the people; and, in my brief inaugural address of the 17th April, I treated this as the chief subject of difference upon which a submission to the people would be likely to be demanded. I soon found, however, that this view was altogether too limited, and did not reach the true ground of controversy. The great mass of the inhabitants of the Territory were dissatisfied with the local government, and earnestly denied the validity of the existing laws. Asserting that the previous Legislatures had been forced upon them by the fraud and violence of a neighboring people, they proclaimed their determination never to submit to the enactments of legislative bodies, thus believed to be illegitimate and not entitled to obedience.

This was the condition of things when Governor Walker came to the Territory, in the latter part of May. It was evident that the just policy of permitting the people to regulate their own affairs could not be successfully carried out, unless they could be inspired with confidence in the agents of Government through whom this result was to be effected. If a mere minority of the people had been thus dissatisfied and contumacious, they might possibly have been pronounced factious, and treated as disturbers of the peace; but when the dissatisfaction was general, comprising almost the whole people, a more respectful consideration was indispensable to a peaceable adjustment. It was evident that the policy of repression—a rigid attempt to enforce submission without an effort at conciliation—would inevitably result in a renewal of the civil war. With commendable anxiety to avoid this contingency, Governor Walker resolved to go among the people; to listen to their complaints; to give them assurance of a fair and just administration of the territorial government; and to induce them, if possible, to abandon their hostility, and to enter upon the peaceful but decisive struggle of the ballot-box. I was often with the Governor when he addressed the people, and gave my best efforts in aid of the great purpose of conciliation.

It was too late to induce the people to go into the June election for delegates to the convention. The registration required by law had been imperfect in all the counties, and had been wholly omitted in one half of them; nor could the people of these disfranchised counties vote in any adjacent county, as has been falsely suggested. In such of them as subsequently took a census or registry of their own, the delegates chosen were not admitted to seats in the convention. Nevertheless, it is not to be denied that the great central fact, which controlled the whole case, was the utter want of confidence by the people in the whole machinery of the territorial government. They alleged that the local officers, in all instances, were unscrupulous partisans, who had previously defrauded them in the elections, and who were ready to repeat the same outrages again; that, even if intruders from abroad should not be permitted to overpower them, they would be cheated by false returns, which it would not be possible for the Governor and Secretary to defeat. Although, at that time, these apprehensions seemed to me to be preposterous and unfounded, it was impossible to deny the earnestness and sincerity with which they were urged, or to doubt that they were the result of deep convictions, having their origin in some previous experience of that nature.

The worst portion of the small minority in Kansas, who had possession of the territorial organization, loudly and bitterly complained of Governor Walker's policy of conciliation, and demanded the opposite policy of repression. And when, under the solemn assurances given that the elections should be fairly conducted, and no frauds which we could reach be countenanced or tolerated, it had become apparent that the mass of the people were prepared and determined to participate in the October elections, the minority endeavored to defeat the result by reviving the tax qualification for electors, which had been repealed by the previous Legislature. Opinions were obtained from high legal sources, the effect of which, had they prevailed, would have been to exclude the mass of the people from voting, to retain the control in the hands of the minority, and, as a consequence, to keep up agitation, and to render civil war inevitable. But the intrepid resolution of Governor Walker, in spite of fierce opposition and denunciation, far and near, carried him through this dangerous crisis, and he had the proud satisfaction of having achieved a peaceful triumph, by inducing the people to submit to the arbitrament of the ballot-box.

But the minority were determined not to submit to defeat. The populous county of Douglas had been attached to the border county of Johnson, with a large and controlling representation in the Legislature. The celebrated Oxford fraud was perpetrated with a view to obtain majorities in both Houses of the Assembly. When these returns were received at my office, in Governor Walker's absence, I had fully determined not to give certificates based upon them. If they had been so formal and correct as to have made it my duty to certify them, I would have resigned my office in order to testify my sense of the enormity of the wrong. Governor Walker, at Leavenworth, had formed the same resolution, as he stated to me and to several others; and we were both gratified that we found the papers so imperfect as to make it our duty to reject them. Great excitement followed in the Territory. The minority, thus righteously defeated in the effort to prolong their power, became fierce in opposition, and resorted to every means of intimidation. But I am led to believe that they found their most effectual means of operation by undermining us with the Administration at Washington.

The constitutional convention, which had adjourned over until after the October election, met again in Leecompton to resume its labors. Many of the members of that body were bitterly hostile to the Governor and Secretary, on account of their rejection of the Oxford and McGee frauds, in which some of the members and officers of the convention had a direct participation. In fact, this body, with some honorable exceptions, well represented the minority party in the Territory, and were fully imbued with the same spirit and designs. It was obviously not their desire to secure to the real people of Kansas the control of their own affairs. In the constitution, soon afterwards adopted, they endeavored to supersede the Legislature which had been elected by the people, by providing, in the second section of the schedule, that "all laws now of force in the Territory shall continue to be of force until altered, amended, or repealed by a Legislature under the provisions of this constitution." They provided still more effectually, as they supposed, for the perpetuation of their minority government, by adopting the Oxford fraud as the basis of their apportionment, giving a great preponderance of representation to the counties on the Missouri border, and affording, at the same time, every possible facility for the introduction of spurious votes. The president of the convention was clothed with unlimited power in conducting the elections and receiving the returns, while the officers are not required to take the usual oath to secure fair and honest dealing. The elections were hurried on in midwinter—the 21st of December and the 4th of January—when emigrants could come only from the immediate borders, under the qualification which invited to the ballot-box every white male inhabitant "in the Territory on that day." The same men who did this had previously denounced Governor Walker for the suggestion in his inaugural address, and in his Topeka speech, that the constitution should be submitted to all the bona fide inhabitants, although he invariably stated, when asked for explanation, that some reasonable length of residence ought to be required as evidence of the bona fide character of inhabitants.

It was apparent that all the machinery had been artfully prepared for a repetition of gross frauds, similar to those which had been attempted in October; and it was in view of all these facts, after the adjournment of the convention, that the people of the Territory, by an almost unanimous demand, called upon me, as the acting Governor, to convene an extra session of the Legislature, in order to enable them peaceably to protect themselves against the wrongs evidently contemplated by the adoption of this constitution. There was no law to punish frauds in election returns. The people were intensely excited; and it was the opinion of the coolest men in the Territory that, without a call of the Legislature, the elections under the constitution could not have taken place without collision and bloodshed. The meeting of the Legislature diverted the attention of the people from the schemes of violence upon which they were brooding, substituted the excitement of debate and investigation for that of fierce and warlike hatred, and enabled their representatives to devise means for counteracting the wrongs which they justly apprehended.

Recent events have shown that their apprehensions were well founded. Enormous frauds have been perpetrated at the precincts of Oxford, Shawnee, and Kickapoo; and it may well be believed that this result was actually designed by the artful leaders who devised the plan and framework of the Leecompton constitution. I have lately been at Shawnee, and I have seen and conversed with persons who were at Oxford on the day of election. The frauds committed are notorious; and though dishonest persons may deny them, and may fill the channels of public information with shameless representations to the contrary, they can be easily established beyond all controversy.

It was to enable the people to shield themselves from these frauds, and to give legal expression to their hatred and rejection of the instrument which permitted them, and was to be carried by them, that I called the Legislature together.

In my judgment the people had a fair claim to be heard on this subject through their Legislature. The organic act confided to me the discretion of convening that body in extra session. The President of the United States had no rightful authority to exercise that discretion for me. He had the power of removal, and such control as that power gives him. But I would cheerfully have submitted to removal, and consequent loss of favor with the President, rather than occupy the position of Governor, and refuse to the people an opportunity to assert their most essential rights and to protect themselves against the basest frauds and wrongs ever attempted upon an outraged community.

Not having been informed of the grounds of my removal, I know them only through the newspaper reports, to the effect that, in calling the Legislature, I disobeyed the instructions of the President. I had no instructions bearing on the subject, and there was no time to obtain them, even if I had felt bound to substitute the President's will for that discretion which the organic act confided to me. The convening of the Legislature undoubtedly prevented difficulty and secured peace. Were it important, I am confident I could establish this position by the most indubitable facts; but it is sufficient now to say that the peace of the Territory was not, in fact, disturbed, and whatever approaches were made towards such a result were wholly attributable to the policy of the Administration in censuring my acts and removing me from office.

The measure for which I have been unjustly condemned has enabled the people of Kansas to make known their real will in regard to the Leecompton constitution. This affords the Democratic party an opportunity to defend the true principles of constitutional liberty, and to save itself from disastrous division and utter overthrow. If Congress will heed the voice of the people, and not force upon them a government which they have rejected by a vote of four to one, the whole country will be satisfied, and Kansas will quietly settle her own affairs, without the least difficulty, and without any danger to the Confederacy. The southern States, which are supposed to have a deep interest in the matter, will be saved from the supreme folly of standing up in defense of so wicked and dishonest a contrivance as the Leecompton constitution. The moral power of their position will not be weakened by a vain and useless defense of wrong, when it is perfectly certain they will gain nothing even by success in the present attempt.

The extra session of the Kansas Legislature has done good, also, by giving means to expose and punish the monstrous frauds which have been perpetrated, and doubtless, also, by preventing others which would have been attempted. It has driven the guilty miscreants engaged in them to become fugitives from justice, and has rendered it impossible for the peace of the Territory hereafter to be endangered by similar occurrences.

In view of these facts and results, I willingly accept the rebuke conveyed in my peremptory dismissal from office, but I appeal to the deliberate judgment of the people to determine whether I have not chosen the only honorable course which the circumstances allowed me to pursue.

FRED. P. STANTON.

WASHINGTON, January 29, 1858.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. In addition to the statement made by ex-acting Governor STANTON, just read, I might read the statement made by ex-Governor Walker, of a like character and import. It is quite remarkable that there should be such a diversity of opinion between those who have exercised executive functions in the Territory of Kansas, and the national Executive from whom they derived their appointment. There seems to be a direct issue of fact raised between those functionaries; and while there is such a difference of opinion there, how can it be that the people of this country can be supposed to be united on such questions? Now I hold that it is demanded by every consideration that can influence men on whom great responsibilities rest, to obtain the best information they can on the subject; and it was to promote such important public ends that I offered my resolution the other day.

I wish now, not being disposed to occupy any time unnecessarily, to withdraw the amendment which I offered to the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HUGHES,] and now I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair. I desire to be informed whether, under the rules of the House, I can move my amendment as a distinct substantial proposition? The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS,] moved to refer the message to the Committee on Territories. That is a distinct, independent motion. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HUGHES,] moved to refer it to a select committee of thirteen; not as an amendment, but as a separate, independent proposition. Under the rules, the motion to refer to the Committee on Territories would take precedence. My inquiry now is, whether there can be more than two distinct propositions of reference pending at the same time on the one question? I do not desire to move my resolution as an amendment to that of the gentleman from Indiana. I understand that the practice of the House has been, in regard to the appointment of committees under such resolutions, different. For instance, if I should move to strike out of the resolution all except the word "Resolved," I suppose the Speaker would give the position of chairman of that committee to the gentleman who originated the resolution.

I state, sir, without any reserve or concealment, what are the objects I have in view. If my resolution is adopted, it will be a different resolution from that offered by the gentleman from Indiana; yet, if it is adopted as an amendment to that resolution, under the parliamentary practice, the Speaker would appoint the gentleman from Indiana chairman of the committee. It is true, the practice of the House in the last Congress has been both ways. But, in order to relieve the Speaker from any embarrassment on the subject, I desire to submit my proposition as an independent proposition. I do not know whether it can be entertained as such; but, for the purpose of obtaining a decision upon it, I now withdraw my amendment, and submit the following as an independent proposition:

Resolved, That the message of the President concerning the constitution framed at Leecompton, in the Territory of Kansas, by a convention of delegates therein, and the papers accompanying the same, be referred to a select committee of fifteen, to be appointed by the Speaker. That said committee be instructed to inquire into all the facts connected with the formation of said constitution and the laws under which the same was originated, and into all such facts and proceedings as have transpired since the formation of said constitution, having relation to the question or propriety of the admission of said Territory into the Union under said constitution, and whether the same is acceptable and satisfactory to a majority of the legal voters of Kansas. And that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, if it is in order to present that resolution as an original proposition?

THE SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The Chair is of the opinion that the gentleman can only accomplish his purpose by moving his amendment as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana. The following is the rule upon which the Chair bases his decision:

"47. When a resolution shall be offered, or a motion made, to refer any subject, and different committees shall be proposed, the question shall be taken in the following order:

"The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; the Committee of the Whole House; a standing committee; a select committee."

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I supposed that would be the ruling of the Chair. I presented the resolution in this form in order that I might understand precisely the ground on which I stood. I do not find fault with the ruling of the Chair, because I believe it is correct. At the same time, when the gentleman from Indiana moves a resolution to refer the matter to a select committee of thirteen, stating at the same time that he did it supposing that was the motion I asked the floor to make, placing himself in the position, by the practice under parliamentary usage, to be placed at the head of that committee, I regret the position in which the matter stands.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. The gentleman from Indiana, at the time he made his motion, disclaimed any desire or intention on his part to be chairman of that committee.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I had forgotten the fact the gentleman states. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion. I did not intend to do the gentleman from Indiana injustice. The matter referred to had for the moment escaped my recollection.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take up the time of the House any further. I believe the House is as ready to vote now as they will be at any future time, and I therefore move the resolution which has been read as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, and call for the previous question.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I hope the gentleman does not propose to press the House to a vote this evening.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I cannot withdraw the demand for the previous question. I hope the House will come to a vote without further delay.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I hope the demand will be voted down. I state, candidly, that motion is one which I hope will not be adopted; and if it is to receive the concurrence of a majority of the House, I hope they will at least allow us to state our objections to it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I cannot withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I wish to make one suggestion. If the previous question is to be applied to the motion, I hope the vote will not be taken this evening. Let it go over until morning.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I hope the vote will be taken this evening.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move a call of the House.

Mr. CLINGMAN, (at ten minutes past four o'clock.) I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BOYCE. I move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 80, nays 120; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bowie, Boyce, Bryan, Burnett, Caskie, John B. So the House refused to adjourn over.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. TAPPAN stated that Mr. CRAGIN, who was ill, had paired off with Mr. BRANCH.

Mr. MORGAN stated that Mr. THOMPSON had paired off with Mr. TALBOT, who was indisposed.

The question then recurred on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. SAVAGE. I ask the gentleman from North Carolina to withdraw his motion to adjourn, to allow me to ask the unanimous consent of the House to have the bill which I presented the other day printed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, objected.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 95, nays 112; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Biscock, Bowie, Boyce, Bryan, Burnett, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Dowdell, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gihner, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Hatch, Hawkins, Hill, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jewett, George W. NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Andrews, Bennett, Bilinghurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burns, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—112.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurred upon the motion that there be a call of the House.

Mr. PHELPS demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the House take a recess until half past seven this evening.

The SPEAKER. A motion to take a recess is not in order.

Mr. BISHOP. I move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn until Monday next.

The yeas and nays were demanded.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called for tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CLINGMAN and CLEMENS were appointed.

The House was divided; and the tellers reported—yeas fifty-five.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. REILLY. I move to amend the motion by striking out "Monday," and inserting "Tuesday."

Mr. FLORENCE. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CLINGMAN. We are getting into a snarl, and I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The motion of the gentleman from North Carolina is not in order.

Mr. REILLY. I withdraw my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can withdraw it only by unanimous consent.

Mr. FLORENCE. I object.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from North Carolina cannot now be entertained. Two other motions have precedence.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think this whole matter may be compromised, and I will make a proposition to gentlemen upon the other side of the House. It is, that the several motions to adjourn and to adjourn over be withdrawn, and that we come to a direct vote upon the resolution offered by the gentleman from Georgia, and the pending amendment. [Laughter.]

The question recurred on the motion to substitute "Tuesday" for "Monday."

Mr. STANTON. I rise to a question of order. There is a motion pending that when this House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next. Then there is a motion to strike out "Monday" and insert "Tuesday." My point is, that the motion to adjourn until Monday is not in order, for the reason that that motion has been once voted down to-day, and, therefore, the amendment depending on that motion is not in order. I do not know any better time to experiment than the present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order raised by the gentleman from Ohio, and states that the uniform practice of the House has been to entertain the motion at any time; and the gentleman from Ohio himself, only three or four days ago, appealed from a decision of the Chair on this same point. The House sustained the Chair, and held that the motion was in order.

Mr. STANTON. We have not much to do, now; and I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, and upon that appeal call the yeas and nays.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. KEITT. I demand the yeas and nays upon the motion to lay the appeal on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COBB. I ask to be excused from voting on the motion to lay the appeal on the table; and upon that request I ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. GROW. I call for tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and DAVIS of Mississippi, were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—yeas 50, nays 69.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRIPPE. I would like to inquire upon how many questions the yeas and nays have been ordered, and are now pending?

The SPEAKER. Only five.

Mr. TRIPPE. And how many motions are pending upon which the yeas and nays have not been ordered?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot tell.

Mr. TRIPPE. Is not a motion to adjourn in order? If it is, I make it.

The SPEAKER. A motion to adjourn is already pending.

Mr. TRIPPE. I thought it was a resolution to adjourn over.

Mr. SEWARD. Is it in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The Chair will entertain the motion to adjourn.

Mr. TRIPPE. Then I make that motion.

Mr. GROW. I rise to a point of order. There was a motion made to adjourn. Some gentleman then moved that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next. An amendment was moved to insert "Tuesday" in the place of "Monday." Now, by the rules, the motion to adjourn over takes precedence of the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair entertains the motion to adjourn because of incidental questions arising. The House will perceive that the House will soon put itself into the position that it cannot adjourn unless the Chair so rules.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not appeal from that decision.

The yeas and nays were demanded and ordered upon the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 92, nays 106; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Biscock, Bowie, Boyce, Bryan, Burnett, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clay, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dowdell, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gihner, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Hatch, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Huyler, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Andrews, Bennett, Bilinghurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burns, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—106.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Pending the call,

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, stated that he had paired off with Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia.

Mr. COVODE stated that Mr. DICK had paired off with Mr. HAWKINS.

Mr. HAWKINS stated that he had paired off with Mr. DICK.

The question recurred on the motion to excuse Mr. COBB from voting, upon which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

Mr. MOORE, (at ten minutes after five o'clock, p. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order, no business having been transacted since a similar motion was voted down.

Mr. HOUSTON. Have the yeas and nays been called for on the motion to excuse my colleague?

The SPEAKER. They have been ordered.

Mr. HOUSTON. This is a very important question, and I move that there be a call of the House, in order that we may have a full vote on this momentous issue.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Well, I suppose we had better have the yeas and nays upon that motion.

Mr. KEITT. I ask for tellers on the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] is not in order; there is a motion for a call of the House already pending.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is true; but this is a very important issue which has been presented to the House since the motion for a call of the House has been smothered up.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I call the gentleman from Alabama to order.

Mr. LETCHER. What proposition is it that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Cobb] wants to be excused from voting on?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Stanton] appealed from the decision of the Chair. A gentleman on the left moved to lay the appeal upon the table. Pending that question, the gentleman from Alabama moved that he be excused from voting upon the motion to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, sir, if it be in order, I move to be excused from voting upon that question.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. LETCHER. Let us have this question decided first.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Letcher] is upon the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I desire to know whether the motion of the gentleman from Virginia is entertained?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain it. Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Then I raise the point of order that motions cannot be cumulated in this way; and I appeal from the decision of the Chair entertaining the motion. It may be important to have the practice established upon this point.

Mr. COLFAX. It may be very important hereafter.

Mr. LETCHER. I move to lay the appeal upon the table; and on that motion I ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, (at fifteen minutes after five o'clock, p. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GROW. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. KEITT. I renew the motion.

Mr. COMINS. I call for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to make an inquiry. Would it be in order to move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet in the old Hall? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Well, if it would be in order, I would make that motion, and make it in good faith. I think a majority of this House are about ready to go back to the old Hall. I think they are satisfied with this experiment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the motion is not in order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Well, I will make it when it is in order.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 71, nays 92; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Bowie, Bryan, Caskie, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, James Craig, Burton, Craig, Crawford, Davis of Mississippi, Dowdell, Eustis, Florence, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilmer, Greenwood, Hatch, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jewett, George W. Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Leidy, Letcher, Maclean, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Miles, Milton, Moore, Niblack, Peyton, Phelps, Powell, Quitman, Reagan, Ricard, Ruffin, Russell, Sandage, Savage, Seales, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Miles Taylor, Tripp, Underwood, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Woodson, Wortendyke, and Zollcoffer—71.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burns, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Curtis, Damrell, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dodd, Durfee, English, Farnsworth, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Gregg, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harian, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hickman, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, McKibbin, Samuel S. Marshall, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Olin, Palmer, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Reilly, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Waiton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—92.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. KEITT, when his name was called, said: I wish to ask the House to suspend the call at this point and let me introduce a resolution.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. KEITT. I vote "ay." We want a clerk for my committee, and I wanted the House to suspend the call and authorize us to employ one.

Mr. GARNETT stated that Mr. STEVENSON had paired off with Mr. GROESBECK.

Mr. ADRAIN stated that he had paired off with Mr. STEWART, of Maryland.

The question recurred upon Mr. LETCHER's motion to lay Mr. SHERMAN's appeal upon the table.

Mr. KEITT. Is that question debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I withdraw the appeal. Let the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House.

Mr. KEITT. Is the question now debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. KEITT. Is it not in order to ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Letcher] his reason for wishing to be excused from voting?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. HUGHES. I offer the resolution which I send to the Chair.

Mr. ENGLISH. I object.

Mr. HUGHES. It is a privileged question.

Mr. STANTON. I object to the reading of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is objected to.

Mr. HUGHES. It is a privileged question.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman says he rises to a privileged question; and if that is so, we ought to hear what it is.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. He can state what it is.

Mr. HOUSTON. If it be read, we can see at once whether it is privileged or not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that no privileged question can intervene at this time. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Letcher] that he be excused from voting on the motion to excuse the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Cobb] from voting. [Laughter.]

Mr. LETCHER. Upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. RICAUD. I move that there be a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order, inasmuch as there is a motion for a call of the House already pending.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GARNETT. I ask to be excused from voting upon the motion that my colleague be excused from voting?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I raise the point of order again whether motions of this kind can be cumulated in this way after a call for the previous question?

Mr. BURNETT. I call the gentleman from Ohio to order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has risen to a question of order. The Chair is of the opinion that, under the rules of the House, whatever may be the result, it is competent for the gentleman to make the request; the rule allows any gentleman to ask to be excused from voting upon any proposition.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think we have got the questions a good deal complicated; and I move that the House do now adjourn, in order that we may investigate and see where we stand.

Mr. ENGLISH. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KEITT. I ask the House to excuse me from voting on the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain the motion.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I desire to make an inquiry. Is it in order now to renew my proposition to compromise this whole matter by coming to a direct vote? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion to adjourn, the Chair thinks it would hardly be in order.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 72, nays 93; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bowie, Bryan, Burnett, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Burton, Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Mississippi, Dowdell, Florence, Garnett, Gartrell, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Leidy, Letcher, Maclean, McQueen, Maynard, Miles, Millson, Moore, Niblack, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Ricard, Ruffin, Russell, Savage, Seales, Henry M. Shaw, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, Stephens, Miles Taylor, Underwood, Warren, Watkins, Woodson, Wortendyke, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—72.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Arnold, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dodd, Durfee, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hickman, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, McKibbin, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Waiton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—93.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Pending the vote,

Mr. ADRAIN stated that he had paired off with Mr. STEWART, of Maryland.

Mr. DAMRELL stated that he had paired off with Mr. TAYLOR, of New York.

Mr. GARNETT stated that Mr. EUSTIS had paired off, till twelve o'clock to-morrow, with Mr. MURRAY.

Mr. CLEMENS stated that Mr. FAULKNER had paired off with a gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEITT stated that he took it for granted that Mr. GILLIS had paired off with somebody.

Mr. STEWART, of Pennsylvania, stated that he had paired off with Mr. WHITE.

Mr. SINGLETON stated that Mr. WARD had paired off with Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois.

The question recurred on [Mr. GARNETT's] motion to be excused from voting on Mr. LETCHER's motion to be excused from voting on Mr. COBB's motion to be excused from voting on the motion to lay on the table Mr. STANTON's appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. GARNETT called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WASHBURN of Illinois, and TRIPPE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayeas forty-nine.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN], if he took an appeal from the decision of the Chair in entertaining the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia to be excused from voting?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I am satisfied with the decision of the Chair.

Mr. STANTON. I think it would be well enough to settle that question by a recorded vote; and I will take an appeal from the decision of the Chair. It may be useful for future reference.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I move to lay the appeal on the table; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I desire to submit a proposition as a sort of compromise. It is that all these propositions should be withdrawn, and that we come to a direct vote on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS.]

The SPEAKER. It is not in order.

Mr. WARREN, (at five minutes past six, p.

m.) I move that the House do now adjourn; and on that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HARRIS of Illinois, and SAVAGE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes sixty.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 70, nays 96; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bowie, Bryan, Burnett, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochrane, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Mississippi, Dowdell, Edmundson, Florence, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Greenwood, Gregg, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jewett, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Jacob M. Kunkel, Landy, Leidy, Letcher, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Moore, Niblack, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Ruffin, Russell, Savage, Scales, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, Stephens, Trippé, White, Whiteley, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—70.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Curtis, Davis of Iowa, Dean, Dewart, Dodd, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Hickman, Hoard, Howard, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Reilly, Ricand, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—96.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurred on Mr. PHILLIPS's motion to lay on the table Mr. STANTON's appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. WARREN. I was going to remark that I thought I was rising to a question of privilege. At any rate I regard this as the most appropriate period of the session to make the motion. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the motion is not in order.

Mr. SEWARD. I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. That motion is already pending.

Mr. KEITT. I ask to be excused from voting on the motion to lay the appeal upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Keitt] is hardly in order, as it involves the very point on which the appeal is taken.

Mr. LEITER. Would it be in order to move to excuse all those members from voting?

The SPEAKER. Not upon one motion.

Mr. TRIPPE. I move that there be a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. That motion is already pending.

Mr. TRIPPE. I appeal from the decision of the Chair. Can I be heard on the appeal?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. There is already one appeal from the decision of the Chair pending.

Mr. GILLIS. Is it in order to make a motion now to adjourn till Monday next?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. That motion is pending, and cannot be reached.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a few remarks.

Mr. COX. I object.

Mr. STANTON asked for the yeas and nays on Mr. PHILLIPS's motion to lay the appeal on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WARREN. I rise to a question of privilege. I am sincere about it. Would not a motion to proceed to the business on the Private Calendar take precedence of anything else?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. WARREN. Then I desire to ask another question. I desire to ask whether, after the suggestion made over the way, it would not be legitimate for this side of the House to decline voting?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. FOSTER. I would inquire if it would be in order to take any steps to employ a photographer or other competent artist to perpetuate this scene?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would be hardly in order at this time.

Mr. MAYNARD. This is a question involving very grave interests. I do not wish to vote on it to-night. I therefore move that the House do now [ten minutes before seven, p. m.] adjourn.

Mr. GROW. I raise the point of order, that no business has transpired since the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been ordered since, on the motion to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. DEAN called for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. PHELPS called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SCALES and BUFFINTON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes sixty-seven.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 74, nays 99; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bowie, Bryan, Burnett, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Mississippi, Dowdell, Edmundson, Florence, Gartrell, Gillis, Greenwood, Gregg, Hatch, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Jackson, Jewett, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Letcher, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Millson, Moore, Niblack, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Ruffin, Russell, Savage, Scales, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Trippé, Underwood, Warren, Watkins, Whiteley, Woodson, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—74.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dodd, Durfee, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hickman, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, McKibbin, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Reilly, Ricand, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—99.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Pending the vote,

Mr. HUGHES stated that Mr. Bisnor had requested him to say that his wife was unwell, and he was therefore absent from the House.

The question then recurred on the motion to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. KEITT. I wish at this point to make an inquiry of the Chair. My inquiry is this: if the House decides that the gentleman from Virginia has not a right to ask to be excused do they not violate the 42d rule? which I ask to have read. Would not such a decision declare that no member can ask to be excused from voting? I ask that the 42d rule may be read.

The rule was read, as follows:

"42. Every member who shall be in the House when the question is put shall give his vote, unless the House, for special reason, shall excuse him. All motions to excuse a member from voting shall be made before the House divides, or before the call of the yeas and nays is commenced; and the question shall then be taken without further debate."

Mr. GROW. Can two questions of order be pending at the same time? There is one question of order pending upon which the House is now deciding. I submit that the gentleman from South Carolina cannot raise another.

Mr. STANTON. I did not understand the gentleman from South Carolina as making an additional point. The gentleman had the rule read with reference to the question already pending.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understood the gentleman.

Mr. KEITT. I rose to make this inquiry of the Chair: whether, if the decision of the Chair was overruled, it would not violate what is the settled rule and practice of the House, and be equivalent to a denial of the right of a member to ask to be excused from voting?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 150, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Ahl, Andrews, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bowie, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burnett, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Caskie, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dowdell, Durfee, Edmundson, Farnsworth, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Foster, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilman, Gooch, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Greenwood, Gregg, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Hatch, Hickman, Hill, Hoard, Hopkins, Horton, Houston, Howard, Hughes, Jackson, Jewett, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kellogg, Kelly, Kilgore, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, Landy, Leach, Leiter, Letcher, MacLay, McKibbin, McQueen, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Purviance, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Robbins, Royce, Ruffin, Russell, Savage, Scales, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, Stallworth, Stanton, Stephens, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Waldron, Walton, Warren, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Watkins, Whiteley, Wilson, Wood, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—150.

NAYS—Messrs. Bennett, Bliss, Clingman, Dodd, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Owen Jones, Lovejoy, Isaac N. Morris, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Roberts, Robert Smith, Thompson, Underwood, Wade, and Zollcoffer—19.

So the appeal was laid upon the table.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. RUFFIN stated that Mr. DAVIDSON, being quite unwell, had paired off with Mr. RITCHIE.

The question then recurred upon the motion to excuse Mr. GARNETT from voting; upon which the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KEITT, (at twenty minutes before eight o'clock.) I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. FLORENCE. Is it in order to amend that motion by moving that when the House adjourns it adjourn until Monday next?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, inasmuch as the motion to adjourn over is already pending.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I desire to know how long it will take to have the yeas and nays called upon all the motions pending.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it will take about four hours. The yeas and nays have still to be called on seven different propositions.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then I rise to a question of privilege. I desire to make a personal explanation. I will be very brief.

Mr. HUGHES. I object.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I demand the yeas and nays upon the motion to adjourn.

Mr. DEAN. I demand tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. DEAN, and SMITH of Tennessee, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported fifty-six in the affirmative.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 58, nays 98; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Avery, Bowie, Burnett, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochrane, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Dowdell, Florence, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Gregg, Hatch, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jewett, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Leidy, Letcher, MacLay, McQueen, Mason, Maynard, Millson, Moore, Niblack, Phelps, Phillips, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Ruffin, Russell, Scales, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, Trippé, Warren, Watkins, White, Whiteley, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—58.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dodd, Durfee, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hickman, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, McKibbin, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Reilly, Ricand, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, Wood, and Wortendyke—98.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. POTTLE stated that Mr. KELSEY, being unwell, had paired off with Mr. UNDERWOOD.

Mr. COX stated that he had paired off with Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri.

Mr. DICK stated that he had paired off with Mr. HAWKINS.

The question again recurred on excusing Mr. GARNETT from voting.

Mr. HUGHES. I move there be a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the motion is not in order, inasmuch as the motion is already pending.

Mr. MILES. I ask to be excused from voting on the motion to excuse the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GARNETT;] and on that motion call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 98, nays 50; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bowie, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dean, Dodd, Durfee, Edmundson, Farnsworth, Foster, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Greenwood, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Horton, Houston, Howard, Hughes, Jackson, J. Glancy Jones, Kellogg, Kelly, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Lovejoy, Macley, Mason, Miles, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Oliver A. Morse, Niblack, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Phillips, Pike, Pottle, Purviance, Reagan, Reilly, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Ruffin, Russell, Savage, Scales, Aaron Shaw, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stephens, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Ellihu B. Washburne, and Israel Washburn—98.

NAYS—Messrs. Bennett, Billingshurst, Burnett, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, Cox, Burton Craige, Crawford, Dawes, Dewart, Dowdell, English, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Gilman, Lawrence W. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Hickman, Hill, Hopkins, Owen Jones, Keitt, Lamar, McKibbin, McQueen, Maynard, Millson, Montgomery, Moore, Mott, Potter, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ricard, Russell, Shorter, Sickles, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, Thayer, Whiteley, Woodson, and Zollcoffer—50.

So Mr. MILES was excused from voting on the motion to excuse Mr. GARNETT.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. BURNETT said: I rise to a question of order. I submit that the gentlemen from South Carolina [Mr. MILES] has no right to vote. The rule prescribes that a member shall not vote upon any question in which he is directly interested. The gentleman from South Carolina has voted upon this question, in which he is directly interested. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the rule has reference only to a pecuniary interest.

Mr. OLIN stated that Mr. GILMER had been obliged to leave the House, in consequence of indisposition.

Mr. MILES. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to withdraw my vote.

Mr. HUGHES. I object.

Mr. WARREN. I ask to record my vote. I was not within the bar when my name was called. Objection was made.

The question then recurred upon the motion that Mr. GARNETT be excused from voting.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which Mr. MILES was excused; and I would ask whether that motion is debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable.

Mr. HUGHES. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I demand the yeas and nays upon that motion.

Mr. CLEMENS. I ask for tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CLEMENS and WALDRON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported thirty-seven in the affirmative and none in the negative.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. As there seems to be no quorum present, I move that there be a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary that there should be a quorum to order the yeas and nays.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. How does the Speaker know that there is a quorum in the House?

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary at this time for the Chair to ascertain that fact.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. One fifth of a quorum have not voted for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. More than one fifth of a quorum have voted. The Chair decides that the yeas and nays are ordered.

Mr. WARREN. It is with great pleasure that I generally concur with the Speaker in all his decisions. But, sir, I must appeal from this decision; and I ask the yeas and nays upon the appeal. I dislike very much to do it, but upon this occasion I must take an appeal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this is a very good time to stop appeals, inasmuch as there is one pending already.

Mr. WARREN. I am very much obliged to the Chair. I took the appeal very reluctantly.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 106, nays 52, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Arnold, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bowie, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burnett, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Deau, Dewart, Durfee, English, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Gilman, Goode, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Gregg, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Hickman, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Huyler, Kellogg, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leach, Leiter, Letcher, Lovejoy, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Niblack, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Ruffin, Savage, Scales, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Stallworth, Stephens, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, Tappan, Tompkins, Tripe, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, White, Wilson, and Wood—106.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Bryan, Burns, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Burton Craige, Crawford, Dowdell, Edmundson, Farnsworth, Florence, Gartrell, Gillis, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Jackson, Jewett, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Kelsey, Lamar, Landy, Macley, McQueen, Mason, Maynard, Moore, Isaac N. Morris, Peyton, Phillips, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ricard, Russell, Shorter, Sickles, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, Thayer, Whiteley, Woodson, and Zollcoffer—52.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. WARREN stated that Mr. GREENWOOD, being indisposed, had left the Hall, and had paired off with Mr. PETTIT.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois, stated that he had paired off with Mr. WARD.

The question recurred upon the motion to excuse Mr. GARNETT from voting.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the gentleman from North Carolina to withdraw his motion for a moment, while I make a proposition which I apprehend will meet the approbation of the whole House.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I will hear the proposition of the gentleman.

Mr. WARREN. It is this. We have been talking about Kansas very unprofitably, and I now move that we talk about Ar-Kansas. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the subject is hardly in order now.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Gentlemen upon that side of the House must be very anxious to get a vote upon the President's message, and I hope that we may hear any proposition to that end, and—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion to adjourn; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 74, nays 95; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Boccock, Bowie, Bryan, Burnett, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Davis of Mississippi, Dowdell, Edmundson, Florence, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Gregg, Hatch, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jewett, J. Glancy Jones, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Leidy, Letcher, Macley, McQueen, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Moore, Niblack, Peyton, Phelps, Powell, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Ruffin, Russell, Savage, Scales, Scott, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, Tripe, Warren, Watkins, White, Woodson, Wortendyke, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—74.

NAYS—Messrs. Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, English, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Reilly, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—95.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question then recurred on the motion of Mr. GARNETT to be excused from voting on the motion of Mr. COBB to be excused from voting on the motion of Mr. SEWARD to lay on the table the appeal of Mr. STANTON from the decision of the Chair ruling in order the motion of Mr. BISHOP that when the House adjourns it adjourn to Monday next, upon which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

Mr. WARREN. Being peculiarly situated in this behalf, I move to be excused from voting upon the question; and upon it I demand the yeas and nays. I dislike to make a request of that sort.

Mr. LEITER. Would it be in order to move to hith on the balance of those who want to be excused?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. ENGLISH. I call for tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ENGLISH, and CRAIGE of North Carolina, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes thirty-seven, noes none.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays are ordered.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a question of order. There was no quorum voting.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I ask the unanimous consent of the other side of the House to allow me to speak for one hour. I think my personal popularity is such that they will grant my request. [Cries of "Object!" "Object!"]

Mr. SEWARD. Did the Chair decide my point of order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decided that a sufficient number voted for the yeas and nays, to entitle them to be taken.

Mr. SEWARD. But no quorum voted.

The SPEAKER. It requires only one fifth of the members present.

Mr. SEWARD. How does the Chair know that one fifth of those present voted?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is governed by the vote taken.

The question was then taken; and there were—yeas 72, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Arnold, Bennett, Bingham, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Case, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Comins, Covode, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edmundson, Fenton, Foster, Gilman, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hoard, Hopkins, Horton, Howard, Jewett, Kellogg, Kilgore, Knapp, Leiter, Lovejoy, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Oliver A. Morse, Niblack, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pike, Pottle, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Russell, Seward, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, and Wilson—72.

NAYS—Messrs. Billingshurst, Blair, Burlingame, Burroughs, Chaffee, Clemens, Cockerill, Colfax, Cox, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dewart, English, Foley, Goode, Kelly, John C. Kunkel, Leach, Maynard, Montgomery, Freeman H. Morse, Mott, Potter, Purviance, Reilly, Savage, Aaron Shaw, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, and Wood—31.

No quorum voted.

Pending the call,

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, stated that he had paired off with Mr. DAMRELL.

Mr. CLINGMAN. As a quorum has not voted, no motion is in order but a motion to adjourn. I therefore move that the House adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 13, nays 96; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Bowie, Caskie, Clingman, Goode, Gregg, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Jewett, Kelly, Niblack, and Savage—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, English, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Gilman, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, McKibbin, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward

Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Reilly, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—96.

No quorum voting.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I move a call of the House.

Mr. PHELPS. I would inquire of the Chair whether there is not such a motion now pending?

The SPEAKER, (Mr. Bocoek in the chair.) There is.

Mr. PHELPS. Will the Chair entertain another motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He will.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. We have that power under the Constitution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will read a clause of the Constitution which, of itself, will be a sufficient reason for the decision of the Chair:

"Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide."

The rule of the House is:

"No member shall absent himself from the service of the House unless he have leave, or be sick, or unable to attend."

The House will see that in the complication of motions which now exist, if there was not the power to call the House, and a majority of members should choose to absent themselves, when we meet to-morrow the same complication of motions would exist, and if there was no motion to call the House, the members who might be in attendance would lose their constitutional right to compel the attendance of absentees. The Constitution gives the right over and above the rules of the House. The Chair will entertain the motion.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. COMINS. I demand the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SAVAGE. I move to be excused from voting upon the motion to adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. For the same reason that the Chair has given—the right of a majority to compel the attendance of absent members—I hold that, under the present state of the case, a motion to adjourn is not in order, for it tends to defeat that right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order, because the Constitution gives the majority the right to adjourn or to compel the attendance of absent members as they may think proper.

Mr. SAVAGE. I move to be excused from voting upon the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will not entertain the motion; because there is not a quorum present, and less than a quorum cannot excuse a member.

Mr. WARREN. I desire, before the question is put, to propound a question. In the event that a quorum should not vote on the motion to adjourn, what will be the result?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the House vote not to adjourn, the question will recur on the motion that there be a call of the House.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 15, nays 96; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bowie, Caskie, Edmundson, Goode, Gregg, Houston, Hughes, Jenkins, Jewett, Kelly, Letcher, Niblack, Phillips, and Henry M. Shaw—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Curtis, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Foley, Foster, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hickman, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, McKibbin, Montgomery, Morgan, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Reilly, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—96.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurred on the motion that there be a call of the House, on which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I desire to propound a question to the Chair. If a call of the House be refused, what will be done then?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will decide that question when a call of the House is refused.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I rise to a question of order. I wish to appeal to the opposition members here to give up their factious opposition, and allow us to come to a vote on the question. [Loud cries of "Order!"]

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 142, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Ahl, Anderson, Andrews, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bishop, Blair, Bliss, Bowie, Boyce, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Caskie, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craig, Crawford, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewar, Dick, Dimmick, Dodd, Durfee, Elliott, English, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Foster, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Hickman, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Hughes, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, McQueen, Maynard, Miles, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Niblack, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Quitman, Reilly, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Rufin, Russell, Scott, Seward, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Sickles, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, Siallworth, Stanton, Stephens, Stevenson, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Trippe, Wade, Waldron, Walton, Warren, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Watkins, Wilson, Wood, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—142.

NAYS—Messrs. Clingman, Edmundson, Goode, Gregg, Groesbeck, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Haylor, Jackson, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Macay, McKibbin, Mason, Montgomery, Moore, Peyton, and Seales—19.

So it was ordered that there be a call of the House.

Mr. HUGHES. Is it in order to move a reconsideration of that vote?

Mr. WARREN. I apprehend that a motion to adjourn is in order now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is in order. [Cries of "No! No!" and "Let us have a call!"]

Mr. WARREN, (at half past eleven o'clock, p. m.) I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. DEAN. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WARREN. At the suggestion of my friends, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a few remarks.

[Loud cries of "Go on!" and "Leave!" "Leave!"]

Mr. DEAN. I object.

The roll was then called; and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Adrain, Bonham, Branch, Burnett, Caruthers, Caskie, Horace F. Clark, Corning, Cragin, Curry, Damrell, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Edie, Eustis, Farnsworth, Giddings, Gilmer, Greenwood, J. Morrison Harris, Jenkins, George W. Jones, Kelly, Kelsey, Knapp, Landy, Lawrence, Letcher, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Matteson, Miller, Milton, Murray, Olin, Pettit, Ready, Reagan, Ricard, Ritchie, Sandidge, Savage, Searing, Shorter, William Smith, Talbot, Miles Taylor, Thompson, Underwood, Ward, Warren, Israel Washburn, Woodson, Augustus K. Wright, and Zollicoffer.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. SEWARD stated that Mr. CURRY had paired off with Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois.

Mr. LOVEJOY stated that Mr. FARNSWORTH was sick.

Mr. CLEMENS stated that he had paired off with Mr. LAWRENCE, who had left the city to attend the funeral of a relative at Hagerstown, Maryland.

Mr. WINSLOW said: Some time ago I was called out of the House on business, and Mr. GRIMES was kind enough to pair off with me. He has not returned, and I am not, therefore, at liberty to vote; but on this call I am bound to answer to my name.

The roll having been called through, the Speaker pro tempore stated that the Clerk would now proceed to call the names of the absentees.

Mr. WARREN, (at a quarter before twelve o'clock.) I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SAVAGE. I ask if I am recorded as present?

Mr. BUFFINTON. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Is the motion to adjourn in order, pending the execution of the order of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the motion to adjourn is in order at any time when anything has intervened since a former motion to adjourn.

Mr. SAVAGE. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is a point of order already pending.

Mr. BURNETT. I desire to respond to my name.

Mr. SAVAGE. I rose and addressed the Chair and asked to have my name called before the gentleman from Arkansas made the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is aware that, under the rules of the House, a gentleman who was not in at the first call is not at liberty to have his name recorded until the second call.

Mr. SAVAGE. It has been the custom of the House to allow gentlemen to record their names at the end of the call.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee is mistaken. The usual plan is to call the names of the absentees, and then gentlemen who have not responded at the first call have an opportunity to record their names.

Mr. SAVAGE. I want to know if the Clerk has recorded my name? I was present all the time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the motion to adjourn.

Mr. McQUEEN. I ask if my name is recorded? If not, I claim the right to respond.

Mr. WINSLOW. I rise to a privileged question. I move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina is aware that that motion cannot be carried without a quorum; and on the last vote there was no quorum.

Mr. WINSLOW. There may be a quorum here now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Besides that, there is a motion now pending that the House adjourn till Monday.

Mr. BURNETT. I desire to know if my name is recorded as responding to the call or not?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The name of the gentleman is not recorded.

Mr. BURNETT. I was within the bar, and answered.

Mr. KELLY. I desire to have my name recorded. I was present.

Mr. GROW. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. GROW. My point of order is this: the roll having been called, and another motion submitted, and the yeas and nays ordered upon it, it is not in order to go back and inquire about a vote taken some time since.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has already decided that the motion to adjourn is in order, business having intervened since a motion to adjourn was voted on.

Mr. GROW. The Chair misunderstands my point of order. A motion has been made to adjourn, and the yeas and nays have been ordered on it; and now gentlemen rise to inquire if their names are recorded on a preceding vote. I hold that that is not in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not strictly in order.

The Speaker at this point resumed the chair.

The Clerk then proceeded to call the roll, the question being on Mr. WARREN's motion to adjourn; and Mr. ABBOTT answered to his name.

Mr. WARREN. I rose before there was a response, my object being to withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. GROW. I object to any interruption of the roll-call.

[Loud cries of "Call the roll."]

The call of the roll was then completed; and the question was decided in the negative—yeas 76, nays 102; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bocock, Bowie, Boyce, Bryan, Burnett, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clay, Clingman, Cobb, James Craig, Burton Craige, Davis of Mississippi, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, Faulkner, Florence, Garnett, Gartrell, Goode, G-e-z-z, Hatch, Hawkins, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Leitcher, McClay, McQueen, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Moore, Niblack, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Ruffin, Russell, Seales, Scott, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Sickles, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, Tripp, Warren, White, Whiteley, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—76.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Cox, Crawford, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, English, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hickman, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, McKibbin, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—102.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The House then continued the execution of its order. The absentees were called over, and the doors closed.

The absentees were then called for excuses, as follows:

GARNETT B. ADRIN. No excuse offered.

MILLEDGE L. BONHAM.

MR. MILES. My colleague is at home on account of severe indisposition. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

LAWRENCE O'B. BRANCH.

MR. WINSLOW. My colleague is indisposed. He might have been here at some prejudice to his health; but he has paired off with Mr. CRAGIN, and gone home. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

SAMUEL CARUTHERS. Excused under the rule.

HORACE F. CLARK.

MR. JOHN COCHRANE. My colleague was called home by important business. I move that he be excused.

MR. QUITMAN. I hope no man will be excused on account of business.

MR. BILLINGHURST. I understand that the gentleman from New York is represented as being out of town. I believe the practice of the House has never gone so far as to send for members who are out of town. The fact has been considered as a sufficient excuse. I hope, therefore, that the House will not direct that the gentleman from New York shall be sent after, but that he be excused.

MR. DICK. I ask that the 66th rule may be read.

The rule was read, as follows:

"66. No member shall absent himself from the service of the House, unless he have leave, or be sick, or be unable to attend."

MR. FLORENCE. This is an important question to be settled. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being, on a division—ayes 35, noes 98.

MR. BOYCE. Has not the morning hour arrived; and has not the President's message passed from the consideration of the House? If so, I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that, technically, the morning hour has not yet arrived, though it may have in reality.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 113, nays 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Bryan, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dewart, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, English, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Gilman, Gooch, Goode, Goodwin, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Hickman, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelly, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, McClay, Mason, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac Morris, N. Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Niblack, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Sickles, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—100.

NAYS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bocock, Boyce, Burnett, Clemens, Cobb, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Dean, Dowdell, Edmundson, Florence, Garnett, Gartrell, Gregg, Hawkins, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Lamar, Leitcher, McQueen, Maynard, Miles, Moore, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Reilly, Scott, Singleton, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, White, Whiteley, and Wilson—48.

So Mr. CLARK was excused.

Pending the call of the roll,

MR. QUITMAN, when his name was called, said: I rise to a question of order. I wish to know of the Chair if the doors of the Hall were not ordered to be closed?

The SPEAKER. The Chair gave that order.

MR. QUITMAN. I see men passing freely out and in at the doors.

The SPEAKER. The Chair gave orders that the doors be closed; and it is the duty of the officers of the House to see that they remain closed.

MR. QUITMAN. I simply desired to call the attention of the Chair to the fact. I vote "no."

The House then continued the execution of its order, it being the call of absentees for excuses, as follows:

ERASTUS CORNING.

MR. JOHN COCHRANE. My colleague was summoned from the city by pressing business; and therefore I suppose he is unable to attend here. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

AARON H. CRAGIN.

MR. TAPPAN. My colleague is quite sick, and certainly not able to be in the Hall. I move that he be excused.

MR. MCQUEEN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

MR. PHELPS. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. OLIN and KELLY were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported thirty-six in the affirmative, a further count not being demanded.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

MR. STEPHENS, of Georgia, (at one o'clock, a. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn.

MR. COMINS demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 65, nays 100; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Avery, Bocock, Bowie, Boyce, Bryan, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochrane, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Davis of Mississippi, Dowdell, Edmundson, Faulkner, Florence, Garnett, Gartrell, Goode, Gregg, Hatch, Hawkins, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, J. NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, English, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hickman, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, McKibbin, Mason, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Reilly, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Sickles, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—100.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Pending the call of the roll,

MR. CLAY stated that Mr. JEWETT left the House at midnight quite ill.

The question recurred on the motion to excuse Mr. CRAGIN, upon which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

MR. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I want to submit a proposition that we have one or two speeches before we proceed further. [Cries of "Agreed!"]

MR. GROW. I object.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 135, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anderson, Andrews, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bocock, Bowie, Boyce, Brayton, Bryan, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Durfee, Edmundson, Faulkner, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Foster, Gartrell, Gilman, Gooch, Goode, Granger, Gregg, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Hatch, Hickman, Hoard, Hopkins, Horton, Houston, Howard, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kellogg, Kelly, Kilgore, Knapp, Lamar, Landy, Leach, Leiter, Leitcher, Lovejoy, McClay, McKibbin, McQueen, Mason, Miles, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Mott, Nichols, Olin, Parker, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Quitman, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Ruffin, Russell, Seales, Scott, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Sickles, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, Stallworth, Stanton, Stephens, Stevenson, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Tripp, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Watkins, White, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—135.

NAYS—Messrs. Gillis, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hill, Owen Jones, Isaac N. Morris, Oliver A. Morse, Aaron Shaw, Robert Smith, and Whiteley—11.

So Mr. CRAGIN was excused.

MR. QUITMAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to submit a proposition to the House.

MR. GROW. I object to anything out of order.

MR. QUITMAN. I wish to submit a proposition perfectly fair on all sides.

MR. ENGLISH. I appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw his objection, and let us hear what the proposition is.

Several MEMBERS. Withdraw it.

MR. GROW. I withdraw my objection.

MR. QUITMAN. As a matter of course, if any gentleman objects, I have nothing to say. My proposition is this: I do not speak on the authority of any one but myself; but, sir, regarding this contest as one that will probably come to no good result, I propose that, by a common understanding, all the motions made subsequent to the call of the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS], shall be withdrawn.

At this moment a violent personal altercation commenced in the aisle at the right of the Speaker's chair, between Mr. KEITT and Mr. GROW. In an instant the House was in the greatest possible confusion. Members in every part of the Hall rushed over to the scene of conflict, and several members seemed to participate in it.

The SPEAKER made loud and repeated calls to order, and required the Sergeant-at-Arms to arrest the members acting in contempt of the House.

The Sergeant-at-Arms, bearing the mace of the House, was at once in the midst of the combatants; and after some minutes, with the most energetic efforts on the part of the Speaker, succeeded in partially restoring order.

MR. BOWIE moved that the House adjourn. [Shouts of "No!" "No!" and great confusion.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair calls on gentlemen to resume their seats and come to order.

MR. CLAY. I desire to ask the Speaker if a motion to adjourn is in order?

MR. QUITMAN. I claim the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi was upon the floor by the unanimous consent of the House.

MR. CLAY. I ask the gentleman from Mississippi to yield to me to inquire of the Chair if a motion to adjourn is in order?

MR. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I insist that the gentleman from Mississippi shall proceed. I object to everything that is not in order.

MR. QUITMAN. I was proceeding to present a proposition to the House, and the scene just before us seems to demonstrate the necessity of it. I propose, then, that all the motions which have been made and not acted upon since the previous question was called upon the motion, or resolution, or amendment, of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS], shall be withdrawn, and that the House shall then adjourn until Monday, [cries of "No!" "No!" and confusion,] with the understanding that on Monday at one o'clock the question shall be taken.

[Loud cries of "No!" "No!" "Order!" and confusion—members standing, and much excited.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, anticipating some difficulty in the continuance of a night session, over a question so exciting as that embraced in the recent message of the President of the United States—

Mr. CRAWFORD. I object to any motion to adjourn. When this House adjourns, let it be to meet no more.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appeals to gentlemen to resume their seats. The Chair requires gentlemen to be seated. The Chair will direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to arrest gentlemen who are acting in contempt of the authority of the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I ask for the same courtesy which was extended to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN.] [Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. BARKSDALE. I object.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Well, sir, I say gentlemen—

[The remainder of the sentence was lost in shouts of, "Order!" "Order!" and the disorder which followed.]

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order, and the Chair will entertain no debate. The Clerk will proceed with the call of absentees for excuses.

The Clerk called the name of JABEZ L. M. CURRY.

Mr. DOWDELL. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. CURRY, has been but two or three days from a sick bed. I do not think he is able to be here. He has paired off with Mr. FARNSWORTH; and I move that he be excused.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I ask for the yeas and nays upon that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a few remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 159, nays 4; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anderson, Andrews, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bocoek, Bowie, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clemens, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dimmick, Dodd, Dowdell, Durfee, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Foster, Garnett, Gartrell, Gilman, Gooch, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Gregg, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Hawkins, Hickman, Hill, Hoard, Hopkins, Horton, Houston, Howard, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kellogg, Kelly, Kilgore, Knapp, Macley, McKibbin, McQueen, Mason, Miles, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morse, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Niblack, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Peyton, Phelps, Pike, Potter, Purviance, Quitman, Reilly, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Rufin, Russell, Scales, Scott, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Stephen, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, Stallworth, Stanton, Stevenson, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Tripp, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Warren, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Wilson, Wood, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—159.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay, Pendleton, Savage, and Stephens—4.

So Mr. CURRY was excused.

Mr. HUGHES, (at half past two o'clock.) I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 73, nays 95; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bocoek, Bowie, Boyce, Bryan, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochrane, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Davis of Mississippi, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, Florence, Garnett, Gartrell, Gilman, Goode, Hatch, Hawkins, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Letcher, Macley, McQueen, Mason, Moore, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Reilly, Rufin, Russell, Savage, Scott, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Sickles, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, Tripp, Warren, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—73.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, English, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L.

Harris, Haskin, Hickman, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, McKibbin, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morse, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—95.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. BOWIE. Is it in order to move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with?

The SPEAKER. The motion is in order.

Mr. BOWIE. I submit the motion.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 35, nays 120; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Bingham, Bliss, Bowie, Boyce, John Cochrane, Cox, Davis of Iowa, Dewart, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, Foster, Goode, Lawrence W. Hall, Hatch, Hopkins, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kellogg, Kelly, Macley, McKibbin, Mason, Montgomery, Olin, Pendleton, Phillips, Reilly, Russell, Scott, Sickles, and Stevenson—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bennett, Billingshurst, Blair, Bocoek, Brayton, Bryan, Buffinton, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Caskie, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, English, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Gregg, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hawkins, Hickman, Hill, Hoard, Horton, Houston, Howard, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Kilgore, Lamar, Leach, Leiter, Letcher, Lovejoy, Maynard, Miles, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morse, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Niblack, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Peyton, Phelps, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, Stephens, William Stewart, Thayer, Tompkins, Tripp, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Warren, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Watkins, White, Wilson, Winslow, Wood, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—120.

So the House decided to continue the call.

The Clerk next called the name of

WILLIAM S. DAMRELL.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I suppose it is known to every member of the House that Mr. DAMRELL is incapacitated from remaining in his seat. I move that he be excused; and I hope he will be excused by unanimous consent.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. PHELPS. I renew the motion that Mr. DAMRELL be excused; and call for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 142, nays 5; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anderson, Andrews, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bocoek, Bowie, Boyce, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Caskie, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clemens, Cobb, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craige, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Dodd, Dowdell, Durfee, Edmundson, English, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Foster, Gartrell, Gilman, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Gregg, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hickman, Hill, Hoard, Hopkins, Horton, Houston, Howard, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kellogg, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Leiter, Letcher, Lovejoy, Macley, McQueen, Miles, Moore, Morgan, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Niblack, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Powell, Purviance, Quitman, Reilly, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Rufin, Russell, Scales, Scott, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, Stallworth, Stanton, Stephens, Stevenson, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Tripp, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Wood, and John V. Wright—142.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay, Crawford, Montgomery, Isaac N. Morris, and Elihu B. Washburne—5.

So Mr. DAMRELL was excused.

Mr. PHELPS. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. QUITMAN. I ask the gentleman from Missouri to withdraw that motion for a moment to enable me to submit a proposition to the House.

Mr. PHELPS. I will withdraw it.

Mr. QUITMAN. I have been induced by the representations of some gentlemen on the other side of the House, again to ask the House to hear a proposition which will, for the present at least, terminate the present contest. The proposition is a very simple one; and if gentlemen will listen to it, I hope it will be unanimously adopted.

Mr. GROW. I object to anything out of order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will withdraw his objection, and let us hear the proposition.

Several MEMBERS. Withdraw objection.

Mr. GROW. The gentleman from Illinois has charge of the resolution; and at his instance I will withdraw objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Understanding that the gentleman from Mississippi has a proposition which may terminate this controversy for the present, I hope no objection will be made.

Mr. PALMER. The House will remember that when the gentleman from Ohio proposed to present a proposition which might terminate the difficulty, it was objected to.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I can overlook all that. I hope no objection will be made.

Mr. HICKMAN. I object.

Mr. PHELPS. I move, then, that the House adjourn.

Mr. HOUSTON. I suppose it would be in order for the gentleman from Mississippi to move that the House adjourn; and then he would have the right to have his proposition read at the Clerk's desk. A majority vote could then carry the proposition. I hope he will take that course if objection be made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair could not entertain the motion except by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOUSTON. A motion to adjourn is in order.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I presume no one would object to a proposition which would relieve the House of its present difficulties.

Objection was made.

Mr. PHELPS. I then renew the motion that the House adjourn.

Mr. GROESBECK. I hope gentlemen will withdraw all objection to the proposition.

Mr. DEAN. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the Chair if a motion to adjourn until Monday next would not be in order? That of itself would, in part, accomplish the object sought by the proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. The motion would not be in order under existing circumstances.

Mr. PHELPS. I would inquire to what time we should adjourn, if we adjourn now? [half past three o'clock, a. m.] Would it be until Monday, twelve o'clock, m.? This is Saturday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that if the House adjourns now, it will adjourn to meet at twelve o'clock.

Mr. GROESBECK. I ask gentlemen to withdraw their objection to the proposition made by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN.]

Mr. WHITELEY. I object.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Will it be in order to ask unanimous consent that the proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi be read at the Clerk's desk?

The SPEAKER. Objection has been made.

Mr. ENGLISH. I hope there will be no objection to the mere reading of the proposition for information. ["Yes!" "Yes!"] I ask that the paper be read for information.

Mr. HICKMAN. I understand that a young friend of mine has just got married, and this proposition may be of some importance to him, and I hope it will be read.

Mr. COMINS. I hope the objection will be withdrawn.

The objection not being insisted on—

Mr. PHELPS withdrew his motion to adjourn; and the paper was read, as follows:

All motions now pending, made since the call of the previous question upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, shall be withdrawn. The vote shall then be taken on seconding the previous question; whereupon, if carried, the House will adjourn to Monday; and at one o'clock, Monday, the vote shall be taken on the main question.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I hope the proposition made by the gentleman from Mississippi may be adopted. I think it embraces everything any gentleman can ask for.

Mr. STANTON. I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. COBB. I object. No man has a right to compromise my proposition without consulting me.

Mr. PEYTON. If there ever was a fair proposition made, this is one; and I hope our friends will accept it.

Mr. BARKSDALE. This is the same proposition made last evening by the gentleman from Georgia; but it was not understood.

Mr. COBB. I will, if it is the wish of the House, withdraw my motion to be excused.

No objection being made, the motion was withdrawn.

Mr. PHILLIPS. If the proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi is that the vote upon the previous question shall be taken to-night, I object.

The SPEAKER. That is the proposition in part.

Mr. QUITMAN. If there be no objection, I ask that my proposition be the understanding of the House.

The SPEAKER. It is objected to.

Mr. TRIPPE. It is the same proposition we have been all this time contending for.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. It has not been so understood by the House to-day.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. We upon this side of the House have not understood that any such proposition has been made.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The proposition I made was not exactly this proposition. It did not cover the seconding of the previous question. In substance, the main thing was to get a vote upon the matter on Monday.

Mr. PHELPS. As objection is made, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The yeas and nays were demanded and ordered. The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 68, nays 97; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bocoek, Boyce, Bryan, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, Burton Craige, Crawford, Davis of Mississippi, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, Florence, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Gregg, Hatch, Hawkins, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Lamar, Letcher, MacLay, McQueen, Mason, Miles, Moore, Niblack, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Reilly, Ruffin, Scales, Scott, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, Trippe, Warren, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—68.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, English, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Gilman, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hickman, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, McKibbin, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettigoe, Pike, Potter, Pott, Purviance, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, and Wood—97.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. HASKIN. Will it be in order now to renew the proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. McQUEEN. I object.

Mr. PHILLIPS. May I be permitted to say why I objected to that proposition?

Mr. HICKMAN. I object to any discussion.

The Clerk then proceeding with the call of the list of absentees for excuses, called the name of

THOMAS G. DAVIDSON.

Mr. RUFFIN. I move that Mr. DAVIDSON be excused. He has been indisposed for several days. He has paired off with the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAMRELL.]

Mr. PHELPS. I think he should be excused, but I desire to record my vote upon it; and therefore I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. COLFAX. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WINSLOW and BUFFINTON were appointed.

The House was divided; and the tellers reported—aye 45, forty-one.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WINSLOW. I move [at four o'clock] that the House adjourn.

Mr. ENGLISH demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 57, nays 97; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bocoek, Boyce, Bryan, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochrane, Crawford, Davis of Mississippi, Dowdell, Edmundson, Florence, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Gregg, Hatch, Hawkins, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Huyler, Jackson, J. Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, Trippe, Warren, Watkins, Winslow, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—57.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, English, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Gilman, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hickman, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, McKibbin, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pike, Potter, Pott, Purviance, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, White, Whiteley, Wilson, and Wood—97.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. RUFFIN to excuse Mr. DAVIDSON, upon which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to submit a motion to excuse my colleague, Mr. GREENWOOD. He was here until eleven o'clock, and soon after left the Hall.

The SPEAKER. His name has not yet been called.

The question was taken on the motion to excuse Mr. DAVIDSON; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 122, nays 6; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Arnold, Avery, Barksdale, Bennett, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bocoek, Boyce, Brayton, Bryan, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Ezra Clark, John B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, White, Wilson, Winslow, and Wortendyke—122.

NAYS—Messrs. Davis of Indiana, Houston, Kilgore, Montgomery, Stephens, and Warren—6.

So Mr. DAVIDSON was excused.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I object.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, moved (at four o'clock and forty minutes) that the House adjourn; and upon that motion called the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HASKIN. Will the gentleman from Georgia withdraw his motion, to enable me to renew the proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. PHELPS. I shall object to that.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 53, nays 88; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bocoek, Bryan, John B. Clark, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochrane, Burton Craige, Crawford, Dowdell, Edmundson, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Gregg, Hatch, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Lamar, Landy, Letcher, MacLay, McQueen, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Niblack, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Quitman, Ruffin, Scales, Scott, Henry M. Shaw, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, Warren, White, Whiteley, Winslow, and John V. Wright—53.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Curtis, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dodd, Durfee, English, Fenton, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hickman, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Knapp, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pike, Potter, Purviance, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, and Israel Washburn—88.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Pending the call of the yeas and nays, and before the result was announced,

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, stated that when his name was called he was in the cloak-room, which opens out of the Hall, and to which there is no entrance except from the Hall, and desired to know if he was entitled to vote under the rules of the House prescribing what shall be considered the bar of the House.

The SPEAKER decided that the gentleman was not entitled to vote.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, took an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CLAY. I ask if it is not in order again to renew the proposition made by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN?]

The SPEAKER. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. CLAY. Then I ask that the proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi may be entertained by the House.

Mr. LETCHER. If that motion is amended in one particular, I shall not object; if it is not, I shall. That is in reference to seconding the previous question to-night.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Is it objected to?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] as an objection. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DAVIS] not being within the bar of the House, according to the construction of the Chair, claims the privilege of voting. The Chair has held, pursuant to the intimation and construction, he believes, of the committee appointed for that purpose, that the doors leading into the Hall of the House were to be construed to be the bar of the House. Any one to be within the bar of the House must be within either of the doors leading into it, and where a member is in either of the recesses he cannot be considered to be within the bar. The gentleman from Mississippi appeals from that decision. The vote has not been announced upon the last question taken, and it is necessary to settle this preliminary question to prevent confusion, and therefore the Chair will put this question before announcing the result on the other question.

Mr. STANTON. Is there not an appeal pending?

The SPEAKER. There is.

Mr. STANTON. Can another be entertained while that is pending?

The SPEAKER. According to the usual practice of the House it cannot; but the gentleman will perceive that this question can alone be made at this time, and before the vote on the pending question is announced, as it involves the right of a member to vote upon that question. The Chair would be very glad to have the House determine whether the Chair has construed the rule of the House properly.

Mr. MASON. I demand the yeas and nays upon the appeal.

Mr. HUGHES. I move to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 137, nays 5; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anderson, Andrews, Arnold, Atkins, Barksdale, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bocoek, Boyce, Brayton, Bryan, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Comins, Covode, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Foster, Gartrell, Giddings, Gilman, Goode, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Gregg, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Hatch, Hawkins, Hickman, Hoard, Hopkins, Horton, Houston, Howard, Hughes, Jackson, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kellogg, Kilgore, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, Landy, Leiter, Letcher, Lovejoy, MacLay, McKibbin, McQueen, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Niblack, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Potter, Pott, Purviance, Quitman, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Ruffin, Seales, Scott, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Judson W. Sherman, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, Stanton, Stephens, Stevenson, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Tripp, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Watkins, White, Wilson, Winslow, and John V. Wright—137.

YAYS—Messrs. Avery, Davis of Mississippi, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, and Powell—5.

So the appeal was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER then announced the result on the motion to adjourn, as before inserted.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I have a proposition which I wish to submit to the House, which I think is a fair one. I hope they will hear it read.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. CLAY. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will withdraw his objection.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Let us hear what the proposition is.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think it due to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] that the objection to his proposition, made upon the other side of the House, should be withdrawn.

Mr. PHELPS. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WINSLOW, (at twenty-five minutes to six o'clock, a. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MORGAN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 49, nays 91; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Barksdale, Bowie, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clemens, Cobb, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Davis of Mississippi, Edmundson, Garnett, Gartrell, Goode, Gregg, Hatch, Hawkins, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Jacob M. Kunkel, Letcher, McQueen, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Moore, Niblack, Peyton, Phelps, Powell, Quitman, Ruffin, Russell, Seales, Scott, Henry M. Shaw, Singleton, Stallworth, Stephens, Tripp, Watkins, Whiteley, and Winslow—49.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, English, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hickman, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, McKibbin, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—91.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurred on Mr. HARRIS's motion.

Mr. HATCH. I do not rise, Mr. Speaker, to make any remarks, if objection is made; but it seems to me that this mode of proceeding here has gone far enough.

Mr. CLAY. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order for the gentleman from New York to proceed.

Mr. HATCH. Not if any gentleman objects.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

[Cries of "Withdraw it!"]

Mr. CLAY. No, sir, I do not withdraw it.

The question was taken on Mr. HARRIS's motion; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 91, nays 49; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Arnold, Bingham, Bliss, Bowie, Boyce, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, James Craig, Curtis, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, English, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Hickman, Hoard, Hopkins, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kelly, Kilgore, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Watkins, Wilson, and Wood—91.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Billingshurst, Bryan, Burroughs, John B. Clark, Clay, Cox, Burton Craige, Crawford, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Edmundson, Florence, Garnett, Gartrell, Hughes, Huyler, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Knapp, Jacob

M. Kunkel, Lamar, Letcher, Maclay, McQueen, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Montgomery, Mott, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Quitman, Ruffin, Russell, Seales, Henry M. Shaw, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Tripp, Whiteley, and Winslow—49.

So all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

Mr. STANTON. I wish to inquire if there is not an appeal pending, taken some time yesterday?

The SPEAKER. There is an appeal pending, taken by the gentleman himself.

Mr. STANTON. What would be the effect of the withdrawal of that appeal?

Mr. PHELPS. Stop a moment. We have ordered the yeas and nays on that appeal.

Mr. STANTON. I withdraw the appeal.

Mr. PHELPS. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to withdraw it.

Mr. PHELPS. Were not the yeas and nays ordered?

The SPEAKER. They were; but that does not deprive the gentleman of his right to withdraw the appeal, and all the subsequent motions fall with it. The question now is on the motion to amend the motion that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday, by substituting Tuesday for Monday.

Mr. QUITMAN. I will again attempt to introduce a resolution which I hope will receive the unanimous approval of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House to hear the resolution?

Many MEMBERS. Let it be read for information.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That this House do now adjourn over to Monday next, when the subject under consideration shall be resumed, and the vote upon the pending proposition shall be taken without further delay, debate, or dilatory motion.

Mr. STANTON. I think that is right. It is as good as the previous question.

Mr. LOVEJOY. What is the pending question referred to in the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I will inquire if the pending question referred to in the resolution is not the question upon the reference of the President's message?

Mr. KEITT. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I understand this resolution to override the motion for the previous question, and to provide that the question shall be taken on the reference without further delay, debate, or dilatory motion.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is the previous question, and the previous question is not a dilatory motion.

Mr. COLFAX. I desire to inquire if, under that resolution, we shall be required to vote upon the ten or eleven propositions now pending?

The SPEAKER. They fell with the withdrawal of the appeal.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I wish to inquire whether there is not a motion pending from last Monday to suspend the rules for the introduction of a resolution, and whether that motion will take precedence of this business?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that this would operate as a special order.

There being no objection, the resolution was adopted.

And thereupon (at twenty-five minutes past six o'clock, a. m.) the House adjourned till Monday next.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 8, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. H. N. SIPES.

The Journal of Thursday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in obedience to the 8th section of the act of July 22, 1854, for the action of Congress, transcripts of certain private land claims in New Mexico, which have been examined and approved by the surveyor general of that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a petition of citizens of the United States praying that the public lands may no longer be sold for the purposes of revenue; but be held for the exclusive use of actual settlers and cultivators; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BIGGS presented the memorial of Anna M. McKenney, widow of William McKenney, late a chaplain in the Navy, who died of disease contracted in the service, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JONES presented the petition of Louisa Merrill, widow of an officer of the Army, who was killed in the Mexican war, praying for the renewal of her pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of James B. Thomas, praying for compensation for Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented four petitions of citizens of Iowa, praying that the Des Moines river grant, to the source of the river, may be confirmed to the State of Iowa, upon condition that the State will construct a railroad from Keokuk to the source of the Des Moines river in Minnesota; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of George Clermont and others, praying that the public lands may be appropriated to the free and exclusive use of actual settlers not possessed of other lands; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FITZPATRICK presented the memorial of the register and receiver of the land office at St. Stephens, Alabama, praying that the compensation of registers and receivers may be increased; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GREEN presented two petitions of citizens of Nebraska, and a petition of citizens of Mount Ray, Kansas, praying for the establishment of a mail route from St. Joseph, Missouri, to Pawnee City, Nebraska; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. IVERSON presented a petition of Sheldon C. Dunning, legal representative of John Love, a surgeon's mate in the revolutionary war, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

He also presented the petition of C. E. Habicht, administrator of J. W. P. Lewis, praying for the payment of a balance due to him as agent for building a light-house on Sand Key, in Florida; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

DISTRICT BANKS.

Mr. MASON. I have been requested by the citizens of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, to present to the Senate a respectful memorial or remonstrance against the passage of a bill which has been reported to the Senate from a select committee, to prohibit the issue of bank notes by corporations and associations, or individuals, within the District of Columbia. The gentleman who brought me this petition asked that, inasmuch as the people of the District have no representative in either House, I would be so kind to them as to call the attention of the Senate to the contents of the memorial. It is very numerous, signed by a number of gentlemen, many of whom I know; they comprise chiefly, as I am informed, those who have principal charge of the commercial and manufacturing interests of that town. My own dispositions have always been to look upon the citizens of this District with very peculiar interest, from the fact that, by the terms of the Constitution, they constitute the only portion of the people of the United States who are disfranchised. I do not mean to give any opinion on the bill against which they remonstrate, further than to say that, so far as I am aware, it was not introduced upon the request or petition of any portion of the citizens whom it is intended chiefly to affect. I am satisfied that, when it comes up in the Senate, it will receive that deliberation which its magnitude to them requires. I move that the memorial lie on the table.

Mr. SEWARD. Will the honorable Senator indulge me with a remark on that question?

Mr. MASON. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. SEWARD. My attention has been called to this subject by a portion of the citizens of the District, and I rise for the purpose of letting it be understood by them, that when the question arises, I shall desire to have it considered with reference as well to the interests of the public and the country, as the views and opinions of the people, who are to be immediately affected by it; and that, as I understand the bill, which is objected to, has not been referred to the appropriate committee, which, I suppose, is the Committee on the District of Columbia, I shall, when it comes up, propose that it be committed to that committee, together with the memorial which is now about to be laid on the table.

Mr. MASON. The bill to which the memorial refers has been reported to the Senate by a select committee.

Mr. SEWARD. Oh!

Mr. MASON. It has been suggested by an honorable Senator near me, that inasmuch as the subject of the memorial has been acted on by the committee, it would be as well to have it printed. I move that the memorial be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That motion will go to the Committee on Printing.

The memorial was ordered to lie on the table.

EDUCATION OF SHIPS' CREWS.

Mr. BIGLER. I present four memorials of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying Congress to provide a system of instruction on board of our ships of war. The memorialists, entertaining a high regard for the interests of the Navy, and desirous that it should command the universal respect of all nations, and prove to our own people a great moralizing agent in time of peace, as well as a defense in time of war, believe that the only way to effect this is to obtain improvement in the personnel of our ships' crews. To attain this object they believe that a system of instruction on board of our ships of war would be a powerful means; and that to convert our ships of war into great floating scholastic institutions, as well as conservators of peace and avengers of aggression, would give to the Navy and to the country a proud distinction, especially if the United States showed itself to be a pioneer in this improvement; while it would increase, rather than diminish, the capability of our men-of-war in every element of a well-disciplined, orderly, and efficient Navy. For this purpose, schoolmasters should be appointed by act of Congress at a pay sufficient to insure the services of competent persons to superintend the instruction of the youth, boys, and such men among the crew as desire to avail themselves of such provision; and be required to pass a preliminary examination, to determine their fitness (as is now the practice in the appointment of boatswains, gunners, &c.) in reading, writing, geography, history, mathematics, including navigation, &c.; and, to guard against undue familiarity when not engaged in scholastic duty, should rank and mess with the forward officers. They set forth that a sufficient supply of the necessary slates, stationery, books, and mathematical instruments, should be provided, and that some additional expense would necessarily be incurred in effecting these provisions; but they believe that the improvement they would introduce in the personnel in the ships' crews, and the greater facility in shipping men and youth at our recruiting stations, would more than counterbalance that additional expense: for when it was known that a good common-school education would be provided to lads entering the Navy, parents, guardians, and friends of boys would be anxious to place them there, especially if unable otherwise to provide such education for them. The memorialists, therefore, pray Congress to enact a law to carry out their wishes. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SEWARD. I am requested to present the memorial of citizens of the United States, suggesting to Congress that schoolmasters should be appointed by act of Congress, at a pay sufficient to insure the service of competent persons, to superintend the instruction of the youth, boys, and such men among the crews of our national vessels as desire to avail themselves of its provisions. The subject is one of very great interest and far-reaching importance. The number of subscribers to this petition is small; they are, however, about twenty, and they seem to be clergymen connected with the Episcopal Church in the United States.

The memorial is signed, in the first instance, by Bishop Potter, of the State of Pennsylvania, and other very eminent clergymen.

I have a similar memorial which is subscribed by a large portion of the principal merchants and insurance companies of the city of New York. The two memorials together combine two very great and highly respectable influences, and I commend the subject to the consideration of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which I move that the memorials be referred.

The motion was agreed to.

THE LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

Mr. ALLEN presented a resolution of the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives of that State in Congress, to vote against the admission of Kansas into the Union as a State under the Lecompton constitution; which was read, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. FITZPATRICK, it was Ordered, That James D. Cobb have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

On motion of Mr. SEBASTIAN, it was Ordered, That the memorial of David Butler, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BIGGS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Joseph Chaires, executor of J. B. Chaires, deceased, and Gad Humphreys and Pedro Miranda, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 126) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of José de la Maya Arredondo. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of George Phelps, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 128) for the relief of George Phelps. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. SEWARD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 127) to repeal the fifth section of an act entitled "An act to authorize the register or enrollment and license to be issued in the name of the president or secretary of any incorporated company owning a steamboat or vessel," approved March 3, 1825; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

BILL BECOME A LAW.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the President of the United States had approved and signed, on the 5th instant, an act (H. R. No. 63) to supply an omission in the enrollment of a certain act therein named.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills:

An act (H. R. No. 3) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States, for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859; also, an act (H. R. No. 22) to alter the time of holding the courts of the United States for the State of South Carolina; which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President.

PRINTING OF THE KANSAS MESSAGE.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That ten thousand copies of the message of the President of the United States communicating a constitution from Kansas as a State, and presenting his views in relation to the affairs of that Territory, be printed for the use of the Senate.

DATE OF IMPORTS.

Mr. GWIN. I noticed on the reading of the Journal that a resolution offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. SLIDELL] in reference to the valuation of goods imported on which duties are paid, has been referred to the Committee on Commerce. It certainly pertains to the finances of the country, and ought to go to the Committee on Finances. I hope it will take that reference.

Mr. CLAY. I have no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator, that he is informed the author of the resolution had the reference made to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GWIN. I move to discharge the Committee on Commerce from its consideration, and that the subject be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAVIS. In the absence of the Senator from Louisiana, I hope no action will be taken on that proposition. I think it proper that he should be present when it is considered.

Mr. STUART. We can discharge the Committee on Commerce and then let the question of reference remain before the Senate until the Senator from Louisiana comes in.

Mr. DAVIS. Let the whole subject go over.

The subject was passed over by common consent.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I ask the Senate now to take up and pass a resolution of inquiry which I offered on Thursday, calling for information from the President in regard to certain facts and the returns of votes in the Territory of Kansas. I presume it will be disposed of in a few minutes.

Mr. GWIN. I wish to offer some resolutions of inquiry.

Mr. DOUGLAS. This is only a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. IVERSON. I rise to a point of order. I have petitions to present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair supposes it is his duty to call first for petitions and then for reports of standing committees during the morning hour. He does not know what the practice of the Senate has been in reference to a motion to change the order of business.

Mr. DOUGLAS. During the morning we have petitions, reports, and resolutions, indiscriminately, and I was only calling up this resolution in accordance to the practice of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not suppose it is in the regular order of business; but he doubts whether the Senator has not the right to make a motion to take it up.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator will withdraw it, and let me offer a resolution to go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But if I withdraw my motion for one I shall have to withdraw it for others.

Mr. IVERSON. I wish to ask of the Chair if the standing rules of the Senate can be dispensed with?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will waive my motion that petitions may be received as they take priority, if my motion will be considered as the first motion pending after them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not suppose it is in the regular order of business at this time.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I suppose the motion stands; but if petitions take priority gentlemen can go on presenting them, and the motion can afterwards be acted on, taking priority of other business. That is my understanding of the rule.

Mr. HALE. I have a resolution to offer which I suppose will go to the Committee on Printing, as a matter of course.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I inquire if my resolution does not take priority?

Mr. HALE. This will not take a minute.

Mr. DOUGLAS. My only object is to get an answer to a certain resolution of inquiry. I do not wish to push it contrary to the sense of the Senate, yet I cannot feel that we have the information before us that we ought to have, until we get that which is called for by this resolution. I wish for the action of the Senate on the adoption of this resolution of inquiry. I do not propose to stand in the way of any gentleman who desires to offer other resolutions. I supposed mine was one of form, like any other.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I rise to inquire whether the call for petitions has been gone through with?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not. Petitions are being offered, and resolutions and reports of committees also.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I have some petitions to offer.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I consider that petitions take priority, but if there are no petitions I renew my motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been the practice, ever since I have occupied this chair, for petitions, memorials, and resolutions, to be offered indiscriminately during the morning hour. The Chair understood that it had been the practice of the Senate, and of course he acquiesced in it.

Mr. SEWARD. On that subject, I wish to make a remark. I think the rule requires that petitions shall be presented first; but early in the session we are accustomed by unanimous consent to adhere not very tenaciously to the rule; still, if a question is raised, it requires the consent of the Senate to substitute resolutions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would find no difficulty in construing and enforcing the rules; but in attempting to follow the practice of the Senate he is sometimes led into error, by not knowing what that practice has been.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I understand there is nothing now before the Senate, and I move to take up the resolution to which I referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Petitions are still in order. The Chair may not be aware but that half a dozen Senators are ready to offer petitions. I will follow the rule, and ask for petitions and memorials.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to withdraw the petition of Mrs. Larned, which I presented the other day, from the Committee on Pensions, and refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

Mr. CLAY. I should like to know why the honorable Senator makes that motion? whether it be because he thinks the Committee on Military Affairs is the more appropriate committee, or whether it is a want of confidence in the Committee on Pensions? I think it is certainly disrespectful to a committee, after referring to them what seems legitimately to belong to them, to withdraw it, and refer it to another committee; and I think the Senator ought, in justice to the Committee on Pensions, of which I am a member, to explain the grounds of his motion.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am sorry—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has let the moment slip by when it was his duty to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the special order for this hour.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to make an explanation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. By unanimous consent the Senator can make the explanation.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am very happy to have it in my power to give a satisfactory explanation to the honorable Senator from Alabama in relation to the motion I have just made. It is simply this: the memorial has lain before the committee for some time. I spoke to the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, and I have spoken to him again this morning, and he acquiesced in the course I have proposed; so that it does not arise from any distrust of the capacity or integrity of the Committee on Pensions; but I think it more appropriate, as the husband of this lady was an officer of the Army, and was killed under peculiar circumstances, to refer the petition to the Committee on Military Affairs. That is the only reason; and I hope the gentleman will be satisfied with it.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair calls the attention of the Senate to the special order, being the unfinished business on which the Senate adjourned.

Mr. DOUGLAS. What is that?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to refer the President's message communicating the Lecompton constitution to the Committee on Territories, with the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts proposing instruction to that committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection, if I may be permitted to do so, to give way that the Senator from Illinois may call up his resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator move to postpone the special order?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am willing to postpone it for that purpose, it being understood that I have the floor.

Mr. BIGGS. I must object.

Mr. MASON. If the honorable Senator from Maine moves to postpone the further consideration of the motion to refer the President's message, with a view to allow the honorable Senator from Illinois to call up the resolution he has offered, I shall ask for the yeas and nays upon it; because, as I understand, the effect of it must be to continue the discussion, in a different form, on the resolution offered by the Senator from Illinois. If the Senator makes the motion, therefore, I shall ask for the yeas and nays on the question of precedence, to test whether the Senate will go on with the motion to refer, or whether they will take up this incidental and collateral question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It is entirely immaterial to me whether the vote be taken first on the reference of the message, or on this resolution of inquiry, for the reason that I wish the information under the resolution of inquiry to enlighten me in the consideration of the other question. I think any delay in adopting the resolution of inquiry will only operate as a delay in the consideration of the Kansas question by the committee. I deem it my duty to have that information, if it be possible to get it, and to ask for the requisite time in order to get it. For that reason I thought I would, at the earliest moment last week, bring forward the resolution of inquiry, supposing it would have been answered by this time, if it had been adopted. If, however, the Senate desire to go on with the question of reference, I will waive my motion, and bring up the resolution of inquiry afterwards.

Mr. MASON. That would be better.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I was perfectly willing to give way for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Illinois to introduce his motion, in order that the Senate might pass upon the question whether or not any more information was to be afforded to us, officially, than we have already received. I was suspicious that it was not the desire of the majority of the Senate that the resolution of the Senator from Illinois should pass, and that the information sought for by it should be obtained. I had no idea that its passage would be permitted; but yet I was willing to make the experiment. If, as a matter of fact, it had appeared to me probable; if I had supposed there was any good reason to believe that an investigation would be had with regard to the allegations that have been made of fraud in one stage and another of this proceeding in Kansas, I should probably have been willing, very willing, to waive any remarks on the general question until that information was obtained. The inquiry, however, that I put to the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. GREEN,] the other day, as to the intentions of the Committee on Territories, and the answer I received from him, satisfied me that we should have no other information afforded to this body, officially, than that which we now have; and, therefore, I see no reason why I, or any other Senator who desires to do so, may not as well proceed to comment on this message of the President now, as to defer remarks until we have a report on the subject from the committee.

Mr. GREEN. I thought I remarked—I know it was my intention so to do—that the committee had never considered that point, and that I was not authorized to speak for the committee; but that, as far as I was concerned, I would undertake to carry out whatever instructions the Senate gave me.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understood the answer of the Senator to say exactly that; and strange as it may seem to him, that answer satisfied me of what I have just stated, that we should have no more official information on the subject. Other Senators may draw a different conclusion, but such was mine. I was remarking that, under the circumstances, I saw no reason why any Senator might not as well proceed now to comment on this message of the President, and on the various topics connected with it now, as to wait until we shall have a formal report from the committee on the subject.

I think, sir, that the message has been drawn with care and with design. It is an argument presented to the country—intended as an argument which should affect and influence the minds of the people in reference to the great question which is soon to be tried before this body, and decided, so far as we are able to decide it. I deem it, therefore, not unimportant that the views of some gentlemen, to some extent, should be expressed with reference to that message, and that the country should understand that, although the officer highest in position entertains certain opinions which he has expressed on this subject, others who are in a less degree, perhaps, the representatives of the people, entertain different opinions, take a different view of the facts, and have something to say with reference to the statements that have been made. In the comments which I propose to make, I do not design to go much further than to make a statement of the case, as I understand it. Whether, with the impressions prevailing on my mind, I shall be able to make a fair statement of it, will be determined by the result. I certainly shall endeavor to do so.

The message which we have received transmitting the Lecompton constitution to us is certainly, in some respects, a singular one; and whatever demerits it may have, there is one thing about it which is observable, and which I trust may in some manner relieve the difficulties which seem to have pressed on the mind of my respected friend from New York, [Mr. SEWARD.] In his remarks on the Army bill he deemed it to be a matter of consequence that troops should be raised in order to quell the disturbances in the Territory of Utah, and he seemed to be of the impression that other questions were in such a state of forwardness towards a settlement that the Government could not need the increase of force for which it asked with reference to any other subject than the Territory of Utah. Now the President tells us very distinctly in his message that he has need of troops, and may continue to need them, not only for the Territory of Utah, but also for certain purposes in the Territory of Kansas; for he says distinctly that in case the constitution should be accepted and Kansas become a State, he will then be able to withdraw the troops from Kansas, and use them where they are more needed—distinctly referring to the Territory of Utah. We may infer, then, that if the Lecompton constitution should not happen to be acceptable to Congress, troops are still to be kept in Kansas for the purposes for which they have been used there heretofore. I cannot believe that the honorable Senator from New York can in any manner justify the keeping of those troops in Kansas, or can in any manner believe there is any necessity for keeping them there in the existing state of things.

The President clearly intimates that he will be obliged to keep the troops there if the Lecompton constitution should not prove acceptable, and Kansas be not admitted with it. That is his conclusion; for if, as he says, he can withdraw them in case Kansas becomes a State, he cannot withdraw them unless Kansas becomes a State. That is the clear inference. That is singular; for the reason that, at the present time, we know the fact that the Territory of Kansas is under the control of what is called a free-State, and what gentlemen choose to call an Abolition, Legislature. There is no difficulty in Kansas now. Those who are denounced as "rebels," but who are in fact the free-State party of Kansas, and a majority of the people of Kansas, have control of the government of Kansas at the present time. If this constitution should not be adopted, and Kansas should not become a State under it, what is the result? That the power is in the hands of the rebels; for rebellion, as it has been called, has things all its own way.

I see no necessity on the part of the President to keep troops there for the purpose of aiding in establishing the Government, which is going on so much according to the will of those whom he has been accustomed and desired to control by the use of the troops. It is a very singular declaration on the part of the President. What? That unless Kansas be admitted as a State under this constitution, he will be obliged to keep troops there—for what purpose? For the purpose of controlling the free-State government of Kansas; for the purpose of controlling the majority who now have the government in their own hands. Is that the game that is to be played? Is Kansas, while it remains a Territory, still to be held under military domination, simply for the reason that those whom he has heretofore chosen to denounce as rebels, are now in the possession of the government, and will continue so unless Kansas becomes a State under this constitution? It is a very singular declaration to put forth to the country; and yet such is the plain inference from the message he has communicated to us.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1858.

NEW SERIES....No. 39.

Sir, I admit that this message is entitled to be treated with respect, for the reason that it comes from an officer who is always to be spoken of with respect so far as those associated with him in the Government are able to do so.

Mr. SEWARD. As the honorable Senator is passing to another point, I wish to make an explanation. I think the honorable Senator from Maine has probably fallen into some error by not considering the effect of all I have said in regard to the Army question. I will state it once more in order to remove a misapprehension from his mind. I stated in my last speech on that subject that I spoke with great diffidence on that point, because I was not half convinced myself. I began with that remark. I stated that my difficulty arose in not knowing the future in Kansas, and the future operations in Utah. If I knew what was to be done in regard to Kansas, and if I knew what was to happen in Utah, I should see my course as clear as others; but, on examination of the whole subject, I came to the conclusion that there would be such a state of things in Kansas as would oblige the President to withdraw the troops. That state of things I considered in the first place to be the admission of Kansas as a State during the present session of Congress; or, in the next place, the leaving of Kansas where she is, without bringing her in as a slave State under the Lecompton constitution. I had no belief then, and I have not now, that an administration would be so infatuated as to endeavor to keep an army there, though such an inference may be drawn from the President's message. On the other hand, I have my own mode of reasoning, which brings me to the conclusion that there are to be disasters in Utah, which, to-day, do not appear so distinctly to the vision of other persons, and I was obliged to decide on the question then when I spoke.

Under these circumstances and having these opinions, I certainly should give my support to the measure which I proposed, which was the employment of an additional number of men with reference distinctly to their operation in Utah, and their being disbanded when that difficulty was through. What circumstances may change the case I do not know. I stated at the same time, most distinctly, that the President would never obtain my vote nor the vote of any other person, if I had any influence with him, to retain an army in Kansas, the use of which was to maintain the Lecompton constitution or to maintain Federal authority in the Territory against the will of the people. That is my position now. If that should be the state of the case, as the Senator thinks it will be, I shall vote with him. If, on the other hand, the state of the case should be as I think it will be, then I shall expect the honorable Senator to vote with me because I believe we have precisely the same views on this point, differing only in the importance we attach to the developments already made.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The honorable Senator predicates his supposition, then, on utterly rejecting the President's assurance of what he means to do. The President says, quite distinctly, that unless Kansas be admitted as a State with the Lecompton constitution, he will be obliged to keep the troops in Kansas. Now, I know the Senator does not mean to vote for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, and, therefore, what is his inference? He must either take it for granted that Kansas is to come in under that constitution, and that, therefore, the troops are to be withdrawn, in which case no more are needed; or else that it is not to come in, and if not, that the President does not mean to perform what he has promised in relation to that matter. I take it for granted that Kansas is not to be admitted under this Lecompton constitution, and I take it for granted that the President then will, if he has army enough, keep troops in Kansas with a design to control the free-State people there, as he has done before. I do not understand with what object the Senator can vote for an increase of the Army to relieve him from the necessity, if such a necessity might exist, of withdrawing those troops for the sake of quelling disturbances in Utah. The Senator must reconcile it himself. He undoubtedly acts from the best motives, and is the best judge of his own actions.

But, sir, I proceed to speak of the message itself. I was remarking that it was entitled to be treated with all the respect due to the eminent position of its author. In times past, we have been accustomed to receive these messages and to believe that the author in sending them to Congress, intended to perform that part of his constitutional duty which enjoins on him "from time to time" to "give to the Congress information of the state of the Union." A message from the President of the United States should import absolute verity; and heretofore, whatever else we may say about them, we have been accustomed to believe that Presidents of the United States in communicating a message to Congress, in undertaking to give information to Congress, would at least tell the truth; at any rate that they would not set at defiance known and recorded facts, not make an argument all on one side; ignoring facts quite notorious with reference to one position, and stating that which was not supported by fact in regard to the other. And yet, sir, with all the respect which I entertain for the officer who occupies so eminent a position, and notwithstanding all the impressions I have with reference to his constitutional duty when making a communication to Congress, I am compelled to say, I feel obliged to say, under the circumstances, that the President has been guilty in this message not only of ignoring well-known facts, but of stating as facts things which he must have known, if he examined the documents, could not be true. What excuse he has for this before the country, it is not for me to say.

I have to remark next in regard to the tone of the message. The tone of the message of the Chief Magistrate of the Union, to be according to his character and position, should, in my judgment, be dignified, plain, and impartial; it should not be denunciatory; yet from the beginning to the end of this message, we hear from the Chief Magistrate of the United States strong denunciations, in severe language, of what he admits to be a majority of the people of the Territory of Kansas; while he has not one word to say, nothing save excuse and palliation—not even that, but rather of approbation, implied approbation—for all that has taken place there in opposing the efforts of the people of Kansas to obtain a free-State constitution. I think the language of the message in that particular is unworthy a man who has been chosen by the suffrages of his fellow-citizens to fill one of the few great, eminent places of the world.

It is a little singular, too, when we consider his education, that, with reference to this controversy, he has no sympathy whatever for the object which the people of Kansas, those whom he admits to be a majority, express themselves as having in view. He was born and educated in a free State. He has seen all the advantages of free institutions. He has seen his native State of Pennsylvania grow up to be one of the very first in rank in the Union, and to retain that rank; to be one of the first in wealth; one of the first in power; stretching out its arms on every side towards commerce and manufactures and agriculture—growing with a rapidity unprecedented, its people enjoying all not only of the comforts but of the elegancies of life, simply from the fact that its people have been left to labor, to carry out the cardinal doctrine on which our institutions were founded—that the capital of the country is the labor and employment of the free people of the country. Notwithstanding all that, and notwithstanding all that he has witnessed of the enormous growth of the free States under free institutions, we have not one word in the message, from the beginning to the end, except denunciation of those who are attempting to extend the benefit of the same institutions to the Territory of Kansas. There is no sympathy for them. He exults, his tone is that of exultation, when he speaks of the fact that the Territory of Kansas, which he calls a State, although it is not yet a State, is now as much a slave State as Georgia or South Carolina. His tone is that of feeling, of gratification, that instead of being a free State, like his own, and instead of joining the sisterhood of the great free States of this Union, it has placed itself on the level—not a lower one; far be it from me to say that—but on the very different level of the slave States of this Union, and is bound from this time henceforward, as he thinks, to the car of slavery. The tone in which he speaks of this is to my mind incomprehensible, and it shows that for some reason or other he has chosen to forget the land of his birth and education, with all its manifold advantages and blessings.

Sir, he treats the question as of no importance to anybody except the slave States of the Union. It is of trifling importance, he says—not precisely in those words, for I do not undertake to quote his language—but it is of little importance comparatively to the few thousands in Kansas; as if the institutions under which they were to live are of no consequence to them! Who should be interested but the thousands who are to live there, to receive the benefit or suffer the evils which are to flow from the institutions established there? It is of consequence to the slave States of the Union, he says. Is it of none to the free States? He does not intimate that it is. It is of no comparative importance, he says, because there are but a few thousand people in Kansas, forgetting as he does, the many thousands and hundreds of thousands who may be there in a very short period of time, covering its plains, and filling its valleys until they smile. It is not enough to say that the question is of very little comparative importance, as connected with them, but it is of great importance to the slave States of the Union. They have much feeling about it; they are to be consulted about it; but he does not intimate that the free States, the millions of people who live under constitutions unlike those which have been forced upon Kansas, can feel any interest in a question whether that great Territory is to be opened to them and their descendants, freed from a competition with that kind of labor which, in my judgment, has cursed so large—yes, the largest portion of the area of the States of this Union. Sir, I say these remarks, this tone, this want of sympathy, this exultation, this entire forgetfulness of the great and much the largest portion of the people of this country, in the President's message, is to me mysterious, coming from a man born and educated as the President has been, under institutions with which he is so familiar.

Again, the President very clearly intimates that difficulties must arise in case we refuse to admit Kansas as a State under the Lecompton constitution. He warns us in covert but very clear terms, that the people of the slave States will be excited on the subject; that they will not be willing to submit to it; and that, therefore, with a view to check all the agitation which may arise from the rejection of the constitution which has thus been submitted, he counsels that for peace sake we should admit it. Sir, I should have expected from the Chief Magistrate of this Union, sworn to support the Constitution and execute the laws, that at the time when he stated the danger that there might be an excitement, he would have intimated his opinion, his wish, that that excitement should not arise; that he would have warned the people of the slave as well as of the free States against disobeying the laws of the country. What is the proper tribunal, I should like to know, to settle this question? Is it not Congress? If Congress chooses to settle the question adversely to the views of the President, and say that Kansas shall not be admitted under the Lecompton constitution, I beg to know why he should not counsel the people of the slave States to submit to the majority who have the constitutional right to decide and have decided? Why does he warn us that we must pay some regard to these threats of overturning the Constitution, of dissolving the Union, and shun agitation, because we have been threatened, and not put in one word of warning to the people from whom he anticipates it—not tell them that they will be compelled to bow to the will of the majority, that they will be compelled to obey the laws of the land? Why, sir, it is the strangest thing to me that a Chief Magistrate of the country holding this position should not say, as one of his great predecessors said before him, that the Constitution should be preserved; that the Union should be preserved; that when the action of Congress was legal, no matter upon what subject, the power of the Federal Government should be brought to bear on any people or any portion of people whatever who undertook to make any agitation which endangered the safety of the Union of these States; but we hear nothing of that from the present President.

Strange to say, too, he is all the time talking about law; he tells us that the people must obey the laws; that the course of things in Kansas has been legal on the one side and illegal on the other; and he is very ready to read lectures to that people and to us on the subject of obeying the law, while he conveys no intimation to anybody that if the laws are broken, or attempted to be broken, in one region of country, there will be any interference from him, or even any words of reprobation from him.

Now, sir, as to the facts stated: let us look a little at what the President has stated in his message. He has made all the intimations of which I have spoken; but what has he gone on to say? He charges, substantially, that the majority (for he admits it to be a majority by saying more than once in his message that the people of Kansas, unless he had prevented them by military force, would have overturned the Government; thus admitting that they had the power as well as the will to subvert the territorial government there established) had a design, and have had from the beginning, to subvert the government by force. Is there any proof of this? What proof does he adduce? The desire to establish the Topeka constitution, as it has been called; and on the strength of that fact he even charges Governor Robinson with having, in the very first sentence of the message which he communicated to the Topeka Legislature, expressed the same design; when, if you come to look at it, (I will not trouble the Senate with reading it,) there is not a single word, not a single idea, not a single intimation, in that clause of Governor Robinson's message, which has been referred to by the President, intimating any design or wish of the kind. I deny, here, the whole foundation of the President's charge and argument on that point. There never has been a design to establish the Topeka constitution by force. No such design has ever been avowed, and no such design has ever been attempted to be carried into execution.

I know very well that the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] in his speech which he made at the first part of this session, stated that, if he had not believed it was the intention of the people of Kansas to carry that constitution into effect by force, and establish a State government under it by force, he would not have been disposed to interfere, for they had undoubtedly as good a right to petition, in that form, as another portion of the people had to petition in another form; but I should be glad to have gentlemen point me to the proof, in any part of the proceedings in the Territory of Kansas, showing that that people ever designed or expressed the intention to establish that constitution and a State government under it by force. The very first step they took disproves it. They sent it here to Congress, and petitioned to be admitted under it as a State. They chose a Legislature; and that Legislature met, but passed no laws; it adjourned. It avowed then, that its design was not a forcible one—not to establish a State government by force; but to establish it by the weight of opinion in the Territory, under an application to Congress to be admitted under it; and yet this has been alluded to over and over again, more than once on this floor, and by the President himself and by other officials, as establishing the fact that there was rebellion existing in Kansas. Sir, the adoption of that Topeka constitution, and the choice of State officers under it, and all they ever did, no more goes to make out rebellion against the constituted government than would a town meeting called to pass resolutions on the same subject.

What is rebellion? It is a desire and an attempt to overturn a government by force. Rebellion does not consist in words; you must have forcible acts. It is not enough to express abhorrence of a government; it is not enough to express detestation of the officers who carry on the operations of government; it is not enough to call town meetings; it is not enough to frame a constitution and submit it to the people for adoption; it is not enough even to pass laws under it, so long as there is no design to put them forcibly in execution and enforce the execution of those laws thus passed. The people of Kansas have done no more than this. On that ground, Senators on this floor, and others elsewhere, have repeatedly charged, and the President echoes the cry, that here is rebellion existing in Kansas; and the people are denounced as rebels against the constituted authorities. Leaving out of the case the fact that the territorial government was a usurping government in the beginning, (as it was,) and granting it to be a legal one, still I aver that there has been nothing done in reference to the Topeka constitution from the beginning to the end, on which any man who values his opinion as a constitutional lawyer could predicate the idea of rebellion. I said so the other day, and I say it again; and it is as little made out by long labored quotations from letters of Governor Walker. Governor Walker seems to be very good authority with the President on one point, and no authority whatever with him on other points. When Governor Walker tells him that a great majority of the people of Kansas are opposed to this constitution, he does not believe him, for he does not refer to the fact. When Governor Walker tells him there was fraud in the arrangement made in reference to the State officers that should be corrected, he does not believe a word of it, nor do gentlemen here. When Governor Walker tells him of the great frauds that were committed at various precincts which have been spoken of by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] and others, he does not believe a word of it. But he does refer to Governor Walker's letters, and makes many extracts from them, to establish the fact of rebellion; but they produce no such convictions—they prove nothing of the kind. Take them from the beginning to the end, and they make out no forcible resistance. They are nothing but statements; there is no fact on which to predicate them. The country might understand, from the statements thus made in detail, that the President really believed there was a dangerous rebellion in Kansas, and that unless he interfered with the troops of the United States, the Government would be overturned!

It has been remarked by my honorable friend from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] that it will be observed that these letters of Governor Walker were written immediately after his arrival in the Territory. Who was Governor Walker? A friend of the Administration, a leading Democrat, a southern man, with all his prejudices excited against the free-State people of Kansas, all his feelings and wishes in favor of adding to the strength of the slave States, by making Kansas also a slave State. He went there with these impressions; he carried them with him; he began his administration with them; he carried them, I am happy to say, not to the end. On arriving there, whom does he meet? His associates are the very persons who have been practicing these iniquities in Kansas. His suspicions are awakened, his mind is excited upon the subject, and he looks upon all these demonstrations as actually constituting a rebellious disposition on the part of the people of Kansas!

What are the proofs that he gives? They amount to nothing. As I remarked on a former occasion, one is that the people of Lawrence undertook to form a city government for municipal purposes. They had a right to do so; they did so; and they put that government in operation, not to be enforced on those who were unwilling, but to be enforced with the consent of those who agreed that that should be done under the very strong necessities of the case. He looked upon it as rebellion; he denounced it as rebellion; and they denounced him in their turn. He did not undertake to prevent them, and did not prevent them.

Again, another reason was the formation of a military organization. For what avowed purposes? For the purpose of protecting the polls—a legal purpose, a constitutional purpose—a right which arose from the constitutional right of the people to bear arms for their own protection, which cannot be taken away from them. That was the argument, because Governor Walker said he believed that was not the design! Has there been any evidence that it was not the design? It was the design avowed, the only one; and yet this is all the proof we have, coming from these statements, to make out the charge made by the President of the United States, that there was rebellion in Kansas which called for the use of the military power.
